Sufferers by Fire in New York.

after they had reached their destination? Unless he had satisfactory reasons to believe it was his interest, he would be just as far from doing this as a high-minded merchant from a western city would be from asking it, or receiving it if offered.

All who have assumed to represent the feelings of the merchants of New York, embraced by this bill, have expressly disavowed, on behalf of those merchants, a desire or even willingness to accept of the proposed measure, as a favor, boon, or charity, from the Government. They say they rest this claim upon its intrinsic justice; that it is founded on correct principle; and demand of us, as a matter of right, the passage of this bill; to prove which, they assume that the importer is a mere agent of the Government; that the bond he executes for duties is executed under a sort of legal restraint; that his contract is not voluntary. Both of these positions I consider altogether untenable. The importer cannot, in my conception, be understood to sustain to the Government the relation of an agent to his principal. It certainly cannot be, as the supporters of this measure have contended, that the importer sustains to the Federal Government the relation that the collector of the revenues in the States does to the State Governments. The collectors of the ports, as I understand it, answer to the place of the collector of the revenues in the States, and the importer, to every intent and purpose, answers to the place of tax payer.

The collectors of the revenues in the State Governments have no right of property in the taxes they collect, and are, in strictness, agents, just as much as the auctioneer is the agent of the owner of the goods which he sells. An agent has no right of property in the article the owner has placed in his hands: the owner has the entire right; and thus the one is easily distinguished from the other. Is not the importer, then, to every possible intent, the owner of his imported goods? Can he not keep and use them himself, or retail or wholesale them out, or refuse to do either, at his own option? None can deny this. And, if so, how can it be contended that the importer sustains the relation to this Government of a mere agent? It really seems to me the position is too self-evidently fallacious to be susceptible of elucidation. The gentleman from Massachusetts contends that it is the spirit and intention of the law that the consumer, and not the importer, should pay the duty. And hence, before the goods are sold to the consumer, if they are destroyed by fire or other accident, the importer should be released from the duty. Now, whilst I readily admit the practical effect of imposing duties upon importations, in this as in every other country, is, that the consumer pays it, I do deny that there is any thing in the spirit and meaning or policy of the laws imposing duties on importations that requires a sale by the importer, or a consumption of the article imported, before the Government has a right, in justice and in law, to exact its duties.

When an importer introduces a foreign article into this Government, he acts with a view of making a profit by it. If it be in great demand, he perhaps makes a heavy profit; if in less demand, his profit diminishes in the same proportion; if it be in no demand, he perhaps fails in his sale, and loses upon the article. He makes his importation with a full knowledge of all his risks, and only does it because of his conviction that the prospect of a good profit is greater than the probability of a loss. His is a chancing bargain; and, if he lose by it, nothing but just one of those contingencies which, in the nature of things, must occasionally occur, has transpired, and he has no just ground of complaint. Suppose an importer introduce a quantity of some article subject to become worthless, and, after he enters it, and gives his bond for the duty, it actually becomes worthless, will it be contended the importer shall be released from the duty, because the article had not gotten off his hands before it spoiled? Surely, none will so contend. As well might it be contended that, if such article had enhanced in value, the Government should be entitled to the increased value. Such risks are incident to the nature of the business; and every rational man who engages in it so calculates, and lays his profits accordingly.

I do not consider that the profit or per cent. which the importer makes upon his importation is the consideration that supports and renders valid the bonds given by him for duties, but it is the privilege of importing, and taking the chance of making a profit, that constitutes their real consideration. The Government does not undertake to guaranty to the importer a sale of his imported goods, or a profit upon that sale. None, it is to be presumed, will contend that the importer who has failed to realize more than cost and carriage for his cargo, shall claim to be released from the duties he owes his Government, because he was unable to make a sale covering cost, carriage, and duty.

The consideration of a bond for duties is exactly analogous to that of one executed for lottery tickets; the purchaser only buys a chance for a prize, and not the prize itself. And the purchaser of a ticket could, with just as much propriety, go to the agent of those who have made a lottery, and ask for his money back after he had drawn a blank, as the importer can come to us, sir, as the agents of the people, to whom all duties belong, and ask us to forgive him his bond, or to extend him a credit averaging four years; for it will be borne in mind that those who have advocated this bill have avowed an intention of sustaining another bill to release the duties on all goods that were destroyed in the hands of the importer; and no small proportion of their arguments have borne on this question. But further to elucidate my understanding of the practical operations of the chancing bargain of the importer—suppose those sufferers by the fire in New York had, since the fire, imported French goods to the value of 20,000,000 dollars, and a war with France, or a total exclusion of all French goods from our ports, had been determined upon by Congress: would not those importers have felt themselves entitled to all the advantages accruing to them in such a contingency? would they not, as sensible men, have improved their fortuitous position to make a much greater profit on these importations than they anticipated when they engaged in the enterprise? And who would ever think of their dividing their profits, thus greatly increased, with the Government, by whose immediate action those profits were enlarged?

The gentleman from Massachusetts says, although it is the intention of the law that the consumer should pay the duty, and not the importer, yet the situation of the importer is altogether different from the merchant in Cincinnati, who may have purchased from the importer; the importer, being a kind of agent of the Government, has a right to demand his duties back of the Government if the goods imported be consumed before sale; but if the Cincinnati merchant buy the whole cargo, and it is consumed by fire, whilst his, though perhaps unremoved, the Government ought not to interfere, because one is a sort of agent of the Government, and pays the duty, and the other does not. Is this not rather a distinction without a difference? In neither case has the article reached the hands of the consumer. And if the gentleman's argument be good, that it is the intention of the law that the consumer should pay the duty, would it not as much defeat that intention in the case of the Cincinnati merchant as in that of the New York importer; and as much in the case of the village merchant, who is perhaps the third owner, as in either instance?

But it is contended again by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the laws imposing duties operate as a legal restraint on the natural right of the importer; that he is compelled to execute his bond before he can land or enter his cargo, and therefore the bond is not altogether voluntary, and that in this it essentially differs from an ordinary bond given to a private creditor by his debtor. There may, at first blush, be an apparent difference in the two cases; but, on examination, I think it will be found that there is no essential or material difference. I hold that a merchant enters upon the pursuit of his chosen avocation, with a knowledge of the laws by which the wisdom of the nation has regulated it. He knows that when his ship arrives in port he has to execute his bond, with approved security, for the duties on his cargo, before he can land or enter it in the custom-house. With a full knowledge of all this, he, as a free agent, laboring under no legal compulsion or restraint, voluntarily enters upon the business of an importer, it is to be presumed with a knowledge of, and a willingness to comply with, the laws regulating the imposition and collection of duties. Hence, with great deference to the opinion of the honorable gentleman, I cannot admit the validity of his position, that the contract between the importer and his Government is not entirely voluntary, and that it differs essentially from one between a private creditor and debtor.

Every pursuit has its peculiar advantages and disadvantages. We find the rewards of labor in the thousand various pursuits of life, from the humble day laborer up to the most enterprising and hazardous merchant, are generally small in proportion to their certainty, and enlarge as they grow more uncertain. Hence, he who is content with the meager supply of the absolute necessities of an humble life will adopt the pursuit of a day laborer, because the reward of his labor is immediate and certain; he draws each night the wages of the past day, and retires to his humble dwelling to rest from his labor, free from all the cares and perplexities to which others of large possessions or multifarious engagements are subject. He, however, who is not content with his condition, will perhaps adopt the business of a tiller of the earth, the rewards of whose labor, though more uncertain, and not so immediate, are yet larger in proportion to their greater uncertainty. An early frost, or an unusual storm, may occasionally sweep from him the fruits of months of labor; yet, as such occurrences are rare, and the inducements in the way of profit are great, we see the great mass of our fellow-citizens engaged in agriculture. But when the early frosts come, and cut short the crops of the farmer, he is conscious that it is nothing but what, from the nature of his business, he had reason occasionally to anticipate, and never thinks of asking the Government to supply his loss. So, again, he who is ambitious of great wealth, who has no relish for mediocrity, and who, from the peculiarity of his organization, is happiest when most excited, which is when his prospects of gain and hope of profit are greatest, adopts the pursuit of an importer, who, whilst he shares undividedly the immense profits attending prosperity in his pursuit, should not, as a just man, when adversity comes, desire his fellow-citizens, which is but another name for his Government, to remunerate him for his losses. I cannot perceive that his claim for relief has any more foundation in principle and justice than that of the farmer whose crop has been cut short by the frosts or an unfavorable season.

Upon the subject of the warehousing system of England, about which the honorable gentleman has exhibited much learning, I will barely remark, that the only material practical difference between it and our system is, that there the risk of the importer is less than in this country, and he lays a less profit to cover that less risk.

Our merchants, enlightened and intelligent, as the gentleman has just said they are, lay a profit upon their business that bears a proper proportion to their risk: as evidence of which, take the importers of goods to this country for the last twenty years; look at the amount of capital invested by them in their business, and then see whether, under all the supposed hardships of our system, the same amount of capital has been employed by the same number of men, with any thing approaching the same profit. It cannot be the policy of this Government, by partial and individual legislation, to contribute to the amassment of overgrown wealth in the hands of any particular class of its citizens. The people in every community are most happy when there is least inequality in their wealth; and as the happiness of the people is the prime object of this Government, we should be slow to indulge in a course of partial legislation, calculated to defeat that great object. Our Government has a just and natural right to demand of its importers duties upon their importations, in return for the millions of dollars it annually expends in protecting and affording facilities to their commerce, among the most conspicuous items of which stand the expenses of our navy and our diplomatic corps. It is unjust that the Government, which is but another name for the whole people, should lay out and expend millions annually for the protection of a portion of its citizens, in a particular pursuit, and get nothing in turn for it to the common Treasury.

The honorable gentleman further insists on the propriety of this measure, because of the immense amount which the port of New York has yielded to the Treasury, exceeding, as we are informed, $260,000,000, and now annually equaling one half of all the duties of the Government. And it is urged with great zeal and earnestness upon the Government, that merchants who have done this much have a right to claim its special protection. Now mark, Mr. Chairman, that the friends of this bill have contended that the spirit and meaning of the laws imposing duties on imports are, that the consumer shall pay them; and all admit that, in general, the practical operation of these laws is, that the consumer pays the first costs, the carriage, the profits of all the intermediate owners, and the duty of the Government, on every thing that is imported. If, then, this be correct, can it be said that New York is entitled to the credit of paying the taxes and supporting the Government? It is the products of the tillers of the earth, sir, that go abroad and return in the shape of foreign commodities through the port of New York, that fill your coffers; and New York collects and pays over to the Government the duties, and then turns round and says she is the supporter of the Government. Does she, sir, do this service without compensation, that she should claim so much merit for it? Let us look into this matter. She keeps for her trouble ten per cent. on the amount collected, and this is the lowest estimate that is placed on the expense of collection; so that, in truth, we perceive that she has charged us at least $26,000,000, for the services rendered us in collecting and paying our own money! And yet we are asked to pass this measure for her benefit, which is, in effect, a donation of upwards of $318,000. I, for one, am opposed to this extension of the credit on these bonds, upon principle, and because I think the precedent will involve the country in immense troubles and difficulties; but if it be extended, I insist, in justice to the balance of the citizens of this Government, that the obligors be required to pay interest upon their bonds.

We have heard much said, Mr. Chairman, in commendation of the city of New York; she has been justly called the London of America. We are truly told that she belongs alike to all the citizens of our wide-spread republic, and that every one has cause to be proud of her. Her representatives tell us that she is so complete.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

ly the heart of these United States, that a derangement of any of her functions, like a derangement of the healthful operations of the functions of the human heart, will be severely felt by all the different members. We are told that every city, village, and hamlet, in the land, will feel the effects of this calamity, unless we extend the relief contemplated by this bill. We have been told that a large proportion of the banking capital, upon which the enterprise and the business of the West and Southwest are predicated, belongs in New York; and, unless she is relieved by our timely interposition, that this portion of the Union is to feel the shock with peculiar force. We, the representatives from Kentucky, have been admonished to look before we leap; and see that our opposition to this bill does not conflict with the best interests of our constituents, and, as a natural consequence, amount to a misrepresentation of them. We, sir, are advised, in a most special and significant manner, by the gentleman from New York, that very much of our banking capital belongs to that city, and that the vacuum occasioned by the late destruction of capital there, unless this measure should be successful, must and will be supplied by funds withdrawn (by the New York capitalists) from the West.

I, Mr. Chairman, am not unapprized that a heavy pressure in New York would be sensibly felt by the people of Kentucky, and by no portion of them so sensibly as my immediate constituents, the citizens of the city of Louisville and the circumjacent counties; that city presents a grand and magnificent specimen of the incalculable resources of the West, and most particularly of Kentucky, which (I hope I may be permitted to say, without incurring the imputation of egotism, what all impartial writers have said) is the garden of the world. The history of the world, under similar circumstances, sir, presents no parallel to the rapidly increasing population and commerce of this city, which, sir, though for months in the dry season of every year is inaccessible, except for boats of a small size, has more than doubled her population of 10,000 since the census of 1830, and now possesses more commerce by one fourth than her very flourishing and enterprising sister, Cincinnati, which, in 1830, possessed a population near three times as great as hers. I am proud of a station upon this floor as the representative of such a city; and as long as I am honored with its confidence, its best interest shall find in me, though a feeble, yet a devoted and assiduous advocate. But, sir, I should feel myself an unworthy representative of my constituents, who consider of, and act upon, every subject connected with the public interest with expanded and enlarged views, were I not to act upon this subject with views which I consider to be correspondingly liberal and enlarged. I, sir, however, do not consider that we act upon this subject with views sufficiently enlarged, when we confine the operation of this measure to the present effects to be produced upon New York, and such other sections as may feel the consequences of the late fire; but we should look forward to the effects that this act is to have as a precedent to future legislation in this hall. I believe the laws regulating the collection of our duties are not unwise. I believe they reflect the image of enlightened public opinion, upon which all the laws of this Government rest; but if they are wrong and oppressive, let us change the system, and let it be uniform in its operation, so that the citizens of every State, whether represented on this floor by the influence and votes of one or forty members, shall experience equal benefits from it.

Then, sir, I do admit that this fire will produce a pressure in New York, and that its effects will, in some degree, reach my constituents; and that the proposed measure would, to some extent, alleviate that pressure. But, sir, it does not hence follow that I can support it; it does not follow that my constituents, if standing in person here, would support it. I know them well enough to assert, and I do assert with pride, as their representatives that self-interest is no unerring test of their support of a particular measure, and that they would not hesitate to oppose this bill, even though they were the immediate sufferers, and were intended to be the recipients of the favor, if they thought it wrong in principle and bad in policy. Therefore I oppose the bill, believing, as I conscientiously do, that I could not vote for it except in violation of important principles and sound policy.

But, sir, let us consider of what appears to me to be another very weighty objection to this bill. It will be seen, by the first section, that every merchant who has suffered a loss to the amount of one thousand dollars shall have credits, equal to an average of four years, on the whole amount of his bonds, from and after they fall due. Now, suppose an importer is indebted $50,000 for duties to the Government, and has lost $1,000 by the fire, calculating the use of his money worth to him six per cent. per annum, he makes a nett profit, over and above his loss, of $11,000. And off of whom? The people—the rightful owners of it, to whom it is always worth at least six per cent. per annum, and who have as much right to the interest as the principal.

I hold, as it respects the second section of this bill, unless the credit asked is extended with the sole view of better securing the collection of bonds embraced by it, that there is no more propriety in extending the proposed credit than in taking the amount of $3,000,000 out of the Treasury, and loaning it to the merchants of Philadelphia, Cincinnati, or Louisville; to do which we are prohibited by considerations of policy not less than those of a constitutional character.

I am not one of the number who believe that a check on the growth and power of the city of New York will be attended with those blasting and ruinous effects on all parts of this Government which some seem to anticipate. Whilst I am the last to desire a calamity to befall New York; whilst I am entirely content that she may enjoy and improve those benefits which nature has given her, I should be happy to witness, in Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, rival cities, commanding an equal commerce and an equal power. I must confess, occurrences have transpired, and ideas have been suggested, in connexion with the power and importance of that city, which have rather aroused my apprehensions.

We are told she is the heart of this nation, and to allow her commercial operations to become deranged is to derange every member of this whole Union, in all its ramifications; that already she has extended to the West and South loans and accommodations to the amount of twenty-nine millions of dollars, and already do we hear the representatives of the people admonished, that if they do not attend to the present demand of the city of New York, their constituents will feel the effects of a refusal. How long will it be, if she continues to increase in her commerce, and population, and power, and money, as in years past, before she can come into this hall, and say, through her representatives, that the interest of this city of ours requires this, that, or the other, legislative assistance, perhaps the use of twenty or fifty millions of dollars, as a loan from the Government, without interest, for four or forty years, in order to sustain herself under her "much-abused spirit of enterprise," and to admonish a majority of the members that if they refuse the demand, their constituents, who have the use of millions of New York money, will be made to feel the effects of the refusal?

I, for one, Mr. Chairman, do protest in my place against New York, or any other city, advancing to such an eminence of power. I hope never to see any city in these United States sustain to them the relation Paris sustains to France. God forbid that New York shall ever become what the advocates of this measure have denominated it—the same to our political system which the heart is to the corporeal system.

We have heard much, Mr. Chairman, from a certain quarter, though not from Massachusetts, about a moneyed corporation wielding dangerous powers that were likely to overshadow the liberties of the people. I should be pleased to know whether the gentlemen, who were in by-gone days so sensitive about moneyed influences, are now to be found among the number who are admonishing the West to mark well their course on this subject, and see that they do not run counter to the interests of their constituents. We have been told that New York has acted the part of a kind, fond, indulgent, and confiding mother, to the cities and villages of the West. I do not wish, sir, to create any sectional jealousies upon this or any other subject that comes before this House, for I consider it an improper mode of legislation; but I will barely remark, that whilst I have learned there is much of enterprise, industry, and prudent financiering, in the New York character, I had not read so far into their history as to ascertain that they were in the habit of extending their kindness and indulgence much farther than the dictates of interest might chance to suggest. I suppose the merchants of New York occasionally extend time to their western customers after their obligations fall due, but I have not within my recollection heard them charged with refusing a little interest by way of indemnity for the forbearance. And we in the West say to the merchants of New York, if it be inconvenient to pay your bonds when they fall due, it is but just you should pay interest for the indulgence.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, as an additional reason why this bill should pass, brings to the view of the House the immense loss which the fire has caused to New York; he has told us to set down the destruction of goods and buildings at $25,000,000, (which I think exceeds by $8,000,000 any previous estimate I have heard,) and to that add the amount of credit that such a sum would give merchants of good character, and also the amount of profit that such a capital would reasonably have yielded merchants well established in business, and the additional loss consequent on the destruction of their account books and papers, and the amount would be astounding. I agree that the loss to New York has been immense; but it would very much puzzle the gentleman from Massachusetts, learned and able as all admit him to be, to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of an impartial judge, that New York can sustain herself under such a loss, amounting, if his calculations be not magnified, to at least $100,000,000, and yet be unable to meet the demands of the Government to the amount of between three and four millions. If they can maintain their credit unimpaired under all these losses; if, as it seems to be admitted on all hands, not a failure has occurred, so far, among all the Government debtors, it seems to me that gentlemen who have warned us to pass the bill, or great losses must be incurred by the Government from the failure of these merchants, are rather disposed to deal in fancy more than in reasonable calculations, predicated upon probabilities.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has felt himself called on to give the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEABCE] a gentle rebuke for the course he has seen proper to adopt upon this subject; he seems to think the effort of that gentleman, in proposing an amendment to the bill, was intended to excite, in other classes, a prejudice against that class of the community for whose relief it was intended. Now, sir, whilst I trust I shall ever be the last man on this floor, or elsewhere, to say or do any thing with a view of exciting the mechanic or farmer against the merchant, or any one portion of the community against other portions, engaged in different pursuits, (for I consider they are all necessary to make up a prosperous community, and are dependent on each other for their prosperity,) I do most honestly accord in opinion with that gentleman, that, instead of bestowing our charity on importing merchants who are untouched by the fire, we could with much propriety, if we had the constitutional power to dispense charity to any, extend it, in the present instance, to the helpless widows and starving orphans, whose whole means of subsistence, vested in the insurance offices, as the only stocks in which their limited resources would yield them a support, were in one night swept from existence, and they thrown fatherless, friendless, and penniless, upon the cold charities of the world.

When Mr. GRAVES had concluded—

Mr. CUSHMAN rose and said:

Mr. Chairman: Whether I should agree with gentlemen who have preceded, upon the subject of the warehouse system, or not, is a question which need not now be decided. And although much has been said in regard to the payment of duties, whether it be the importer or the consumer can have no influence with me in the formation of my opinion upon the subject now under consideration. It will be the best time to discuss those subjects when they shall come before the House with more relevancy.

The design of the bill, upon which we are now called upon to act, is to grant relief to those who have suffered by the recent calamitous fire at the city of New York; and, excepting the proviso in the first section, presents two questions, and, in my opinion, only two questions, which require an answer. The first is, whether Congress has the power to grant the relief which is solicited; and the other is, whether it be expedient so to do.

I, sir, entertain no doubts as to the constitutional power of Congress to grant all relief which this bill proposes to give, excepting what is contained in the proviso to which I have alluded.

All that is contemplated by the bill, excepting the proviso, is to grant to those who have suffered by the late distressing fire at the city of New York an extension of credit upon all bonds which have been given to secure the payment of duties, and which they now owe to the Government. In this particular, Congress ought to exercise a sound discretion. It is not improbable that, should the Government press this unfortunate class of debtors to make immediate payment, much might be lost, which otherwise would ultimately be saved for the benefit of the country. Every man who is acquainted with business knows that lenity oftentimes is productive of great good, both to the creditor as well as the debtor. Such I doubt not would be the case in the present instance. So far, therefore, I think we may safely follow the examples which have been set before us by the action of Congress in previous years. The gentleman from New York, who made some very appropriate remarks upon this subject the other day, called the attention of the committee to similar relief which had been granted to the inhabitants of the town in which I have the honor to reside. It is true, sir, that in the years of 1802, 1807, and 1813, the town of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, was visited by very calamitous, destructive, and distressing fires; on two of which occasions Congress readily granted relief to the sufferers by extending the time of payment of all bonds then due at the customhouse for one year, and for one year only. This bill proposes to extend the time of payment of similar bonds from three to five years. The principles involved, however, are the same, whether it be for one or for five years. And if Congress have the right to extend the time of payment, to those who owe the Government, for one year, it may do it for five. And believing, as I do, that we have the power to grant relief thus far, and that it is also expedient that this power should be exercised on the present occasion, I shall cheerfully give the bill my support, provided the same shall be amended agreeably to the motion made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

But the principles involved in the proviso above mentioned do not meet my approbation, and are such as I shall not consent to sanction. It is my desire, therefore, to procure the amendment which has been proposed; without which, I shall be compelled to give my vote against the passage of the bill. And sir, as precedents have been quoted as a reason why we should grant an extension of credit to the above-named sufferers, I ask the indulgence of the committee while I call its attention to one precedent, at least, which was established at a very important crisis in the history of this country; a period when the souls of men were tried; a period when our forefathers pledged their lives, their property, and their sacred honor, for the achievement of American independence. While, sir, this tremendous struggle was going on, at the expense of so much suffering of blood and of treasure, the town of Falmouth, now the city of Portland, Maine, was consumed to ashes by that vindictive foe with which this Spartan band was contending; in consequence of which, the inhabitants of that place were reduced to a suffering condition not easily described. And, sir, in this hour of unspeakable distress, when the inhabitants of that town were without food, without clothing, and without a shelter from the storm, they petitioned to the continental Congress, then in session at Philadelphia, for relief. And if there ever was a case which would authorize that Congress or any other to grant relief, that was one. But, sir, how was the fact in this case? Was the prayer of this petition granted? Were the inhabitants of the town of Falmouth, thus reduced to wretchedness, relieved by the patriot band who composed that Congress? No, sir, they were not. But the prayer of that petition was rejected. Rejected, however, not because they had no sympathy to bestow upon suffering humanity, for I presume there never were men more alive to the sufferings of their fellow-creatures than those who were then assembled in that continental Congress, but because it established a dangerous precedent; a principle which could not be carried out, without jeopardizing the best interests of the country.

Mr. Chairman, according to the information which I have received, the prayer of that petition was opposed upon the ground which I have stated—that it was then asked, who would raise the veil of futurity? Who could tell how long it might be before the same unrelenting foe might lay in ashes the city of Boston, of New York, and every town and city upon the whole Atlantic coast? Grant relief in one case of this sort, it must be done in all others of a like character, which, for aught any mortal man could tell, might in a very short time involve the country in a dilemma from which there would be no escape. It would be establishing a principle which would make the Government the underwriters for all the property in the country: establishing a principle which ought not for a moment to be tolerated. And, sir, there is, in my opinion, no difference between that case and the one now under consideration, excepting that was a request for a donation, and this is a request for the loan of money for three, four, and five years. But the effect upon the operations of the Treasury for the time being would be the same in one case as in the other. Let Congress to-day loan to the sufferers by fire in the city of New York one million of money, who among us can divine that, upon the same principle, we may not to-morrow be called upon to bestow a similar benefit upon others equally deserving? If this were to be the only calamity of this character, then adopt the proviso contained in this bill, for no great injury would thereby accrue to the country. But so long as the inhabitants of New York, as well as of every other town or city, shall be subject to similar calamities, we cannot grant the relief proposed in the proviso of this bill without becoming the underwriters or insurers of all the property in the country.

But, sir, I am opposed to retaining this proviso in the bill, not only because it would establish a dangerous precedent, but I am opposed to it because I believe it would violate both the letter and spirit of the constitution. From the phraseology used in this proviso, we should not, perhaps, come at once to such a conclusion. But, sir, in plain English, it amounts to nothing more nor less than a request for the loan of money. The words used are as follows, viz: "that those who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the fire shall also be entitled to the benefits of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid." That is, all those who paid their bonds after the fire shall have the amount thereof refunded, upon giving new bonds to the collector, payable in three, four, and five years. Clothe the principles involved in this proviso as you please; wrap them in as much mystery as may be, still I again say, sir, the plain English of the whole proviso is to authorize the collector of the district of New York to loan out upon bond all the money which he has received thereon since the fire. I am willing that the collector of that city may continue to be the receiver of public moneys; but he shall not, with my consent, be appointed to loan out the money belonging to the people. Where is the money which has been paid to the collector since the fire, in payment of bonds due the Government? If it be still in the hands of the collector, then Congress has no power over it. The only way in which he can be reached for that amount of funds is upon his bond; but if they have gone, as they ought, into the Treasury, then that money cannot be drawn therefrom, except by special appropriation. The patrons of the bill have asserted that, should the proviso be retained in the bill, that of itself will make an appropriation, to be disbursed by the collector, as therein contemplated. Well, sir, for the sake of the argument, I admit that such would be the effect. But the patrons of the bill may grasp either horn of the dilemma which they choose. If it has not gone into the Treasury, then Congress is called upon to loan out money, over which it has not any control; and if it be in the Treasury, then Congress have no right, no power, to make the contemplated appropriation. In neither point of view, therefore, can I vote in favor of retaining this provision of the bill. I ask the committee, if a proposition were now before Congress to appropriate five millions of money, to be loaned out on bond by the collector of the city of New York, whether this committee would consent to grant such appropriation? This, sir, is the true test. All those who would make such an appropriation, and appoint the collector of the city of New York to be the agent of the Government to loan out the money, will vote against the proposed amendment. But, sir, all those who believe that Congress has no constitutional right to establish a broker's office, for the purpose of letting out the money of the Government, will vote with me in favor of striking out the provision of the bill which has been mentioned. If this be done, the bill shall have my support; otherwise not.

Mr. BROWN said he had obtained the floor not so much with a view to enter into an elaborate examination of the principles of the bill, as to recommend it earnestly and urgently, but respectfully, to the immediate action and final judgment of the House. A proposition similar in its character had been introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means near two months since, and it was upon the 20th of January that the bill under discussion came from the Senate, with nearly the unanimous approbation of that body. Honorable gentlemen could not but be aware of the consequences of this inactivity on the part of the House of Representatives. Bonds for a large amount were lying over, due and unpaid at the custom-house: the public creditor had encountered difficulties in making his usual entries; the importers of foreign goods found their business in a state of doubt and uncertainty; commercial interests and operations of the greatest variety and magnitude were suspended upon the issue of the question; and he earnestly hoped, he entreated, that whatever was done, whether it should be the adoption or rejection of the bill, or the substitution of some other measure of relief in its place, should be done quickly and without further delay.

He confessed he had been unable to see the force and efficacy of some of the arguments offered in the progress of the debate. It had been said (with great truth, he was willing to believe) that the New York merchants had discharged all their obligations to the Government, with promptness and fidelity, and, in the aggregate, had paid more than three hundred millions into the Treasury. This fact, so creditable to their enterprise and honorable to their character, could have no influence upon his mind. It could form no foundation for legislative aid or interposition in a case like the present. It did, indeed, afford the best assurance to the nation that the bonds would be faithfully paid, when they came to maturity, but beyond that it could not have the weight of a feather upon the judgment of the committee. He might as well be told that the receipt of eleven millions within the past year from the sale of the public lands would justify and support the multiplied claims upon the national domain, which were so repeatedly and perseveringly pressed upon the consideration of Congress. Arguments in the form of appeals to the passions, to the sympathies and sensibilities of members, were alike feeble and ineffectual, and must be rejected as inapplicable to the business of national legislation. He was not insensible to the multiplied and innumerable instances of individual and personal suffering—to the wreck of private fortune—the destruction of private property—the unmitigated ruin and desolation—which had followed in the train of the late fire in New York. Wherever like calamities visited the abodes and habitations of men, whether they fell upon the great cities of the seaboard or the more humble hamlets of the interior, such were their terrible and inevitable consequences; yet he doubted very much whether it was upon such considerations as individual distress or personal suffering that the principles of the bill could be maintained, or its provisions recommended to the favorable opinion of the committee. There were a large and numerous portion of the sufferers (and by far the most helpless and indigent, and on that account the most meritorious portion) who were, unfortunately, beyond the reach of any aid or assistance which Congress could give; and they found themselves in this position, not because they were without equal and paramount claims upon the public sympathy, and equally and especially the objects of the public bounty, (could that bounty be legally and constitutionally exercised,) but solely because they maintained no connexions or relations with the Government which could authorize or justify its interference in their behalf. Honorable gentlemen had objected to the bill because the relief it proposed to grant was partial in principle, and would be unequal in its application; that it did not embrace within its provisions the poorer and more humble class of sufferers, as well as the importers of foreign goods. He was willing to admit there was force in the objection, and he as willingly believed that no bill could be framed adapted to all the exigencies of the case. But if the event out of which the measure originated was such as justified and demanded the interposition of Government, upon considerations which he would name hereafter, it should not fail, and be defeated, because it was impossible to make it equal and universal in its operations. Limited and restrained as the power of Congress necessarily was, upon no question could it be more circumscribed than upon a proposition to mitigate the consequences of calamities such as formed the subject of the present debate. Governments do not undertake to repair the losses of their citizens, occasioned by fire, by flood, or by tempest, nor to insure against the multiplied accidents to which property and the acquisitions of industry are perpetually exposed. However deeply (said Mr. B.) our sympathies may be awakened, and our feeling excited, by the eloquent and touching appeals which honorable members have felt it their duty to make; however grateful it might be to us, individually, to extend relief to the suffering citizens of New York, without qualification or distinction, we cannot forget that we are here to represent others, not to act for ourselves. We are here in the exercise of a specific and limited authority, that the public treasure is not at our disposal for the purposes of benevolence or charity. And if we interfere at all, it must be upon some known and positive principle of policy and expediency, having immediate connexion with the public interest. He thought he had been able to find the existence of that principle in the relations maintained between a portion of the sufferers and the Government, in regard to the collection and security of the revenue, and in the obligation imposed upon Congress to sustain the financial and commercial operations of the country, under the pressure and derangement consequent upon the destruction of so large an amount of its active capital. The importing merchants were the debtors of the Government upon custom-house bonds for something like four millions of dollars. They were the agents of the Treasury in the collection of its revenue. A sudden, unforeseen, and appalling calamity, without a parallel in human history, had consumed their resources, and crippled their energies. The duties secured upon the bonds would, most probably, all be realized, if the time of payment was postponed; but if immediate payment was pressed, no one could undertake to say what the result might be. Congress was not asked to give away the money, nor to release the debts, but only to prolong the credit to a more propitious period of time. Was there any thing unconstitutional or unreasonable in so plain a proposition? Could it be an unjustifiable or an improper exercise of authority, for the Government to do that for the suffering public debtor which no gentleman could refuse to his private debtor, while laboring under similar misfortunes? It was manifest to his mind that the passage of the bill under consideration would not only increase the security of the Government, and afford the public debtor time and opportunity to meet his engagements, but would also supply the business transactions of the country with a portion of that element so essential to their vigor and vitality.

The city of New York, from her superior position, her facilities for commercial intercourse, and vast extent and variety of her foreign and domestic transactions, exercised a powerful and controlling influence over all business pursuits and occupations of men. Her enterprising and adventurous capitalists have pushed their investments into every region of trade and every department of human industry. Their ships were seen upon the bosom of every sea, and their canvass was swept onward with the force of every gale. It was substantially their means which enabled the Government recently to realize eleven millions from the sales of the public lands. The bank and trust company stocks, the stocks created for internal improvements, in every section of the Union, are, in a great measure, based upon their credit and resources. The western States had been liberal, if not prodigal, in the creation of such property within the past year; the State of Indiana alone had authorized a credit of ten millions, for purposes of internal improvement, and it was not more certain that the waters of the Wabash and the Mississippi would continue to flow onwards and mingle with the ocean, than that all these stocks would ultimately seek a market in the city of New York. No portion of the country could be indifferent to the annihilation of twenty-five millions of capital in a single night, and he could not believe it possible that the Government would withhold the aid contemplated by the bill from those who had encountered the first fury of the storm.

The bill embraced within its provisions two classes of public debtors having bonds at the custom-house in New York; those who had lost property by the fire exceeding in value the sum of one thousand dollars, and those who had not suffered such loss. It proposed to extend the time for payment of the bonds of the first class, amounting to something like one million, to periods not exceeding three, four, and five years; and the time for payment of those of the second class, amounting to nearly three millions, for six, nine, and twelve months, to be computed from the time the same shall severally fall due. This four millions was the money of the people, a part of the common treasure of the nation; for while the importer was the agent or instrument to collect, it was in fact the consumer who ultimately paid the duties upon foreign goods. He saw no good reason why the importing merchant should have the use and enjoyment of the public money without some equivalent paid to the Government; and he therefore thought that interest, at the rate of four per cent., should be imposed as a condition of extending the time of payment. He would cheerfully vote for the bill in its present form, although he would prefer that the prolonged credit should carry interest, as a partial indemnity for the additional hazard, if for no other reason. In conclusion, he would avail himself of the present opportunity to say, that inasmuch as the prospects of the future were bright with the promises of tranquillity and peace, there was every assurance that large appropriations for public defence would not be demanded. If Congress, therefore, should reject the bill, and insist upon the payment of the bonds, its only effect would be swell the unappropriated surplus of more than ten millions already in the Treasury. And he put it to the judgment of the committee to say whether the four millions proposed to be postponed would not be more beneficially employed in the business of the country than it would be lying comparatively idle and inactive in the vaults of the deposite banks.

Mr. PARKER was in favor of the bill, and would have even gone further, if possible, and given relief to any of the sufferers who were debtors to the Government, whether they had suffered by houses, land, merchandise, or any thing else. He was in favor of any measure of relief within the limits of the constitution. The distress consequent on the New York conflagration had been felt through every portion of the mercantile community. He conceived the present bill to be entirely within the constitutional limits, for it proposed nothing more than an extension of time to a suffering debtor, and he could not conceive it possible to make any further discrimination of classes of sufferers. He gave notice that he should propose an amendment to the bill when it was in order.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the pending motion was an unimportant one, being simply whether a merchant having paid his bonds should be placed on a worse footing than those who had not paid them. In order to meet the objections of gentlemen to the pending question, he would offer an amendment. He said the money was not in the Treasury. No money was in the Treasury except such as was put there by warrant at the end of each quarter. Any money in the hands of the collector could not be considered in the Treasury, and could be paid back to the merchants without the passage of a special law for that purpose.

Mr. C. then moved to amend the proviso proposed to be stricken out by Mr. HARDIN, by the addition of the following words: "If not previously carried into the Treasury of the United States by a warrant." Mr. C. hoped this amendment would meet the object of the gentleman, and briefly replied to the arguments of that gentleman against the bill. He said at a future time he should call the attention of the gentlemen of the West to various bills in favor of their section of country, which went a great way farther than the present case.

Mr. HARDIN again opposed the bill at length, and cited various acts of relief heretofore passed, pointing out the variations in the provisions of those acts and the present bill. By the acts for the relief of Portsmouth and Norfolk, the credit was extended to only a year's indulgence, and its benefits were confined to the actual sufferers. Mr. H. also went into the proceedings on those acts, and urged his objections in detail to the present bill. He was strongly opposed to the clause relinquishing the interest, which he contended was in violation of the true spirit and intent of the constitution. It was giving the importers of New York a preference over the importing merchants of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other cities, conflicting with that clause of the constitution which provided that all imposts, &c. "should be uniform through the United States."

He contended the money was in the Treasury the moment it was paid to one of the officers of the Government, whether collector, receiver, or a deposite bank. The provision he was opposed to was neither more nor less than taking money out of the public Treasury, and lending it to an individual who had suffered by fire. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILLIPS] had referred to the allowance of drawbacks, but Mr. H. contended the principle of drawbacks did not meet this case. The allowance of drawbacks was within the legitimate powers of Congress, under the constitution, to regulate commerce. New York enjoyed immense advantages from the amount of public money received there, and instead of the Government being indebted to New York for collecting the revenue, she had been benefited not less than from 20 to 25 millions of dollars. She made from ten to fifteen cents on every dollar received there of the public revenue; and he drew the attention of the committee to the great outlays already made, and proposed to be made, on the public works, the custom-house, fortifications, the navy yards, &c., amounting to about five millions of dollars. The bill proposed to place the Government in the character of an insurance office; but it went no farther than the wealthy merchant. If it could be shown that any one of the great leading interests of the country had been prostrated, he might then vote for it, but till that could be shown he should oppose it at every stage. Mr. H. alluded to instructions that had been sent on from some of the large cities to their Representatives to support the bill. He said, if a bill had been brought forward to refund the duty on packages unopened, and not offered in the market, he would have gone for it. He referred to the appropriations proposed for the current year, which were already about four millions more than in former years. Besides these, there was to be a special appropriation for the increase of the navy, to the amount of about six millions four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WISE explained, that the Committee on Naval Affairs had come to a resolution to fill up the blank in that bill with two millions of dollars.

Mr. STORER moved that the committee rise. Agreed to; Ayes 82, noes not counted

The committee accordingly rose, and the chairman having reported progress,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the bill be again made the special order at one o'clock to-morrow; which was agreed to; and then

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

PAY OF VOLUNTEERS IN SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. LINCOLN in the chair, on the bill to provide for the payment of volunteers and militia corps in the service of the United States.

The bill was then read, as follows:

A bill to provide for the payment of volunteers and militia corps in the service of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates, of volunteer and militia corps, who have been or may hereafter be in the service of the United States, shall be entitled to and receive the same monthly pay, rations, and forage, and be furnished with the same camp equipage, including knapsacks, as are or may be provided by law for the officers, musicians, artificers, and privates, of the infantry of the army of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the officers of all mounted companies shall each be entitled to receive forage, or money in lieu thereof, for two horses, when they actually keep private servants, and for one horse when without private servants; and that forty cents per day be allowed for the use of each horse. That each non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, and private, of all mounted companies, shall be entitled to receive forage in kind for one horse, with forty cents per day for the use thereof, and twenty-five cents per day, in lieu of forage and subsistence, when the same shall be furnished by himself, or twelve and a half cents per day for either, as the case may be.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the officers non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates, shall be entitled to one day's pay, subsistence, and other allowances, for every twenty miles' travel from their places of residence to the place of general rendezvous, and from the place of discharge back to their residence.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers or militia, who may be received into the service of the United States by virtue of the provisions of this act, shall be entitled to all the benefits which may be conferred on persons wounded or otherwise disabled in the service of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That when any officer, non-commissioned officer, artificer, or private, of said militia or volunteer corps, who shall die at any time in consequence of wounds received in service, and shall leave a widow, or if no widow, a child or children, under sixteen years of age, such widow, or if no widow, such child or children, shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death, for and during the term of five years; and in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow before the expiration of five years, the half pay for the remainder of the time shall go to the child or children of said decedant: Provided, always, That the Secretary of War shall adopt such forms of evidence, in applications under this act, as the President of the United States may prescribe.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON moved the following amendment to the second section, to come in after the word "companies," where it first occurs, to wit: "who have been, or who may hereafter be, in the service of the United States;" which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved the following amendments to the second section, in both places where the word "use" occurs, so as to read in the first place, "for the use and risk of each horse, except horses killed in battle, or dying of wounds received in battle;" and in the second place, "for the use and risk thereof, except such horses killed in battle, or dying of wounds received in battle;" which amendments were agreed to.

The fourth section was then amended by Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. WHITTLESEY, to read as follows:

SEC. 4. "And be it further enacted, That the volunteers or militia, who have been or who may be received into the service of the United States, to suppress Indian depredations in Florida, shall be entitled to all the benefits which are conferred on persons wounded or otherwise disabled in the service of the United States;" which amendments were agreed to.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON then added the following section to the bill; which was agreed to:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers and militia mentioned in the foregoing provisions of this act, called into service before its passage, and who are directed to be paid, shall embrace those only ordered into service by the commanding general, or the Governors of States and of the Territory of Florida, under authority from the War Department, for repressing the hostilities of the Florida Indians."

Mr. HAWES then offered the following amendment: "And be it further enacted, That the officers to be provided for in this act shall not exceed the number of officers attached to companies or regiments in the infantry service of the United States."

Messrs. R. M. JOHNSON, WHITE of Florida, and WHITTLESEY, objecting to this amendment,

Mr. HAWES then modified his amendment by the following proviso: "provided, it shall not be in violation of the laws of the States or Territories from which such troops may be called."

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON objected to the whole proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HAWES,] as he was confident that the authorities of the States and Territories, from which the troops would be drawn, would make provision for the number of officers to be sent, and that they would not send more than were actually required.

Mr. HAWES said his amendment provided that the officers were to be paid agreeably to the laws of the States and Territories from which they were drawn. He was for having more fighting men, and fewer officers.

Mr. WHITTLESEY did not believe that House to be the only place where patriotism was to be found. He believed the States and Territories would make ample provision to secure the United States from any danger of paying more officers than were necessary.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON hoped gentlemen would allow the question to be taken, as it was highly important that the bill should be passed with the least possible delay.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, hoped the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] would withdraw his amendment. He was satisfied that there would not be more officers than the laws of the States and Territories called for.

Mr. HAWES's amendment was then disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, the committee rose and reported the bill to the House.

The amendments were then concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed; subsequently, it was read a third time, and passed.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CONNOR in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill "for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in the city of New York."

The question pending being the motion of Mr. HARDIN to strike out the first proviso in the first section, which is in the following words:

"Provided, That those who are within the provision of this section, but who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded," as amended yesterday, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELEN, by the addition of the following words: "if not previously carried into the Treasury of the United States by warrant."

Mr. STORER then rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman: When on yesterday I asked the committee to rise, I felt that their patience had already been sufficiently taxed, as their sitting had been protracted to a late hour; and I was anxious, sir, that my observations, such as they were, should be heard at a more favorable period of the debate.

I was aware that the bill under discussion had been postponed when I conceived it might have been acted on, and did not expect that those who had the immediate charge of it would have pressed the question when the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDIN] had finished his remarks. I have thrown no obstacle in the way of this bill. I have always been willing and ready to sustain it. But, sir, it has been suffered to take its course; and, however much it may be regretted, it is impossible now to accelerate its passage. I can only say that the old maxim, "we must hasten slowly," is not now a paradox.

The object of this bill, briefly considered, is to aid the sufferers by the late conflagration, who were debtors to the Government for duties on the memorable 16th of December last. It embraces those whose bonds were not then due, and are not yet due; those whose bonds have since become due, and those who have subsequently to that time paid their bonds. There is another section, which extends for a shorter period the credit on all bonds taken at the custom-house, whether the obligors have sustained actual loss or not.

This classification of debtors has been objected to, and a distinction attempted to be drawn between their several claims to relief; but it is manifest that they are all included within the equity of the case, and are equally entitled to our consideration, though their several conditions may differ in degree. All are involved in the common calamity, either directly or remotely; the same common interest is to be protected; and it is our duty, in extending our aid to all, to know that all are benefited.

It is objected, sir, by several honorable gentlemen who have opposed this measure, that it is unjust, because it is partial legislation. It is confined, say they, to a particular section of the Union; and the ordinary operation of the laws is suspended—in fact, changed—as to a portion of the public debtors, while it exists in full force as to the residue. This reasoning is specious, but it is not sound; for, I would ask, what legislation that acts merely upon any one point, whether of the maritime or western border, but is liable to the same objection? The erection of a fort or a light-house, the improvement of a river, or the establishment of a road by law, is on the same principle but partial legislation. The immediate advantages which result from all these public works are felt by the contiguous community; and it is only when we look to results, and reflect upon remote consequences, that what may appear to be partial legislation is not only found to be general, but general, sir, in the most extended sense of the term. The defence of the seacoast, the safety of our shipping, are national objects, because the whole confederacy is vitally interested in the preservation of both; and a similar principle controls the policy of all great public improvements in the West.

It is urged, Mr. Chairman, that the principle of this bill ought not to be admitted, because the importer alone will enjoy the relief it affords; and a distinction is made, I fear an invidious one, between the various classes of which the city of New York is composed. Sir, it is not my disposition to separate the great interests which make up the population of a commercial city, nor is it my intention to create suspicion or excite unfounded jealousy; I feel that I should do injustice to the people who have so severely suffered, and I could not reconcile it to my own convictions of duty, if I believed that the merchant and mechanic were not connected by the common bond of mutual dependence; that they did not prosper as well as suffer together. I regard the benefit, if extended to one, as embracing the other; the pursuit is, indeed, not the same, but the interest is identical. Can it be said that the ship-owner and the importer may feel pecuniary pressure, and be subjected to all the fluctuations of trade, without affecting the artisan, whether his skill is employed in building a ship or erecting a storehouse? And if not in cases of mere ordinary occurrence, with what propriety do honorable gentlemen contend that none are relieved by the measure before us, but those who are specially named? Sir, I hold that the leading interests of every densely populated community, no matter whether directed to manufactures, agriculture, or commerce, can never be impaired, unless the shock is felt by the whole people; and it is in vain in our republic, where there can never be to any extent other distinctions than those produced by talent, enterprise, and skill, to assert such a principle as those who oppose this bill have done; and it is still more vain to attempt to sustain it by argument.

Who, I would ask, is the importing merchant? Need I describe a profession, the fruits of which are seen wherever civilization has extended? Need I refer to the refinements of life, the social comforts, the substantial every-day benefits, that are spread over our land by the continual communication we hold with every part of the globe? And, sir, to whose energy and enterprise are we indebted for all these results? Not to him who hoards his capital, and watches, with the eye of a lynx, the changes in the money markets; who lives upon the necessities of those who hazard their funds in honorable competition; not to the speculator in stocks, who is, to use the classical language of Wall-street, either "tossed by the bulls, or devoured by the bears;" who has lost all taste for the usual means by which property is acquired, and, in the excitement of legalized gambling, calculates, with desperate resolution, to become rich without labor; nor is it to the hackneyed politician, who has been driven from every political camp as a traitor, or left it as a deserter, and, when the troubled waters of party are agitated, rises to their surface, and scrambles for the spoils. No, sir, none of these have the spirit, the intellect, or the perseverance, to become established, high-minded, and successful merchants.

The importers, and I mean to include the mercantile interest generally, hazard their whole capital in their favorite pursuit. The equipment of their vessels, the purchase of their cargoes, the amount of funds necessarily deposited with foreign agents, the vast expense attending the prosecution of their business at home, require not only all their available funds, but, in a great majority of cases, they are compelled to employ their credit; and that, at last, is the only safe capital. It is the result of a long and well-earned reputation for integrity and capacity; and, as it is acquired by the severest struggles, it must be preserved at every sacrifice except that of principle. How vital is it, then, to the prosperity of commerce, that the upright and liberal-spirited merchant should be sustained?

The extent of the dreadful calamity which has desolated so fair a portion of New York has been already sufficiently detailed, and I will not trouble the committee with the repetition of its horrors. It is an event unprecedented in our own annals, and surpassed, perhaps, by none in the history of the world, when all its attendant circumstances are minutely considered. The effect of such a disaster cannot be felt at once, and even now they are not thoroughly understood. Every department of society received a shock, whose impression has pervaded the whole mass. Like the circle upon the surface of the once calm waters, it has extended itself until it is lost in distance.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] remarked that the man of business calculated the contingencies incident to his profession before he embarked in it; and if he should afterwards become unfortunate, he could not properly complain. Sir, I admit that the merchant, when he embarks his fortune in trade, is bound to regard the "common accidents" of life, and the usual course of the elements: against them he may provide, in some good measure, by insurance; but I would appeal to my honorable friend, and ask him if such a catastrophe as the New York fire could have been anticipated? whether, on any just prescience, of the future, so dreadful a calamity could have been foretold? Sir, the exception proves the rule.

The same honorable gentleman has compared the persons for whom this relief is intended to the planter of the South; and asks, if his cotton crop should be destroyed by the elements, whether he could claim from Congress to be indemnified? But the cases are not analogous. The planter is not the debtor of the Government. If a direct tax, however, was levied upon his plantation, and the means on which he relied to pay it were the proceeds of his cotton crop, and that was destroyed, then, like the New York importer, whose bond is held for imports upon merchandise which has been consumed while unsold in the package, or, if sold, destroyed while in the hands of the wholesale dealer, the planter would be entitled to relief against the collection of the tax altogether, or a delay of payment for a proper period.

Another argument used in opposition to the bill is, that the importer has undoubtedly sold the merchandise for which the duties are due to the country merchant; and, as the consumer pays the duty at last, the importer will be eventually indemnified: even further, it is intimated that, at this moment, a great part of the duty is probably realized. Sir, this reasoning proceeds upon an incorrect hypothesis. The importers of New York do not sell their merchandise to the country merchant; the whole amount of their importations, with but very few exceptions, is disposed of to the jobbers, or wholesale dealers, whose business is to sell again to the retailer. Now, these purchasers were residents of New York, and suffered in common with their vendors; and, so far from the duty being paid, the presumption is, the pressure consequent upon this misfortune has compelled the importer to extend a long credit to his debtor, to secure the safety of those very sales from which he expected to discharge his bonds at the custom-house.

It will be remembered that the anomaly is presented, in the history of this conflagration, that more than one half of the insurance companies who had risks upon the property consumed are utterly insolvent; and that, perhaps, a fraction more than 50 per cent. on the amount of their losses will be paid to the insured; while even this pittance may be delayed for a considerable period, to await the distribution of the underwriters' effects.

I approve of the credit proposed by this bill, on the ground that the amount of the bonds will be retained by the enterprising men who are so closely identified with the prosperity of New York—I might say the whole Union. It will, under their care, be diverted into every channel where industry and talent and public spirit could extend themselves; it will cheer up the subdued energies of the unfortunate, and open anew upon the adventurous the hope of future success. It will be safe in their hands, as they will have every motive to preserve unimpaired their credit. If paid, then large sums would lie on deposit in the banks, without interest, and liable to be used as those who control moneyed institutions might feel disposed to appropriate it. Sir, if the public revenue is to lie in these deposit banks, subject to be loaned out to those who are so fortunate as to become the borrowers, and a capital is to be employed for their benefit, for which they pay no equivalent, I am satisfied that the amount of the bonds in the New York custom-house (which are included in this bill) shall remain in the hands of the Government debtors, on good security.

The bill now before the committee is indeed imperfect; it does not, in my opinion, meet the exigencies of the case; as I should be willing that a provision be embodied, that, on all original packages destroyed in the hands of the importer, the duties should be released. But the relief is demanded now, such as it is; and I fear that any attempt to amend the bill will endanger its whole object. I am, therefore, disposed to take the measure as it is, and adopt it as the only one that can now avail.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] has opposed the bill on constitutional grounds. The argument he adduces is, that we have but a trust power confided to us, and we cannot legislate unless the authority is clearly given. I grant, for the present case, the argument—and what does it prove? If we are trustees, and the mode by which the trust is to be executed is defined in the power creating the trust, then our duty is clear: we must pursue the power strictly. But, sir, if the mode is not prescribed, then we must adopt the maxim of the common law, and it is a principle of equity also—"ut res magis valeat quam pereat."

We must preserve the trust, and, to do so, are bound to follow out its end and object—adapting the means to the end, with a due regard to the nature of the fiduciary relation we have assumed, and the purpose for which that relation was created.

If, then, Congress has the right to levy duties on imports, the power of releasing them necessarily exists; and if the power to substitute the credit system for cash payments is admitted, then the power to extend those credits clearly follows; and certainly it cannot be said that the power to preserve such credits, by taking new security, and allowing further indulgence, is not also included. Already the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, by law, in a certain class of cases, to release the bond altogether, where the obligor is clearly insolvent; to say nothing of the express power in the constitution to pass, if Congress shall see fit, a general bankrupt law. I do not admit the pecular views of the honorable gentleman on the constitutional question involved in this discussion, though I admire the boldness and talent with which he expressed them. Sir, when the great work of internal improvement, which is projected from Charleston to Cincinnati, shall have been completed, I hope he will look in upon our wide-spread valley; he will there find that the gallant people of his proud State will be greeted as friends and brothers, not merely as united by the bands of interest, but the still stronger ties of national feeling, springing up with the noblest impulse of our common nature, and chastened and elevated also by association. Yes, I hope the time is not far distant when the palmetto shall be transplanted to our own soil, and grow up side by side with the buckeye of our forests.

Should the extended credit on the custom-house bonds be proper, still it is denied that the duties already paid should be refunded. I conceive the claim to relief rests upon the same ground. I cannot distinguish between the merchant who has paid his bond punctually, in order to facilitate the importation or entry of other merchandise, and the importer who has permitted his bond to lie over. It is not denied but the obligors were induced to discharge their bonds, under the belief, and justly, too, that they would be entitled to the benefit of any subsequent law which might be passed for the general relief of the importers. To preserve their credit, then, and under circumstances they could not control, the money was advanced; shall it not be repaid, and the credit extended to them? I can find no reason to deny the privilege; but, on the contrary, every principle of equal and just legislation demands that they should be included in the bill.

The question of interest I do not regard as an argument against the bill. If the measure is one of relief, it should be actual relief; for, if interest was required, it would confer no benefit, but rather impose a burden. The merchant would be unwilling, for so long a period, to pay seven per centum for money, when it might be obtained for less; and, as no interest is ever taxed on bonds taken for duties, it would be a circumstance of no ordinary occurrence if the Government should become a money-lender.

It has been urged, in the course of the debate, that the legislation of Congress furnished no precedent for this bill; and those who support it have been called upon to produce a parallel case. It is true, sir, no similar case can be found, as the occasion which must have given it existence has never before occurred; but the principle has been settled by repeated legislative acts. If we examine the statute book, we shall discover, from the earliest history of our Government until the present day, that the ground upon which the relief is now asked for the New York sufferers has been recognised to its fullest extent. Permit me to detain the committee for a few moments, while I present an epitome of cases, selected as those most apposite.

An act was passed on the 7th of March, 1794, "to remit the duties on certain French vessels which had taken refuge in American ports, in consequence of the negro insurrection at Hispaniola."

June 7, 1794.—The distillery of a citizen of Vermont was burnt up, and the excise was remitted.

January 28, 1795.—The tonnage duties on foreign vessels again remitted, which conveyed French prisoners from Nova Scotia to Boston.

January 1, 1796.—The duties on the "capacity of stills" remitted, in consequence of the destruction of fruit, which prevented their employment. This bill was general in its terms, and included all who had taken out a license.

March 3, 1797.—The duties on snuff mills were remitted, when, by failure of water or other casualty, they could not be used.

March 3, 1797.—The duties on English vessels driven into Plymouth, Massachusetts, by stress of weather, were remitted.

February 19, 1803.—The importers who had suffered by the fire at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, were relieved by an extension of their bonds.

March 19, 1804.—Similar relief was extended to the merchants at Norfolk, Virginia.

March 3, 1817.—The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to release the distiller from the excise, when he was satisfied, by proper evidence, that the still had not been used; and he was further empowered to refund the duty, if paid.

May 26, 1824.—All distillers who had paid duties, according to the provisions of one of the excise laws, were released, and the duties refunded to them.

March 2, 1827.—The discriminating duties on all Hamburg ships, which had been paid between the 3d day of March, 1815, and the 1st of November in the same year, were remitted.

It will be recollected that, on the 3d day of March, 1815, an act was passed laying extraordinary duties upon the vessels of the Hanse Towns, to counteract similar imposts upon our vessels. By this act, the President was authorized to postpone the collection of those duties, whenever he should be officially advised they were not exacted from our merchants. On the 1st of November, 1815, Mr. Madison issued his proclamation, announcing that the city of Hamburg had repealed her regulations with respect to our commerce; and our own law, of course, ceased to operate: yet, in the interval, the Hanse merchants had paid duties into our Treasury; and, on the doctrine of honorable gentlemen who have debated this bill, the Government having received the money, Congress had no right to refund it.

March 2, 1831.—The duties imposed by the law of 1830 were remitted, though the merchandise was imported prior to December 31, 1830.

February 25, 1833.—The discriminating duties on coffee, cocoa, and tea, were all refunded.

The last two acts, sir, proceed upon the principle of equity, which regards that as done which ought to have been done; and if they had not been passed, the operation of the tariff laws would have been more unjust and unequal than their warmest opponents ever pronounced them to be.

On a review of these cases, I am persuaded that the principle of this bill is fully established and sustained. Every objection that has been urged to it might have been made to each and all of the laws I have referred to, I mean so far as the constitutional power of Congress to legislate is concerned; and if we regard the policy of those laws, when compared with the expediency of the measure before us, the argument against it is deprived of its whole strength. Sir, the relief proposed by this bill will be felt by all, even by those for whose losses the gentleman from Rhode Island proposed a gratuity. Upon the importing merchant, and the great mechanical interest with which he is so closely connected, every other portion of the population of New York, whether the professional man, the money-lender, the retailer, or the thousand "gentlemen of no particular calling," who are becoming a formidable class throughout our country, mainly depends. They open the channels of business, and lay broad and deep the foundation of public prosperity; their skill develops the resources of the great mass, and their energy carries them out into happy results. Let it not, then, be said that the merchant is only to be benefited; such a view of the case is not warranted by the principles of the bill, or the interests it is intended to protect.

Mr. Chairman, I regret to differ with many of my western friends on so important, so interesting a question as this; but I feel that every principle of duty requires me to give this bill my humble support. My opinions, sir, such as they are, as to the policy this Government should pursue in relation to the whole country, I have no disposition to disguise. As a western man, while I shall untiringly sustain the right, on the part of Congress, to improve our rivers, establish national roads, and protect our own industry, I cannot forget that I am, so far as one individual is concerned, legislating for the whole Union; and the same broad principle of justice which governs me in my construction of the constitution, as to the leading interests of this confederacy, admonishes me that I ought not to limit it to sectional boundaries. With my western friends I shall zealously unite to secure our just share of the surplus revenue, and to make the importance and the weight of our portion of the Union felt upon every proper occasion. I shall not be induced to support any measure by which the power, the interest, or the honor, of the West can be circumscribed, or even questioned; but I shall, nevertheless, sustain all proper appropriations for our naval and military establishments; not by a profuse expenditure of the public treasure, by which patronage may be extended, and important trusts abused, but by a safe, guarded, and well-digested scheme for the distribution of our revenue throughout every portion of our common country!"

The State I have the honor in part to represent, the people of my immediate district, more especially of that beautiful city whose merchants and mechanics are not surpassed in intelligence, skill, and industry, by any people on the globe; whose untiring energies have overcome, in the infancy of their institutions, what older and wealthier communities have not dared to attempt; they, sir, take a deep interest in the passage of this bill; and I should feel that I had disappointed their just expectations, did I not support it with all my zeal. The citizens of Ohio can never be unmindful of New York, while they remember her Clinton and her Fulton. Sir, when his own State had deprived De Witt Clinton of the last poor privilege of superintending those great public works which have immortalized his name, Ohio did not forget him. His presence was invoked at the commencement of her great canal, and he broke the first ground where there is now a continued water communication of more than three hundred miles. And, Mr. Chairman, if New York shall ever, in the bitterness of party, deny to her distinguished statesman the honor that is due to his memory, his name, through all time, will be remembered in the West. "O terram illam beatam quæ hunc virum exceperit hanc ingratham, si ejecerit miseram si amiserit!"

Before I close my remarks, I must be permitted to say that, if the success of any of those measures of public improvement which have been projected for the West had depended upon the support of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported this bill, those measures would never have been carried out. Even at the last session of Congress, I find his name recorded against an appropriation of $50,000 for clearing out the Ohio river; and, on the memorable last day of that session his vote was given against the bill to extend the Cumberland road. Such are the tender mercies of those—for some, at least, of those—for whose constituents I shall, nevertheless, insist, not for the purpose of exciting unpleasant recollections, nor yet for the other purpose of returning "evil with good," but because it is just and expedient that the relief proposed by this bill should be granted.

I have heard upon this floor injurious and unfounded insinuations upon the motives of western men in this House; and, sir, I have heard them repelled in a proper tone and spirit. I am satisfied such will always be the case, whenever and wherever it may be proper to cast back the reproach.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, that New York has supplied the West with her principal capital, and we have been reminded of the force of the obligation. True, sir, the stocks in our banks, railroads, canals, and our public lands, too, have been purchased by eastern speculators; not from any particular regard for the West, or the people of the West, but because the investment promised to be largely profitable. Results were more regarded than the idea of furnishing facilities for our industry and enterprise. Wherever similar advantages could be found, similar investments would be made; for, like the element to which it is so often compared, money must and always will find its level; it will break down every obstacle, and trace to its source every stream of business. But is it true that all this capital is owned in Wall street? Are not the agents of the Rothschilds, the Baring, and the Wilsons, not only the holders but the distributors of a large share; and do they calculate, in the discharge of their trust, any other contingencies than the safest mode to derive the best profit? I leave the solution of the question to the honorable gentleman who reminded us of our obligation.

Mr. Chairman, while I regard the city of New York, considered in her commercial character, as representing the whole Union, as the citizens of the whole Union compose her population and add to her resources; while I feel a pride in owning her as the London of America, and would trace all the beauty of outline in the scenery around her which could be appropriated to the bay of Naples and the famed city which rises from its bosom; while, sir, I see in her crowded streets and active population no token of decay, but rather the assurance of a great and glorious destiny, I cannot be unmindful of that higher duty, that stronger tie of feeling and affection, which binds me to the West. In that expanded and still expanding region, the spirit of the people—I mean the true American spirit—is alive in all its freshness and vigor, and, though separated by political divisions, and the collisions of interest, and every variety of pursuit, yet, on the momentous subject of what belongs to the character of freemen, they have but one opinion, and hold one common language. Like our rivers, sir, though they may burst forth from the mountain side, or spring up in the prairie, they unite at last in one common channel, and roll on in one glorious current to the same common ocean.

When Mr. STORER had concluded his remarks,

Mr. HUNT rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I am fully aware that favors may be delayed until all grace in conferring them must be lost; and I am equally aware that even a simple act of justice may come too late to effect its object. I am admonished of the truth of this sentiment by a letter now before me from New York, under date of the 15th instant—a letter from a source entitled to all credence, and not written with any view to this debate. In that letter, action, prompt and speedy action, is called for; and I am told that in case we do nothing, distress beyond description must be felt and many failures inevitably take place.

Thus admonished, sir, and feeling, as I do, deep solicitude in the speedy passage of the bill now before the committee, I shall not delay action by protracting the discussion beyond a few brief moments. Discussion on the part of the friends of this bill may well be spared, after the lucid, eloquent, and able appeals made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILLIPS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STORER.] The argument I could not strengthen, and most assuredly I should regret by any attempt of mine to weaken it.

My task is a very humble one: it is, in the first place, on behalf of my native State, to render my sincere thanks to those gentlemen for the spirit and manner in which they have rescued this bill from the reproach sought to be cast upon it; and, in the second place, to endeavor to obviate some of the objections, not particularly noticed by those gentlemen, urged by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] and the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE.]

Sir, it has afforded me unfeigned pleasure to listen to the manly defence here submitted of the characters of those more immediately interested in the provisions of this bill—the characters of our merchants—coming, as that defence has, from those connected with New York only by that silver cord of common nature which in the social state binds man to his fellow, but which cannot be loosed without breaking the golden bowl, the pitcher at the fountain, the wheel at the cistern, and resolving society back into its original elements.

Sir, to the character of the merchant I wish to add but one further witness—a witness ranking amongst the greatest men of this or any other age; and I adopt the testimony of Dr. Chalmers, given in immediate reference to the English merchant, as applicable in all its freshness, force, and truth, to my own countrymen. He says: “It might tempt one to be proud of his species when he looks at the faith that is put in him by a distant correspondent, who, without one other hold of him than his honor, consigns to him the wealth of a whole flotilla, and sleeps in the confidence that it is safe. It is, indeed, an animating thought, amid the gloom of this world’s depravity, when we behold the credit which one man puts in another, though separated by oceans and by continents; when he fixes the anchor of a sure and steady dependence on the reported honesty of one whom he never saw; when, with all his fears for the treachery of the varied elements through which his property has to pass, he knows that, should it only arrive at the door of its destined agent, all his fears and all his suspicions may be at an end. We know nothing finer than such an act of homage from one human being to another, when perhaps the diameter of the globe is between them; nor do we think that either the renown of her victories, or the wisdom of her councils, so signalizes the country in which we live, as does the honorable dealing of her merchants; that all the glories of British policy and British valor are far eclipsed by the moral splendor which British faith has thrown over the name and the character of our nation; nor has she gathered so proud a distinction from all the tributaries of her power, as she has done from the awarded confidence of those men, of all tribes, and colors, and languages, who look to our agency for the most faithful of all management, and to our keeping for the most inviolable of all custody.”

Such, Mr. Chairman, is the character of the class of men who are now asking you for legislation.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] supposes there are constitutional objections to this bill, arising under those sections of the constitution which provide that “all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States;” and again, that “no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another.” The answer to this objection has, in my apprehension, been abundantly furnished by the gentlemen who have preceded me. If the objection be well taken, every fortification and every light-house you have erected has been in violation of the constitution; and the practical construction given your constitution has, from the commencement of your Government, been wrong. But, sir, again: whatever may be considered as the true construction of the sections of the constitution above quoted, I submit that the bill under consideration is not obnoxious to the objection taken. The purport of its provisions is simply to regulate the debts due the Government. And strange indeed is the proposition denying to the Government, as a creditor, the power beneficially exercised (for the creditor) in dealing with the embarrassed debtor. The gentleman from South Carolina also stated that the English Government had uniformly refused to interfere in cases of this description; that no relief had there been granted since the great fire in London. Sir, it may well be that the honorable gentleman has met with no special act of English legislation on this subject since the period referred to by him; but sure I am that, upon reflection, he will perceive that in England, for many years past, no particular legislation has been needed; for, since her commercial law received its illustrations, its form and symmetry, from the adjudications of her Mansfield, this subject has been amply provided for by general acts. The systems of the two Governments are different. The English is the warehousing system; ours is the system of cash duties and bonds. Should the time ever arrive in this country when our political men can turn their attention from the evanescent party politics of the day to the great and abiding interests of the nation, it will not, I apprehend, be difficult to satisfy them that much may be learnt and advantageously copied from the English system. As early as the 43d of George III an act was passed providing that the Government and its officers should not be liable to the owners of goods destroyed by accident in the warehouse, and also providing for the remission of duties. The provisions of that act were somewhat extended by acts of 3d and 4th William IV. The doctrine of remission of duties was not a new one, introduced by the act of George III. That doctrine was familiar to the people; but the act had become necessary, for the purpose of settling a vexed question in the English courts of justice—a question whether, in case of loss of goods by any accident other than that termed the act of God, or the public enemies, the Government or its officers were not liable to the owner for their value, upon the legal principles of bailment.

Thus, sir, it will be seen that, in England, there is ample provision for cases like the one before the committee. Nay, the English acts cover vastly more ground than the bill before you. They provide for remission; this bill only provides for an extension of credit. It has been objected by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] that the proposed bill makes the collector the judge of the sufficiency of the sureties offered. Is this, sir, any new provision? Will it clothe the collector with any new power, which may be abused? He is now the judge in this matter. But, sir, pass this bill, and the Government will gain one important advantage—the right to claim new and undoubted sureties, in case the old sureties are not satisfactory to the collector. I will not enlarge upon this argument, but will submit that, in view of this wide-spread and desolating calamity, affecting materially all the relations of business; this feature of the bill is worthy of all commendation.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] has, also, with great industry and ability, collected and presented to us a variety of cases in which Congress has refused to interfere. Many of them, sir, may have been cases of great individual hardship. They certainly were presented by the gentleman, as were all his views and appeals, in a manner well calculated for effect. In reference to those cases, I will only remark that we know not their peculiar and attendant circumstances, nor the reasons influencing former Legislatures to refuse relief. But, on this subject of precedent, permit me to add to the list of cases presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STORER.] On the 14th of June, 1790, duties were remitted on goods of T. S. Jenkins & Co., of Hudson, New York, destroyed on their passage from New York to Hudson.

August 4, 1790.—Duties were remitted on salt of

Stewart & Davidson, of Annapolis, destroyed by flood the night after it was landed.

May 9, 1794.—Duties were remitted on coffee destroyed by fire at Baltimore.

June 7, 1794.—Duties were remitted on distilled spirits of Rogers, of Middlebury, Vermont, destroyed by fire.

January 15, 1798.—Similar relief granted to West & Usey, of Charleston, South Carolina, on sugars destroyed by fire.

March 3, 1801.—Similar relief granted to Halsy and others, on teas burnt at Providence.

February 19, 1803.—Extension of one year granted on the bonds of those who suffered by fire at Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

March 19, 1804.—Similar relief granted on bonds at Norfolk, Virginia.

February 10, 1807.—Similar relief granted on bonds at Portsmouth.

April 11, 1820.—Extension of four years granted on the bonds of those suffering by fire at Savannah, and who were not insured.

May 5, 1824.—An extension of four years on the bond of E. Van Syckle, of Philadelphia, having suffered by fire, and not insured.

This list of precedents might be almost indefinitely extended. But, sir, I trust they are sufficient to answer the argument of the gentleman drawn from precedents, and will at least prove that, if at times Government has refused to interfere, yet at other times, and in numerous cases, it has interfered to afford relief. And it is merely in this light I have cited the above cases; for, so far as concerns my own vote, I shall never be troubled for a precedent in a case where my conscience, directed by my best judgment, impels me to act.

It has been objected again, that there may be a class of sufferers in New York, equally meritorious with those included in this bill, and who are not provided for in it. This objection may be true to a certain extent; I say may be, for as yet the objection rests mainly upon conjecture. But, sir, if true in its whole extent, does it follow that, because we cannot in this bill relieve all, we shall relieve none? If there be another class of sufferers entitled, upon well-known principles of legislation, to relief, I shall most cheerfully go with the gentleman in affording that relief.

It has also been objected that, by passing this bill, you will establish a precedent authorizing Savannah and other cities to claim relief. To this objection I would say, that whenever Savannah, or any other place, shall present a case similar in principle to the present one, we shall be bound to act upon it; and I can never consent to withhold an act of justice, through fear of its pecuniary consequences.

A further objection has been drawn from the supposition that, at the expiration of the extended credit, the bonds may not be collectable, and the importer (who does not always give the bond) be made liable to the Government; basing this objection upon the decisions of our courts, which hold the importer liable, even when a bond has been given by the factor. Were this objection well taken, I should feel the necessity of inserting in the bill a new provision. But, sir, a moment's consideration must, I think, satisfy every legal gentleman that no provision of the kind is necessary. Sir, the legal effect of this act must, beyond all doubt, be to adopt the bondsmen as the true and only debtors of the Government; thus releasing the importer from all liability.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDIN] avows himself in favor of the provision in the revenue laws allowing the drawback on goods exported. That provision he considers a legitimate regulation of commerce. If the gentleman will but carry out his principle, he will find himself constrained, I apprehend, to support the present bill. Why, sir, is a drawback allowed? Simply because the goods have not gone into the hands of the consumer for home consumption. Then, in principle, how does this case differ? Have these goods gone into the hands of the consumer? Sir, this calamity presents the strange anomaly of a Government actually profiting by an event which has brought distress, if not ruin, upon thousands. In this way, enable your merchants to continue business, and your present bonds will be met, and new importations be made to supply the place made vacant by the fire, and upon which new importations Government will again receive its duties; thus receiving duties twice upon what has entered but once into the consumption of the country. But press the immediate payment of the outstanding bonds, and I ask the committee to reflect, with the evidence before gentlemen from private sources and from the Treasury Department, whether there be not great danger of driving men to extremities, of tasking them beyond their strength, and thus producing great individual suffering as well as national loss.

From the remarks I have made, the committee will have perceived that I place this bill before them not as appealing to the charity of the nation. No, sir; it comes to me, and so I wish to present it to the committee, commended by every consideration which should influence a wise and provident creditor in his dealings with the suffering, unfortunate debtor.

Mr. LANE said the bill under consideration was one he desired to sustain by his vote, and he had intended to give a silent one. The extraordinary resistance, however, made to it from a certain quarter, has rendered it a duty he owes to himself, and those whom he has the honor of representing, to detain the committee a few moments in giving some of the reasons which influenced that vote.

Sir, were the shipping merchants of the city of New York the only class of persons to be relieved by the provisions of the bill, his vote would be a different one. Twenty or twenty-five millions of mercantile capital has been annihilated by a fire that set all human exertions and human skill at defiance—a calamity as fearful and alarming as unlooked-for and extensive in its effects—not only an individual, but a national calamity, extending its effects to every portion of this extended country.

Sir, what is the effect of this loss to the immediate individuals concerned, the Treasury, the commerce of the country, and the people? The individual shipper has given his bond for the duty; the goods are destroyed; to him it is a clear loss; he must either fold his arms and yield his business in despair, or ship a like quantity to supply the place of those consumed. Upon these he pays the duty; it passes into the Treasury; the individual loses; the Government receives double duty, and is the only gainer.

The bill asks not to remit the duty, but to extend the payments. This is said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] to be unjust and partial in its operation—that the cotton planter might with the same propriety, if his crop should be blasted by an early frost, call upon Congress for relief. The case has no analogy; the planter owes the Government nothing for his crop; the Government has no control over it. Not so with the goods: the custom-house officer takes possession of the goods—puts his seal upon them until bonded. But, sir, suppose the cotton planter a tenant, and his entire crop destroyed by the fury of the elements, what would be said of the landlord who would refuse time for the payment of rent, or to relinquish the whole or a part.

In order to show how it affects the commerce of the country, it is proper to notice the usual course of trade. The New York merchant ships the goods, and has given bond for the duty. The goods are sold to a western merchant, who retails them to the people. Upon what terms are they sold and retailed? The western merchant buys at 2, 6, or 9 months, and retails them to the people, his customers, at 12 months credit. It is the policy and interest of the western merchant to keep his New York debt as large as possible, money being worth more in the West than in the East. The possession of it enables him to purchase the produce of the country. They desire no relief, but the usual and ordinary indulgence. Press the New York merchant; he urges payment earlier and more earnestly from the western retailer; he presses his customer, and the entire distress eventually falls upon the people of every class and condition in life. In proportion as you relieve the New York merchant from this calamity, you relieve the whole people--the whole nation--by a continuance of the usual credit, commerce, and confidence. Hence, sir, inasmuch as in voting for the relief in the bill we shall relieve the humblest citizen in his district, he should accord his support.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD spoke in opposition to the bill, at considerable length.

Mr. C. JOHNSON said that he was desirous of saying a few words on the amendment to the bill now under consideration, before the final action of the committee upon it; that his opinions upon such a subject as this could not be influenced in the least by any consideration of a political or party character, and he could not believe that those of any member of the committee would be, notwithstanding the allusions to such subjects so often made in the debate; that he would extend to the citizens of New York the same relief, and no more, that he would be willing to allow to any other city in the Union visited by such calamity.

The questions which presented themselves to the consideration of the committee upon this bill were similar, in all respects, to others which had been often before Congress--he might indeed say, almost every Congress from the origin of the Government; that the action of Congress upon this class of cases was as well settled and more closely adhered to than upon any other he had examined; and if the determinations of Congress were in any case to form a rule for its future action, the relief to which the present applicants were entitled under the usages of the Government, and which they ought to expect, should be considered as such. For more than thirty years, similar relief had been extended to all such applicants; and he believed that there was not a single case in which it had been refused; that his object in addressing the committee at this late hour was to give a concise view of the course heretofore adopted upon such applications; he believed it was liberal and just, and should be allowed to the present applicants; and that the amendment which he had the honor of submitting to their consideration was intended to bestow the same relief that had been heretofore given under similar circumstances, and he trusted would be adopted by the committee in lieu of the first section of the bill.

Merchandise imported into the United States, upon which the duties to the Government had been paid or secured to be paid, was often destroyed by fire, floods, or some unavoidable accident, whilst in the original packages, and of course before it entered into the consumption of the country; and had often heretofore and would hereafter produce applications to Congress for relief of some sort. Prior to the year 1802, it was the constant practice of Congress to remit the duties. He had found, in the course of his examination, but a solitary case in which that relief had been refused; he alluded to the case of Deveraux and others, which had been rejected by a committee on the 11th of January, 1796. There were a number of cases, from the year 1790 to 1802, in which the duties had been remitted, but which he need not delay the time of the committee in reciting. The last of the cases had been often brought to the notice of the committee, as a precedent affording even more relief than provided in this bill. The custom-house in Providence was burnt in the latter part of the year 1800, and a large quantity of teas destroyed; the act of the 23d of February, 1801, remitted the duties--a very strong case for the interposition of Congress; and the committee who reported the bill, as if conscious that Congress had gone too far upon such subjects, was careful in placing the relief upon the ground that the goods were destroyed whilst under "the care of the custom-house officers." Relief had been often given before that time to applicants whose goods had been removed from the custom-house, and, in some cases, after a re-shipment of the goods for other ports.

In the latter part of the same year, a number of applications, similar in character, were made to Congress, which produced the adoption of a resolution of inquiry, as to the propriety of making some general law upon the subject, whereby such cases might be settled at the Treasury Department, without any application to Congress. Mr. Randolph was then at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, to which that subject was referred; and on the 2d of April, 1802, made a report against the adoption of the resolution, denying the propriety of remitting duties in any such cases. Congress had, prior to that time, acted upon the principles so forcibly and eloquently urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] who addressed the committee the other day. The report of the committee, which he then had before him, and which he would not trouble the committee by reading, did not enter at large upon an enumeration of those principles, or the causes which induced the committee to change the course upon which Congress had before that time acted. It appeared from the report, however, as it would appear to the committee upon a slight examination, that the safety of the public moneys in the Treasury required that more restrictions as well as a more rigid examination of such claims should be made before their allowance, than had been practised by the Government. To permit a return of the duties to be made, or a remission to take place, upon every casualty and at any time, whilst the goods remained in the original packages, or whilst the owner had the right of debenture, seemed to him to open the door for the commission of innumerable frauds upon the Treasury; to prevent which, he did not see any means that the Government could adopt.

If the importing merchant was entitled to a remission of duties upon goods accidentally destroyed whilst in the original packages, upon the same principles and upon the same reasons the merchant in the interior, whose goods should be lost in the original packages by any accident, would have a right to call upon the Government to pay to him the amount of duties which he had paid the importer, and which had been paid by the importer to the Government. And the same principle might, with equal propriety, be applied to the consumer, who purchases the goods which are destroyed before used by him. In our system of indirect taxation, it is no doubt the intention and expectation of the Government that the consumer of the goods imported shall pay the duties, and not the merchant, and it is therefore argued, with great force, that any accident which destroys the goods before they enter into the consumption of the country should induce Congress to remit the duties to the merchant; otherwise the merchant not only loses the goods destroyed, but pays the whole tax; but, however forcible this may appear, it is necessary for Congress to fix upon some time when duties shall be considered as due, or when the goods shall be considered to have entered into the consumption of the country. We cannot delay the collection of the duties until the goods actually enter into the consumption of the country. We cannot delay until the importing merchant sells, or go into such examinations. Since 1802, the rule seems to have been to exact the duties in all cases after the entry at the custom-house, and bonds given according to law; after that time there is no remission; the duties become a part of the value of the goods, and it is the duty of the merchant to insure; the omission to do so on his part is to be esteemed an act of negligence, for which the Government ought not and cannot be made responsible.

This seems to have been the principle upon which the committee acted in 1802. At the next session of Congress, another application was made to Congress, well calculated to test the sense of that body upon the correctness of the principle, and the propriety of the report. The custom-house at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, was burnt, and a large quantity of merchandise consumed in it. Application was made to Congress for relief; he presumed for a remission of duties. Mr. Randolph continued at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means; and instead of remitting the duties, as had been the practice of the Government, and as had been done two years before, in behalf of the merchants of Providence, in a precisely parallel case, he introduced and had passed the act of the 14th of February, 1803, allowing to the sufferers by fire one year's indulgence upon their bonds. No other relief was given, although the goods had been burnt in the custom-house, "under the care of the custom-house officers." Similar relief was extended to the sufferers by fire at Norfolk, by the act of 19th March, 1804; and by the act of the 10th February, 1807, a second time to the merchants of Portsmouth. The provisions of the preceding acts extended relief to the debtors of the Government whose "property" had been destroyed by fire, without any other limitation or restriction.

By the act of the 11th of April, 1820, similar relief was extended to the sufferers by the fire at Savannah; and by the act of 5th May, 1824, to Elijah Vansycle, of Philadelphia; extending the time in each case, for the payment of the bonds, to four years. Upon comparing these acts with the former, it will be perceived that two restrictions are added to the latter, which, in his opinion, were necessary for the equal and just operation of the act among the sufferers: first, that the relief should be limited to those whose merchandise had been destroyed by fire; and, in the second place, to that class of them who had not obtained insurance. It was at that time apparent, and in his opinion not the less so now, that the importing merchant, who had his goods insured, upon their destruction, would receive from the insurance offices the value of the goods, which, of course, included the duty; and that he was not the sufferer. In such cases there was not the slightest ground whatever for an application to Congress either to remit the duties, or extend the time of payment on the bonds. If relief in such a case was to be given, it should be to the insurance company, not the importing merchant; and he presumed we should never have the insurance companies asking us for relief.

The other restriction in the act of 1820 was also proper, and should be introduced in this bill: that the time of payment should be extended on the bonds only which had been given for merchandise destroyed by fire. The only ground of relief, either for prolonging the time of payment or remitting the duties, was that the merchandise upon which the duties had accrued had been destroyed. He did not believe that misfortunes overtaking the debtors of the Government, of whatever character they might be, ever constituted or ought to be made in themselves a ground of relief: such as the burning of the house of a debtor, or the destruction of his plantation by flood or earthquake, or the loss of his annual crop by drought, or any other such causes. If any kind of relief was to be allowed in such cases, there would be no end to the applications to this House, nor could any calculations be made of the ability of the Treasury to meet any exigency whatever. This constituted in his mind a serious objection to the first section of the bill, that gave relief to all persons "who had suffered a loss of property" by "burning of their buildings or merchandise," embracing that class of sufferers whose "buildings and merchandise" have been insured against fire, and who may have received the full value of their property from the insurance offices. This class ought not to be ranked among the sufferers by fire, and given the relief provided in the first section of this bill. Again: that portion of the importing merchants whose merchandise had been sold and entered into the consumption of the country, and who had of course actually received the amount of duties from the consumer, would be entitled to relief under the first section of this bill, if they had only a house burnt, however large the debt might be to the United States.

Mr. J. said that he could not see the propriety of any legislation whatever for persons thus situated. Congress had, upon more occasions than one, refused relief to public officers whose houses had been burnt, and the public money collected by them lost in the conflagration. It also refused relief to officers robbed of the public money in their possession, because of the danger that would arise to the Treasury if such a precedent was established. Such a principle incorporated in our laws might operate more to the prejudice of the public Treasury than extending relief to claimants of the latter character. Giving time for the payment of bonds due to the United States was originally allowed, because of the great hardship imposed upon the merchant of having the duties to pay upon the merchandise destroyed by fire, upon which they had accrued. They had not entered into the consumption of the country, and of course the merchant paid the whole tax, in addition to the loss of his property, whilst, in most cases, other merchandise would be imported into the country to supply the place of the quantity consumed, and the Government would thus, a second time, receive the duties. He was for limiting the operation of the first section of the bill to the debtors whose merchandise, upon which the duties accrued, has been burnt, and who were without indemnity—leaving those whose "houses" or other "property" had been burnt, to seek relief, with the other debtors of the Government, under the provisions of the second section of the bill. He was for substituting the credit of three, four, and five years' indulgence, in the place of a remission of duties. It had been said that the insurance offices in New York had been involved in the common ruin; and that those who had insurance would be but partially relieved, if the same restriction was inserted in this bill as had been done in the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in Savannah. This might be the case to a considerable extent. He understood, however, that it was not uncommon for the merchants of the city of New York to have insurance effected in other cities; and such of them as had been indemnified by their insurances ought to be excluded from the relief given in the first section of this bill. They had in fact received the duties due the Government from the insurance companies, and should be compelled to pay it over. He had, however, in consequence of the suggestion, somewhat changed the phraseology of the act of 1820, in the amendment which he had submitted to the committee, so as to extend the relief to those "not indemnified by insurance" and to those whose merchandise had been consumed, upon which the duties had accrued; intending, as far as practicable, to proportion the relief to the loss sustained by the merchant.

The remission of duties seems to have been wholly given up; he did not believe there was a solitary case since 1802. But those most interested on such subjects seemed very reluctant to yield to the decisions of Congress. In 1825 a fire occurred in Boston: Bangs and others, Seawall, Jones, & Co., asked a remission of duties on the merchandises destroyed in the original packages. A bill was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, giving the relief asked, and was finally acted upon by the House in the spring of 1830, when he had for the first time the honor of a seat upon this floor; he recollected the debate; it was ably and eloquently resisted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means at that time, [Mr McDuffie,] as well as by the present chairman of that committee; and he did not believe that the bill had received forty votes in this House.

Mr. J. said it was unnecessary at this time further to examine the correctness of the principles upon which Congress had heretofore acted, in refusing to remit duties—that question would be more properly the subject of discussion when some of the bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means during the present session should be before the House. He trusted that the committee was satisfied, from the remarks he had made, that prolonging the time of payment had been substituted by Congress in lieu of the remission of duties, and that if the House adopted the present bill, or his amendment, it would be so considered. He acknowledged, he said, that he did not see the principle or the reasons upon which some members of the committee acted, who avowed themselves willing to remit the duties, but were unwilling to allow the extension of the time of payment. It was a case, in their estimation, so hard upon the applicants, that they would forgive the debt, but could not allow a credit of three, four, and five years. He thought, if the debts ought to be forgiven, that would be of itself the strongest reason for protracting the payment, so as to enable the debtors to present their case to Congress, and get the final action of that body, before the payment of the money. The Government needs not the money—the surplus on hand cannot be disposed of. If we collected the money, it would remain in the deposit banks without interest, and would not probably be touched by the Government until after the proposed time of payment; it seemed probable, indeed, that it would increase rather than diminish until after the period; and, for his part, he would as soon have the money in the hands of the debtor, well secured, as in the banks; and if, by that means, the dreadful calamity which had befallen the city could be mitigated, he for one would cheerfully allow it.

Mr. J. said that he had another objection to the first section of the bill: it authorized the time to be extended, with the assent of the securities on the old bonds, or new bonds to be taken, and the old ones to be cancelled; that he apprehended it would not be safe to impose upon the collector at New York the responsibility of taking new bonds, and new security, for so large a sum of money; that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the collector to ascertain what influence this great calamity would have upon the fortunes of the various individuals who would be presented to him, as principals or sureties in the obligations to the Government. With the utmost care and caution on the part of the collector, good bonds might be surrendered for new ones, with doubtful or insufficient security taken. He thought, if such an indulgence was extended to the debtors of the Government, Congress should retain all the security they now have, and in every doubtful case make it the duty of the collector to require other and further security before the indulgence should be allowed.

Mr. J. said that he had proposed the amendment, to avoid what seemed to him exceptions to the first section of this bill. By it the same relief would be given to New York that had been extended to Savannah by the act of 1820, and in very nearly the same language; he thought it more appropriate and more just than the relief given by the preceding acts. He would have preferred the bill without the second section, which allowed six, nine, and twelve months to all the debtors at New York. It was a dangerous precedent to set; there would be no end to applications for postponement, if allowed for any cause; and it could only be excused on account of the unparalleled calamity which had befallen the city. If the Government coerced the payment of the bonds at New York, amounting to near four millions of dollars, upon the heels of such a calamity, a pressure might be produced in the money market that might lose us half the money; by allowing to our debtors whose merchandise was destroyed in the fire, which he understood was near one million of dollars, three, four, and five years to pay it, and to our other debtors at the city, six, nine, and twelve months, every opportunity would be afforded to them to recover from the effects of that distressing calamity, and prepare themselves to meet the payments due the United States at the respective periods allowed them.

Mr. J. thought it was the duty of Congress as well as the interest of the Treasury to give relief to the present applicants in some shape. He thought the relief in the amendment, which he had submitted to the committee, preferable to that given by the bill; but if the amendment did not meet the approbation of the committee, he should probably feel it his duty to sustain the bill in its present shape.

It was a relief which every liberal, generous creditor would allow his debtor under such an afflicting calamity. It was a relief which they had a right to expect at our hands, having before given such relief upon every application for more than thirty years. It was a relief which our interest as creditor required us to give, to avoid any losses which might result from a pressure. The United States had been liberal, generous, to the sufferers at Caraccas, and by his vote should not be less liberal to our own citizens at New York, who had suffered by the late dreadful conflagration.

Mr. REED advocated the bill. He said it was apparent that the New York fire had been an advantage to the Government, because it would receive the duties twice over on the same amount of goods, viz: on those destroyed, and on those imported to supply the loss.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied briefly to the opposers of the bill, and referred to sundry acts heretofore passed on the same subject, and for the postponement of time and relinquishment of interest in purchase of the poor land of the West. Mr. C. assured the House that if the bill were not adopted, the Government would lose three times the amount of the interest proposed to be relinquished.

Mr. WISE begged to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] if the proviso, as amended yesterday, was meant to say or to assert that the money, in the hands of the collector or receiver, was not in the Treasury of the United States already?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, that he did not so consider it.

Mr. WISE said that was the point he wished the country to understand. He maintained that the money was in the public Treasury as soon as it was paid. If not, there was no security for the public money, as the individual might either "fitch" from it, or use it for party purposes. If the public money, the moment it was received, was considered as in the Treasury, then, under the constitution, not a cent of it could be appropriated without law. But, by the converse doctrine, it might be used for all sorts of party purposes, corruption, and patronage, and portions of it eke out at every step in transitu.

Mr. CAMBRELENG should be very happy to unite with the gentleman whenever a measure should be brought to regulate the periods at which the receivers of the public lands, and the collectors of customs, should make their returns to the Treasury. At present it was either law or usage; and, so long as the public money remained in the hands of the receivers of the public lands and collectors of the customs, so long was it liable to the correction of errors.

Mr. WISE and Mr. LANE made a few additional remarks; when

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, moved that the committee rise: negatived, without a count.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. HARDIN to strike out the proviso, as amended, to the first section, and it was decided in the negative: Ayes 59, noes 100.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then moved that the committee rise: negatived.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the committee would indulge him with the motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, when it could be amended in the House.

Objection being made, and the question recurring upon the amendments of Mr. EVERETT, Mr. E. withdrew them.

Mr. C. JOHNSON then moved the following amendment to the first section:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interest of the United States, to cause to be extended the time of payment on all bonds heretofore given for duties on imported merchandise at the custom-house in the city of New York, and which was consumed in the late conflagration at New York by fire, and the owners of which had not been indemnified by insurance, to three, four, and five years, in equal payments: Provided, always, That in all cases where, in the opinion of the collector at New York, said debts, or any of them, be rendered insecure by such indulgence, that further and additional surety be required before the indulgence be allowed: And provided, also, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the 16th of December last: And provided, also, That the assent of the sureties on all said bonds so extended be first had and endorsed on said bonds, respectively."

Mr. HOWELL moved the committee rise; negatived: Ayes 58, noes not counted.

The amendment was then negatived: Ayes 60, noes not counted.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, then moved an amendment, allowing fifteen per cent. out of the public Treasury, upon the actual loss; which was negatived, without a count.

Mr. HARDIN gave notice that in the House he should renew some of the amendments withdrawn by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GARLAND moved a further proviso, to confine the operations of the bill to citizens and residents in New York; which was rejected.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

The committee then rose; and the bill, as amended, being reported to the House, was, on motion of Mr. C., made the special order for to-morrow: Ayes 86, noes 39.

The House then, at a quarter after five o'clock, adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. VINTON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill amendatory of the act for the continuation of the Cumberland road; which was read twice.

Mr. V. said that the bill proposed no appropriation. It had reference exclusively to a change in the location of the road in the State of Ohio. It was not necessary, therefore, that the bill should be committed. It was important, both to those who opposed and advocated it, that it should be speedily determined, so that the work upon the road might progress. Those who intended to object to the passage of the bill had no objection that it be ordered to a third reading, and they contemplated opposing it on its passage. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would be ordered to be engrossed, and that its further consideration be postponed until the second Tuesday in March.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, was opposed to the bill, but had no objection to dispose of it at present as proposed by his colleague, [Mr. VINTON.] The people who were interested in opposition to the proposed change in the route of the road were now moving, and their remonstrance would be sent in at an early day. Some time, however, was necessary, to afford them an opportunity of being heard on the subject. The day to which his colleague had proposed to postpone the bill would give the desired time, and he had no objection, under the circumstances, that the bill should be ordered to be engrossed. An important report of Lieutenant Canfield, accompanied by a plat, on this subject, was ordered to be printed some six weeks since. He was sorry that this printing had not been executed; and, without intending to cast any censure upon the printer, he was in hopes that the report to which he referred would be laid on their tables before the bill was finally acted on, as it would facilitate and lead to a correct decision of the subject.

Mr. MERCER said a few words, which (as usual, from his manner of speaking) were not distinctly understood by the reporter. He was supposed to be opposed to the bill.

Mr. DUNLAP was opposed to giving precedence to this bill over other matters of more importance to other sections of the Union.

Mr. WARDWELL could see no reason why this bill should have priority over other bills. He therefore moved to commit it to a Committee of the Whole House, and make it the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. VINTON said that, by ordering the bill to be engrossed, no person's rights were compromised, and he thought it strange that objection should be made from a quarter not interested, when those who were opposed to the bill did not oppose the course which he had proposed.

Mr. JUDSON was in favor of the commitment of the bill. Its merits should be discussed in committee. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio he considered premature and improper.

Mr. CRANE opposed the commitment. Nothing could be gained by such a course.

Mr. WARDWELL adverted to the history of the controversy in relation to the proposed change in the location of the Cumberland road, and contended that it was an ordinary proposition, and not entitled to any precedence or extraordinary consideration, at the expense of other measures before the House. It was likely, however, to create a great deal of debate, and he desired that it should take the usual course.

Mr. VINTON again urged the adoption of his motion, and opposed the one to commit.

The motion to commit was then negatived: Yeas 46, nays not counted.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

[H. OF R.]

The motion of Mr. VINTON was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time on the 2d Tuesday in March next.

The House then proceeded to the special order of the day, being the bill for the RELIEF OF THE SUFFERERS BY THE FIRE IN NEW YORK.

The bill, as reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, is as follows; the words printed in italics being the only amendment adopted by the committee:

A BILL for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interests of the United States, to cause, to be extended, with the assent of the sureties thereon, to all persons who have suffered loss of property by the conflagration at that place, on the sixteenth day of December last, by the burning of their buildings or merchandise, the time of payment of all bonds heretofore given by them for duties, to periods not exceeding three, four, and five years, in equal instalments, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds; or to allow the said bonds to be cancelled, upon giving to the said collector new bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the said collector, for the sums of the former bonds, respectively, payable, in equal instalments, in three, four, and five years, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds to be taken up or cancelled as aforesaid; and the said collector is hereby authorized and directed to give up or cancel all such bonds, upon the receipt of others described in this section; which last-mentioned bonds shall be proceeded with, in all respects, like other bonds which are taken by collectors for duties due to the United States, and shall have the same force and validity: Provided, That those who are within the provision of this section, but who may have paid the bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section; and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded, if not previously carried into the treasury of the United States by warrant. And provided, also, That the benefits of this section shall not be extended to any person whose loss shall not be proved, to the satisfaction of the collector, to have exceeded the sum of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the collector of the port of New York is hereby authorized and directed to extend the payment, in the manner prescribed in the first section of this act, of all other bonds given for duties at the port of New York prior to the late fire, and not provided for in the first section as aforesaid, for six, nine, and twelve months, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds. Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the seventeenth day of December last.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House concur in the amendment of the committee; and on this question

Mr. HOWELL asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered: Ayes 23, noes 117—not one fifth.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend the amendment by striking out the whole after the word "previously," and inserting in its place the following words: "if not previously paid into bank, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had no objection to that amendment, and it was then agreed to by the House.

The question then recurring on the amendment, as amended,

Mr. EVERETT inquired if it would not defeat the object of the section?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that it would not.

Mr. PARKER desired to know how the amount in bank, or in the hands of collectors, could be ascertained or discriminated? He thought the amended amendment was making a distinction without a difference; for he held that the moment a collector had money in his hands it was the property of the Government, and held by him in trust.

Mr. CAMBRELENG thought, himself, the amendment was of very little importance, for the provision of the first section was just as good without it as with it. Other gentlemen thought differently, and he interposed no objection; but he was indifferent whether it was concurred in or not.

Mr. ROBERTSON made a brief explanation. He said his object was to defeat the whole provision as it stood.

Mr. EVERETT thought it would defeat the provision altogether, and he should therefore vote against it.

Mr. McKAY said the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia was substantially the same as the proviso of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] He was opposed to the notion that the public money is in the Treasury as soon as paid to the collector; for, if so, that would make the Treasurer of the United States liable for all loss, error, or deficiency. It was not in the Treasury till it was deposited.

Mr. WISE was certain his friend from North Carolina [Mr. McKAY] was incorrect, or that provision of the constitution Mr. W. had before quoted, viz: that no money should be taken from the Treasury without the appropriation by law, was a nullity. He maintained that the Treasury was a unity, without any space between the first receipt and the deposit, and between the Treasurer and the disbursing officer. The public money was not paid to the collector as an individual, but, being due to the United States, was paid to one of its own officers. He expressed his surprise that the gentleman from North Carolina, for whose opinion on such subjects Mr. W. entertained a high respect, should have advanced such a construction as he had. The collector, receiver, treasurer, disbursing, &c., were all officers of the Treasury, acting as checks on each other, accountable from the one to the other, and each could be sued on their bond. If this was not so, the constitution could be set aside; for if there was a point of time when the public money was not in the Treasury, then could it be appropriated without law during that intermission.

Mr. LANE understood the Treasury to be at bottom an ideal thing, and he held the receivers and deposit banks to be the agents of the Treasury. The receivers were no longer liable than for the time the money was actually in their hands; and so with the deposit banks. He held the money to be in the Treasury whenever it was received by one of its agents.

Mr. VANDERPOEL dissented entirely from the doctrine of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] If that doctrine was sound, the moment the money was in the hands of the collector, it was in the hands of the Treasurer, and he was responsible.

Mr. WISE did not say so. He said the money was then in the Treasury, and the Treasury officer was that instant responsible for it, as was the Treasurer, when it came under his control.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said the gentleman's doctrine still involved an incongruity, because he would make the money to be in the possession of a Department, and yet the chief officer of that Department in no way responsible. Mr. V. held that, after the money was once in the Treasury, neither the Treasurer, the Secretary, nor the President, had any power to appropriate or disburse it, except by virtue of appropriations by law. If the money, as soon as received, was to be regarded in the Treasury, the Treasurer ought to be held accountable for it. But this doctrine Mr. V. wholly dissented from.

Mr. ROBERTSON offered a verbal amendment, which he thought would remove the difficulty. He was informed that the bank entry of the public money was to the credit of the United States; and, to obviate any inconvenience, he proposed to insert, after the words "to the credit," "of the United States, or of the Treasurer of the United States." There seemed to be some difficulty in ascertaining where lay the Treasury of the United States. This was a matter which he believed the public had known very little about for the last two years, and was a question he should like to hear answered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG could not consent to this amendment; it was in opposition to a vote of the House on yesterday, of 159, and would nullify the proviso altogether.

Mr. GIDEON LEE, of New York, rose to ask the question, Would that House extend the relief asked by all the bond-payers to that class only who had availed themselves of the indulgence granted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and have suffered their bonds to lie over due these two months, and deny the same relief to that other class who, from a sensitiveness of their credit, from their high sense of honor, perhaps, could not consent to lie under the appearance of default, and have promptly paid their bonds?

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] declared that his amendment intended to have this effect. All who have paid promptly were cut off from relief totally, while all those who had failed or refused to pay came in for the full benefit of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON's last amendment was then disagreed to, and the original amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HARDIN proposed to amend the first section by inserting in the sixteenth line, after the word "payable," "with interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum," and asked for the yeas and nays upon the question; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said there was no instance since the adoption of the constitution, where interest had been charged under similar circumstances; and he did therefore hope the amendment would be rejected.

Mr. HARDIN hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. TOUCEY said this money would be safer than if now exacted, or attempted to be exacted; and he should vote against the charge of interest, because he was well aware that, if the money were at once collected, it would lie in the Treasury without interest.

Mr. JENIFER was in favor of the amendment, and opposed to many parts of the bill, against which, in consequence, he should be compelled to vote.

The question was then taken on Mr. HARDIN's amendment; which was disagreed to: Yeas 84, nays 117.

Mr. HARDIN then proposed a similar amendment to the second section of the bill, for the payment of interest at five per cent. on the bonds therein provided for, and also called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BROWN said he had voted for the amendment which had just been rejected, with a view, if the motion to impose interest prevailed, to move to reduce it to four per cent. per annum, which he supposed to be sufficient. Although the second section embraced a class of debtors many of whom were not actual sufferers, and extended the time for the payment of their bonds six, nine, and twelve months only, he would still insist that, if interest was charged, it should not exceed four per cent. He would therefore move to amend the motion of the honorable gentlemen from Kentucky, by striking out five and inserting four per cent.

The question was then taken on Mr. HARDIN's amendment, and the result was: Yeas 101, nays 96.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then renewed the amendment offered by him in Committee of the Whole, to strike out all the first section before the word "provided," in the twenty-fifth line, and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury, be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interest of the United States, to cause to be extended the time of payment on all bonds heretofore given for duties on imported merchandise at the custom-house in the city of New York, and which was consumed in the late conflagration at New York by fire, and the owners of which had not been indemnified by insurance, to three, four, and five years, in equal payments: Provided, always, That in all cases where, in the opinion of the collector at New York, said debts, or any of them, be rendered insecure by such indulgence, that further and additional surety be required before the indulgence be allowed: And provided, also, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the 17th of December last: And provided, also, That the assent of the sureties on all said bonds so extended be the first had, and endorsed on said bonds, respectively."

Mr. J. briefly explained the object of his amendment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG referred to the acts of 1803, 1804, and 1807, and said that in those acts no discrimination of property would be found.

Mr. C. JOHNSON asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered, and the amendment was disagreed to: Yeas 66, nays 115.

Mr. EVERETT then proposed to amend the first section, by striking out, wherever they occurred, the words "three, four, and five" years; and insert "one, two, and three" years; and asked for the yeas and nays on his amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG referred to the case of Savannah, where credit had been extended to four years on the whole amount of bonds. This bill had extended it less than at any former period.

Mr. HARDIN said all the cases he had examined never went further than one year, as in Portsmouth and Norfolk. It was now admitted that those who had insured would be fully indemnified.

Mr. CAMBRELENG made a brief statement, showing that, by the operation of the former acts, under the old system of credits, the credit extended to the whole amount of bonds for four years.

Mr. LEE, of New York, hoped the House would not suffer itself to be guided entirely by precedent in a case which was entirely without a parallel.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected: Yeas 96, nays 111.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, then moved that the House adjourn; negatived.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved an amendment to the first section of the bill, so as to restrict its provisions to citizens of the United States, and foreigners only residing in the city of New York; and explained in a few words the object he had in view.

Mr. GIDEON LEE hoped the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana would not prevail: First, because the amount to be excluded from the proposed relief would be very small; and, second, because it would raise interminable difficulties in the settlement of the complicated questions which would arise; and, finally, because I would not make this very in-vidious distinction. I am not thus inimical to foreigners.

Mr. McKEON remarked that he hoped this amendment would not prevail. He was opposed to have such a proposition adopted by the representatives of a liberal and commercial people, who had their merchants in every foreign country on the globe.

Mr. GARLAND asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the House adjourn; negatived: Ayes 78, noes 98.

The amendment was then rejected.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, renewed the amendment offered by him in Committee of the Whole, to allow 15 per cent. to the sufferers on the actual loss; which was rejected.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the first proviso of the first section, as amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays; not ordered.

The amendment was negatived without a count.

Mr. GRAVES proposed to amend the bill by inserting, before the words "three, four, or five" years, wherever they occurred, "a period not exceeding;" which was rejected.

Mr. McKAY moved to insert in the ninth line, after the word "merchandise," the following: "who were not indemnified by insurance."

Mr. EVANS asked the consent of the House to submit a motion for an adjournment over to Monday.

Objection being made, Mr. CHAPIN moved to suspend the rule for that purpose.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, asked for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were not ordered; and the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS then submitted his motion.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, moved to strike out Monday and insert Tuesday; which was carried: Ayes 105, noes not counted.

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. McKAY, that gentleman asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE moved that the House adjourn; negatived: Ayes 69, noes not counted.

After a few words from Mr. PHILLIPS and Mr. McKAY, the question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to: Yeas 83, nays 110.

Mr. GRAVES moved a proviso, to come in at the end of the bill, "that no individual shall realize a benefit, under the provisions of the first section of this bill, greater than the amount of his loss, upon the calculation that the use of the amount he owes the Government is worth to him 6 per cent. per annum."

Mr. MORGAN asked for the yeas and nays; not ordered.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, moved to amend the bill by striking out the second section; and upon this motion he said he wished to submit a few remarks, notwithstanding the strong indication given by the friends of the bill of their impatience to pass it. [It was then five o'clock, and the House had twice refused to adjourn.] I am perfectly convinced (said Mr. C.) that this bill will pass, but that conviction only strengthens my determination to do my duty in resisting it. I am not disposed to complain of the anxiety of the friends of this measure to take the question upon its passage. I love the spirit of industry evinced by it, and congratulate the House upon the exhibition of such a spirit; it has not been very usual here. I think, however, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] whose peculiar province it seems to be to nurse this bill, ought, least of all others, to be impatient under the delay which has attended its progress; for, if I remember aright, some weeks since, when the sympathies, not only of the members of this House, but of the whole nation, were deeply excited by the then recent calamity under which their fellow-citizens of the city of New York had suffered, that gentleman, instead of pressing this measure, gave the premonitory symptom of a coming arraignment of a certain contumacious set of men in the other end of this building, who were about to be put upon their trial in this House by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] for certain grave offences alleged to have been committed in the last hours of the last session of Congress. That arraignment has occupied much of the time of this House, but now sleeps, probably to wake no more, having performed its office of giving the honorable member an opportunity of venting the bitterness of his feelings, and showing the position he intends in future to occupy in the party divisions of the day. I beg, sir, not to be understood as intending to censure any gentleman for the delay to which this measure has been subjected; far from it. I am grateful for it, because it has probably saved me from repenting, at my leisure, a hasty vote which I might have given under the influence of strongly excited feelings of commiseration for the sufferers proposed to be relieved. The people I have the honor to represent are themselves a little impulsive in such matters, and, when their feelings are assailed by a scene of distress, or excited by a tale of human suffering, will most certainly put their hands into the first reservoir of the means of relief which presents itself, whether it be their public or private purse, and relieve to the extent of their means. I should not, therefore, have considered myself as misrepresenting them, if, under the impulse of the moment, I had rushed into the support of this measure; but the time most unprofitably spent in the arraignment of the Senate has enabled me to appeal from my feelings to my judgment; and the result is, that I cannot now vote for this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I presume it would not be strictly in order to go into a discussion of the merits of the first section of this bill upon the motion I have submitted to strike out the second section; but I take this occasion to say that, upon the general proposition to relieve the sufferers by the late fire in the city of New York, by the legislation of Congress, it cannot be sustained upon any principle which, if carried out in equal justice to every class of sufferers by fire or other unavoidable calamity, in every part of the country, will not leave us with a bankrupt Treasury.

We are told, sir, that the immense loss of property in New York is a national calamity; and so it is. So is the burning of the most humble cottage or cabin, and the household goods of its occupant, but in an infinitely less degree, I admit. By what rule are we to fix the minimum of suffering to which our power to give relief will extend? This bill adopts one thousand dollars as the lowest point of loss worthy of our consideration, so far as the relief proposed is predicated upon the existence of an actual loss of any kind; but the relief contemplated by the second section is perfectly arbitrary, and without even the pretext of loss. Now, I contend, sir, that, upon principle, if the national Legislature have power to relieve the citizens of the city of New York, under the circumstances of this case, it must have the power to relieve a suffering family, burnt out of house and home, without food, without a bed or blanket to protect them against the severity of the season, and remote from the sources of charity or sympathy; and that such are as much and as properly objects of relief from the national Treasury as the citizens of the city of New York. But admit, for the argument, that I am in error in this position, still I ask, where are we to fix the point at which we are to commence to extend relief to sufferers by the numerous severe visitations by fire, wind, and water, to which the citizens of this widespread republic are daily exposed? If the humble tenant of a western cabin is too small an object for national munificence, do our burnt towns and cities of the West come within the sphere of your power to relieve? I mean, sir, those towns and cities that are, according to modern construction, out of the pale of the constitution, beyond the magic influence of ports of entry, and the collection of imposts. Sir, I have the honor to represent one of the most flourishing, prosperous, and commercial little cities of the West—the city of Maysville; and I remember that some years ago it was visited by a devastating fire, in which the loss sustained by individuals was, perhaps, as great, in proportion to its then population and wealth, as the loss sustained by the recent fire in New York. Did they petition Congress for relief? No, sir; they knew too well your course of legislation; they would have laughed at the proposition to come here for relief; their loss would not have been considered as of “a national character.” I remember, too, that a few years since the city of Cincinnati, “the beautiful city” which my eloquent friend from Ohio [Mr. STORER] says he has the honor to represent, suffered severely by fire; but I believe it never occurred to the sufferers of that city to come here to have their debts installed, or borrow money without paying interest. A friend on my left [Mr. PEXTON, of Tennessee] says, news has just been received here of a very destructive fire in the city of Natchez. I hope the sufferers will petition Congress for relief. They have a port of entry, sir, but I fear its magic influence will not avail them any thing; they are not in the right quarter; the very power that is irresistibly propelling this measure through this House will be found arrayed against them, if they come here for relief; there would be found a total want of analogy between a fire at Natchez and a fire in the city of New York.

We are told there are many precedents in the history of our legislation for the relief proposed in this case, and they have been strung out in imposing array before us; let them be examined by those who are anxious to sanctify one error by the commission of another. If the advocates of this measure will convince me that they have carried out, or will hereafter extend, the principle which this bill proposes to establish—that they have been, or will be, equally munificent towards my constituents under similar circumstances—they will do more to reconcile me to it than by the exhibition of any given number of cases in which they have heretofore acted with the same partial regard to local interests.

We were told the other day by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that he had always voted for western measures—for the Cumberland road, the extension of credits on the public lands, and the reduction of their price. What did the gentleman mean, sir? that he had paid us in advance for our votes upon this bill? If that was his meaning, we owe him nothing on the score of his liberality; for he intended to exact the price of it when a proper occasion presented itself. That, however, could not have been the honorable member's meaning; he only intended, I presume, to be understood that his future liberality towards the West would depend upon the support which the West should now give to this measure. Sir, the West, so far as the people I have the honor to represent, in part, are concerned, owe the gentleman nothing. Nay, more, sir; we owe this Government nothing—not the first dollar—either to your justice or your generosity. Your annual millions are expended on the seaboard, in building and repairing ships, fortifications, light-houses, navy yards, breakwaters, and a thousand other objects for the protection and promotion of foreign commerce, while the internal commerce of the West must find its way to market without any of those extraneous aids, and is even taxed to pay you a per centum upon your stock in the Louisville canal. If we ask aid to construct a great and leading highway, we are told that it is not an object sufficiently “national in its character for the expenditure of the national treasure.” No, sir; we have nothing national in Kentucky but our blood; that has been found sufficiently so in time of war to meet your gracious acceptance. Your public lands are lavishly bestowed upon our younger sisters of the West; their roads and canals are of a “national character.” Well, sir, Kentucky does not envy them their good fortune; many of them are “flesh of our flesh, and bone of our bone.” We have always furnished the pioneers of the West, and I hope the day will come when the West will, with united voice, demand justice at your hands for that portion of it to which you have never been generous, or even just. Then, and not till then, will Kentucky cease to pay without receiving. Let gentlemen cease to boast of their liberality towards the West, if they intend to include Kentucky in that designation. I cannot, nay, sir, I will not, permit them to tell me of their liberality towards the people I have the honor to represent, without letting them distinctly understand how far we recognise their claims upon our gratitude. I suppose I shall be told of the Louisville canal, and the pitiful sums employed in the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio. Sir, the Louisville canal is a Wall street concern—an eight per cent. stock job. Yes, sir; you are getting eight per cent. upon your stock in that concern. Shylock, if he were here, (and as he is not, I may be permitted to “personify a sentiment” under his name,) would take your stock off your hands. I cannot speak of this boasted act of national munificence towards the West, without indignation and contempt. You have laid out ten times as much money in constructing a breakwater in the Delaware, not with an eye to profit on the expenditure, not in the shape of stock, but for the accommodation and safety of the foreign commerce of the country, as you have invested in the stock of the Louisville canal, through which the commerce of ten States and two Territories is daily passing, and paying tribute to a corporation in which this Government is the principal stockholder. Even the great waters of the West seem to be deprived of their nationality by flowing along the margin of Kentucky.

And now, sir, having disposed of the gentleman's claims to the gratitude of the West, I beg a moment's attention to the second section of this bill. Does it provide relief for the sufferers by the recent fire in the city of New York? Has it, in fact, any such object in view? Is it the object of the bill, in any part of it, to provide relief for the actual sufferers by the fire? No, sir; the real sufferers, the poor, without shelter and without food, who have lost their all by the fire, are not cared for in any single feature of this great relief measure; it is exclusively for the relief of the importers of foreign merchandise; those of that class who have lost a thousand dollars are provided for by the first section; and if it should happen, as doubtless it will, that some of them owe from fifty to a hundred thousand dollars to the Government, and get a credit of three, four, and five years, without interest, upon their debts, having lost but one or two thousand dollars, they will make a neat little speculation upon their losses. I will not stop to make the calculation, sir; let those do it who are making this offering upon the altar of charity. As to the second class of persons provided for by this bill, the mask is dropped by the second section of it. Their sufferings are not by the fire. No, sir; it is not even contemplated that they shall have lost a dollar by the fire or its consequence; their sufferings consist in being indebted to this Government for duties on imported merchandise; not on goods which have been burnt, but, perhaps, on goods that have been sold at a profit covering the duties, and the money for them actually received; or, if not actually sold, certainly not the less saleable because an immense amount of goods of the same kind has been burnt—burnt in the hands of the purchasers from the importers. These, the purchasers from the importers, are another class of sufferers, actual sufferers, for whom no provision, no relief, is even contemplated by this bill. No, sir; the importers alone are thought to be within the legitimate scope of your power to grant relief, and they are to be relieved whether they have or have not suffered. And what is their pretext for it? Why, that they may be enabled to relieve others. They will be much more apt to use the money you are lending them to speculate upon the necessities of the real sufferers by this fire, than to relieve them. Well, sir, if we must take the pill provided by the second section of this bill, thanks to the untiring efforts of my colleague, [Mr. HARRIS,] we have it gilded. Yes, we shall get five per cent. upon our money, (if the debtors do not become bankrupt before the instalments become due,) and five per cent. is a pretty good bargain. But is the Government of this great nation going to turn usurer, to lend money upon usance? We are told it is the first instance in which the Government has asked interest under like circumstances, and I hope it will be the last; and yet I voted for this same usury, and, for one, will insist upon the payment of it. If we must lend money, I will exact the interest, sir, unless I can discover some better inducement to the lending than exists in this case.

This Government is now rich, sir; the Treasury is full to overflowing; and, as we have not been able to get up a war upon which to expend it, we must find out some other means of getting rid of it; perhaps this loan may be the precursor of a system of lending from the public Treasury. Might we not get up a national bank, sir? Not “a monster,” but a national concern; such as we might perhaps get a project for by applying at a certain white house in this city; such a bank as would not corrupt the members of Congress? I am aware, sir, that I address this House, in opposition to the measure under consideration, to no purpose. The importing merchants of the city of New York want the use of four millions of dollars of the public money, and they will have it; but, sir, I beg gentlemen to make up the record fully and fairly; let the journals of this House carry their names home to their constituents; let their disinterested benevolence stand recorded, so that the American people can know the liberal from the illiberal, and know to whom to apply in time to come for relief; let us have no “dodging,” sir; I want gentlemen’s consistency to appear on the journals, when, at a future day, they shall be called upon to relieve the inhabitants of some burnt city or town beyond the influence of the seabreeze.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE moved that the House adjourn. Agreed to: Yeas 92, noes 84.

And, at a quarter before six o’clock,

The House adjourned over to Tuesday next.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

The CHAIR presented to the House a message from the President of the United States, on the subject of our relations with France; which was read by the Clerk.

[Vide Senate debates, February 22.]

The reading of the message having been completed,

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved that it be laid on the table and printed, with the accompanying documents.

Mr. DAVIS moved that 10,000 extra copies be printed. Mr. GILLET named 25,000.

The CHAIR said that the motion for an extra number of copies must, under the rule, lie over one day.

Mr. ADAMS moved to refer the message, &c., to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. C. JOHNSON then withdrew his motion to lay the message on the table, and it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PARKER moved to suspend the rule, for the purpose of considering, at that time, the motion to print an extra number of copies of the President’s message.

Mr. WHITTLESEY asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rule; which were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. PARKER was agreed to: Yeas 112, noes 41.

So the House determined to consider the motion to print additional copies of the message.

Mr. C. JOHNSON said that the ordering of extra numbers of public documents accounted, in part, for the extraordinary increase in the contingent expenses of the House, within the last few years; that a few years ago the contingent expenses of both Houses of Congress were less than twenty thousand dollars, and during the last year amounted to about three hundred thousand dollars, and the expenses of this House alone to more than two hundred thousand.

Mr. LAY said that they had now laid on their tables, for the first time, documents which had been ordered at the commencement of the session; he would therefore move that the message and documents be printed, and furnished to members before the 1st of June next.

The question was taken on this motion, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. PARKER said that this was a most important document, and one in which the community felt a greater interest than any message which had been sent to Congress the present session, and the House should publish it for distribution in every hamlet in the country. It announces to us that the money which was justly due from France, and has been wrongfully withheld, is about to be paid; and it also announced that our national honor has been sustained. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. C. JOHNSON] had said that the message would be published in every paper in the United States. That was true; but many of the papers were of a small size, and it would be some time before they could publish it; and then the shape in which it would be placed was objectionable. If there was a document on which he should place his frank, the present message was the one; and he did not want it in a newspaper, but in a book, so that it would be laid up and preserved.

Mr. ADAMS said there was an additional reason to those which were suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PARKER,] and it was at least an equally powerful one with him for wishing the document to be distributed to its utmost possible extent. He meant what he conceived to be the moral of this controversy with France—the recommendation with which it closed, and the quotation from the almost inspired words of the Father of his Country.

Mr. BOON said that there were but few of his constituents who could get the message through the newspapers; he therefore moved that forty thousand copies be printed.

The question was taken on Mr. Boon’s motion to print 40,000 copies; which was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on Mr. GILLET’s motion to print 25,000 copies; which was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 103, nays 72.

The following message from the President was then read:

H. OF R.]

Order of Business—Slavery in the District of Columbia.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in answer to their resolutions of the — of February, instant, reports from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying documents, relating to the relations between the United States and France. For reasons adverted to by the Secretary of State, the resolutions of the House have not been more fully complied with.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, February, 18, 1836.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said that as there was then no necessity of referring these documents to a committee, he moved that they be laid on the table and printed; which was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIR proceeded to call for reports from standing committees; when

Mr. ADAMS reminded the Chair that the rule required that, after the first thirty days of the session, petitions should be called for on the first day of the meeting of the House in each week.

The SPEAKER, on referring to the rule, announced that petitions were in order.

The question pending on the last petition day was a point of order arising on an appeal taken by Mr. VINTON from the decision of the Chair, on the presentation of an abolition petition by Mr. BARGES.

Mr. MILLER moved that the question of order be postponed till Monday next.

Mr. VINTON said that if the motion to postpone should prevail, it would apply only to the solitary case under consideration; for there were many other cases of a similar character that would immediately come up.

Mr. MILLER explained that his object was that all petitions which might give rise to debate should likewise be postponed; but he hoped the good feeling of members having abolition petitions would induce them to withhold them.

Mr. WISE, as a southern man, as a slaveholder, did hope the House would act upon the subject of the abolition of slavery, and no longer evade or dodge the subject.

The motion to postpone till Monday next was then agreed to.

Several petitions and memorials were then presented.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ADAMS presented a petition for the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia, and moved that it be referred to the select committee on that subject.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD objected to its reception, and moved to postpone the further consideration of the preliminary question on the petition till Monday next.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS objected; and

Mr. DAVIS then moved to lay that preliminary motion on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The hour of one o'clock having arrived,

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired of the Chair, what were the orders of the day?

The CHAIR replied that, by a resolution adopted some days since, the appropriation bills were made the special order every day, after one hour being devoted to the consideration of the morning business, except on Fridays and Saturdays.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the rules be suspended in order to proceed with the call for petitions and memorials, with the exception of those which would give rise to debate, but subsequently withdrew the motion; and

Mr. LYON renewed it in a different form, viz: to suspend the rules for the same purpose, for this day, commencing at the Territories.

Mr. REED moved to amend that motion, so as to proceed in the order already commenced; agreed to: Yeas 84, noes 79.

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to: Yeas 122, noes 38. The rules were accordingly suspended.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. DAVIS to lay the preliminary motion on the reception of the petition presented by Mr. J. Q. ADAMS this morning on the table—

Mr. MANN appealed to the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw the motion, so that the vote of the House might be taken on the question of order.

Mr. DAVIS said he could not assent to the request, as he wished to preclude this debate, in order to give members an opportunity of presenting petitions from their constituents.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative as follows: Yeas 120, nays 86.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote of this day, postponing until Monday next the appeal from the decision of the Chair in reference to the abolition petition presented on Monday of last week by Mr. BARGES.

Mr. M. said he was induced to make this motion, in order that the question might be at once decided, and that the House should not be blocked up with similar questions, thereby excluding the presentation of all petitions of a different character.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

He thought there was no more appropriate time than the present to decide this question. It was due to the importance of the subject that it should be met and decided promptly—it was due to the country that it should know what disposition Congress intended to make of this question.

Mr. MILLER said that, having failed in accomplishing his object in submitting his motion to postpone, he acquiesced in the motion of the gentleman from New York to reconsider, and was in favor of disposing of the question of order at this time.

Mr. WISE rose to make a prediction. When the gentleman from New York made the motion to reconsider, Mr. W. well knew that his appeal would be answered, and he expected that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] would fully concur with the gentleman from New York. He begged the House to look at the fact that, when an appeal came from the South on the subject of slavery, it was unheeded, it was unsuccessful. Let it come from the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be found fully to concur with him.

Mr. BROWN rose to say that, so far as the remark of the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had any application, it could not embrace him. He had resisted the motion to postpone, because he wished the question of order settled now. It must be settled soon; for it was impossible the House should remain in its present state any length of time. Why not settle it now as well as next week, or any other time. He saw nothing to be obtained by procrastination. He came from a district which had not troubled the House upon the angry and engrossing question of slavery; and in sitting in silence in his seat for more than two months while the discussions were going on, in avoiding all agitations within these walls, as far as his influence could go, he believed he obeyed their wishes. The last thing he desired to do here was to debate the subject of the abolition of slavery in this District. In maintaining the most studied silence, he believed he obeyed the will of his constituents, as well as the dictates of his own judgment.

When the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PINCKNEY] submitted his resolutions, he voted for them, in the hope that all future petitions, praying for the abolition of slavery, would go to the select committee of which that honorable gentleman was chairman; and that the business of the House would be permitted to proceed in the usual manner. In what situation did the House find itself now? It was manifest that petitions could not be presented, so long as the question of order remained undetermined, and the right of petition, for the time being, was substantially denied. It was for these reasons he had voted against the motion to postpone; and it was for these reasons he should now vote for the motion of his honorable colleague [Mr. MANN] to reconsider the motion to postpone, with a view to reach the question of order.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which was negatived: Ayes 85, noes not counted.

Mr. LAWLER asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider; which were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then agreed to: Ayes 101, noes not counted.

Mr. MILLER withdrew the motion to postpone.

The question then recurred on the question of order, which was as follows: On Monday of last week, a petition for the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia was presented by Mr. BRIGGS, of Massachusetts. Mr. WISE raised the question of its reception. The CHAIR entertained that motion, and Mr. VINTON took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, on the ground that, by the adoption of the resolution of Mr. PINCKNEY, to refer all petitions heretofore offered, and which should thereafter be presented, on that subject, to a select committee, it was not in order to entertain the question of reception.

Mr. SHIELDS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The point of order was discussed at length; and the decision of the Chair was sustained by Messrs. LAWLER, CUSHING, WISE, and GARLAND of Virginia, and opposed by Messrs. BEARDSLEY and GRENELL.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that his mind had not at first been altogether free from doubt or difficulty on this question, but his reflections had brought him to the conclusion that the Speaker was wrong, and he would now briefly submit the reasons that had brought him to such result.

On the 8th of February last, an honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PINCKNEY,] for the very desirable and laudable purpose of establishing some mode by which these agitating abolition petitions could be disposed of, without a most useless, nay, a most exciting and mischievous debate, introduced a series of resolutions, which, after some debate, were adopted by a most overwhelming majority of this House; the first of which is the only one which is material to the consideration of the question now under discussion, and is in the words following:

“Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented, to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and also the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] together with every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to this subject, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report adversely to the prayer of the petitioners, and according to certain requisitions contained in the resolutions.”

Subsequently to the adoption of these resolutions, an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] presented a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The question which had so often been agitated was again made by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] whether this petition should be received, and was about to be discussed at length; when it was urged by an honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] that the question of reception could not now be contested or debated, because the House, by the adoption of the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina, had established a general uniform rule as to the manner in which these petitions should be disposed of. The Speaker decided that the question of reception was still open to objection and debate; and from that decision an appeal has been taken, which is now the subject under consideration.

Mr. V. said that, in order to determine the import, scope, and effect, of the resolutions introduced by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, it was pertinent to inquire what object, what purpose, induced the presentation of those resolutions, and what circumstances attended their introduction into and passage through this House? It was well to inquire what was the old rule, what was the mischief; and then we could determine what sort of remedy was intended to be provided. Need he ask any gentleman what was the avowed object of the honorable mover of the resolutions, in bringing them to our consideration? It was, as all would readily answer, to avoid those interminable, unprofitable, and most “incendiary” debates which had previously attended the introduction of every one of these petitions.

H. OF R.]

The public mind at the South was said to be in a high state of agitation; it was highly important that it should be quieted, and all reflecting men could not but perceive that the constant and excited discussions here, on the introduction of these petitions, were calculated to accomplish any thing but to quiet the troubled waters. They could only serve to impress the abolitionists of the North with the idea that they had become, or were becoming, wonderfully formidable, and increase the apprehensions which the slaveholders of the South so naturally cherished. The animated and oftentimes bitter discussions, provoked so constantly here by the offer of these petitions, could only serve them to do mischief at both ends: to stimulate the abolitionists to greater exertions, and increase the alarm of those upon whom their mischievous doings were designed so prejudicially and disastrously to operate. It was highly important, then, that some movement should here be made, that some plan should here be adopted, by which the mischievous consequences of constant discussion and agitation might be avoided; and that very large and decided majority, which voted for the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina, hailed his proposition as the sure, the acceptable means, by which the evils which we had so long encountered might be thereafter avoided. The source, too, from which they emanated (a gentleman from a slaveholding State) was well calculated to make the remedy which he intended to work more complete.

It is not assuming too much, sir, to suppose and affirm that all who voted for his resolutions did so under a conviction that this whole subject had received its quietus, at least till after the report of this instructed committee should come in; but now, sir, if we sustain the decision of the Chair, and adopt the course contended for by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] then we will indeed have labored in vain to dispose, even for a season, of this troublesome subject. All the fond hopes of those who supported the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina will be blasted, and a conflict, unprofitable as it is mischievous and painful, will again be commenced on this floor. He begged gentlemen to look to consequences before they voted upon this question.

Mr. V. contended that the resolutions of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PINCKNEY,] now that they were adopted, had all the force and efficacy of a standing rule of this House; and when we recurred to the manner in which they were introduced here, we would be more ready to admit that they had all the essential characteristics, and should therefore have all the force, of a standing rule. Were they introduced in reference to, or provoked by, any particular petition? No. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina had offered them as independent propositions, not applying to any particular isolated petition or document, but as general rules to dispose not only of the abolition petitions that had been presented, but to direct the disposition of those which might afterwards be presented. It was competent for a majority of this House to establish a general rule, and then it could be rescinded, in reference to a particular case, only by a vote of two thirds of the House. If it was competent for the House to establish standing rules, in relation to any subject of great interest to the nation, (which no gentleman would deny,) then this was, to all intents and purposes, one of the standing rules of the House, which directed "that all petitions which might thereafter be presented should be referred to a select committee, with instructions to make such a report as should guard against the future influx of these agitating documents into this hall." How can gentlemen, then, in the face of this standing order or rule of the House, object to the reception of the petitions? Sir, (said Mr. V.,) I voted for the resolutions,

(and so, according to the most obvious rules of common sense, must every gentleman who voted for them have voted for them,) on the assumption that the petitions, if presented, would be received; for, sir, the reference of the petitions, which the resolutions so emphatically orders, presupposes the reception of them. You cannot refer a thing to a select or general committee before it is received; and he was sorry to hear his honorable friend from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] a few days ago contend that he did not consider the resolutions as imposing any obligation to receive these petitions. He did not consider the reception of them as so very respectful to the petitioners, when they were referred for the very purpose of not only procuring the rejection of their prayer, but of calling forth such arguments and expostulations as should guard against our being troubled with them hereafter. To receive a thing for the purpose of killing it, was not, in his humble estimation, such a reception of it as was objectionable on the score of respect to those who sent it here.

But gentlemen tell us they want discussion. They do not like to be muzzled when these petitions come here. Sir, (said Mr. V.,) how completely has the policy of a certain section of this country changed within a few short years. He well recollected that, less than two years ago, upon the introduction of one of these petitions praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, a discussion was commenced in relation to it, in which some gentlemen from the South evinced a disposition to participate, when an honorable and distinguished gentleman from Virginia, whose great experience gave him a well-merited influence here, [Mr. Archer, now not a member,] rose in his place, and admonished southern gentlemen, by every consideration of regard to their great interest, not to discuss this matter.

[Here the SPEAKER interrupted Mr. V., and said he was travelling out of the legitimate range of debate.]

Mr. V. said he had many things more to say; but he was apprehensive that he would be obliged very soon to choose the alternative which his friend from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] had just submitted to with so much grace, viz: take his seat, and forego the residue of his speech.

He would, however, before he closed, remind the House on what grounds the reception of these petitions was objected to, before the adoption of the resolutions of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina.

[Here Mr. GARLAND called Mr. V. to order, and the Speaker decided that he was out of order.]

Mr. V. then concluded by remarking that, for the reasons which he had already urged, and for ninety-nine other reasons, that he could have urged, if he had not been arrested by calls of order, he would vote to reverse the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. MANNING, of South Carolina, rose next, and spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Should the decision of the Chair, which has been made, remain unreversed, then this strange anomaly will be forced to result from it: that the resolution offered by my colleague from South Carolina, [Mr. PINCKNEY,] and adopted by an overwhelming majority of this House, intended to answer a definite and special object, will be wholly defeated; because it will be essentially changed, so as to fail in answering the most important purposes for which it was originated, and on account of which it was supported by its friends. The objects, highly important as we believe them to be, intended to be accomplished by its adoption, will, after the mature and deliberate action of this branch of Congress, be wholly changed. I trust that no skill, however adroitly or powerfully used, will ever so far succeed as to prevent the full action of this resolution from effectuating those important final results which the originator and friends of it do most ardently anticipate. We hope in the God of our country, that the exponent of this will be such as to gladden the hearts of patriots; and sooth arising irritations, by renewing confidence in every portion of this widely extended country. I regard this resolution as a settled rule for this House, as much so as any which it can adopt under its legitimate functional action. No parliamentary law, sanctioned by wisdom and consecrated by usage, can be more so. If the Speaker can by his decision reverse this resolution, which expresses and means "that all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented, to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, be referred to a select committee," &c., so as to mean no more than that all petitions or memorials which had been received at the time of the adoption of the resolution shall be referred to the select committee raised under it, and that therefore all of a like character, subsequently introduced, could be allowed to take any other direction, then the whole character, scope, and extent of it will be so limited as to countervail the specified and declared object of it. If this be true, then he has power to suspend, alter, or change, any deliberate act of this House, intended as a rule for its governance.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

I know full well the responsibility and delicacy of the Speaker's situation. I feel and acknowledge how important it is to the orderly management and proper deliberation of this body that he should be sustained by all parties in his general efforts to preserve proper decorum. I would do all in my power, generally, to sustain the Speaker; but, in this instance, I feel a paramount duty to myself and to my country to urge upon this House a reversal of his decision. I wish that this course had been pursued at the very first moment when indications were given that the usual mode of disposing of these memorials and petitions was to be abandoned. The usual practice of both branches of Congress has been to lay them on the table, or to refer them to a committee. This has been the practice not only of this House, but of the Senate also. There they were laid, there they have remained, to sleep that sleep of oblivion which they so justly merit. On some occasions such petitions were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, from whose safe keeping they never escaped to see light of day, or to accomplish that magnitude of evil which they were calculated to produce, through the agency of wicked or thoughtless citizens, who originated them or sent them here. It has been painful to many, and indeed to most of this House, that we have been carried away from that practice of both Houses of Congress, in the disposition of anti-slavery memorials and petitions, which, heretofore, has been found so safe and politic. We were driven reluctantly to pursue some mode by which we hoped to arrest that tendency of things here, which we deeply feared might lead to incalculable evils and to dangerous results. We hoped, by this resolution, to stay debate, to prevent discussion, to keep down irritating, heartburning invectives, and to unite Congress by a strong expression of its feelings and opinions, both as regards the States and the District of Columbia; so as to remove doubts, give renewed security, and unite us once more in the bonds of common interest and of united affections; and that we might meet and unite upon a broad and common ground, from which distracting and agitating questions might be avoided, and where varying and practically unimportant abstract notions and opinions might have no influence in preventing useful and practical results. Our aim has been to reach practical objects, to prevent discussion, to keep down excitement of one portion of the Union against the other, to restore harmony, confidence, and that feeling of security to life, liberty, and property, without which Governments cannot long exist in this age of the world, and without which they would, if they could exist, be a curse.

Sir, I have been filled with anxiety and care at the course which things are taking in this country. My bed is not refreshing to me, as it used to be. Unhappy visions flit across my mind; thorns are planted under my pillow; the air does not refresh me as in other days; the sunbeams do not bring those gladdening and animating sensations to my frame, as was the case when our southern country was happier and more united; when the South, the land of generous feeling and of noble sentiment, the land of hospitality and of elegant and polished life, of warm, impassioned, and sweeping eloquence, and of moral and intellectual power, was one and united. These are the bright features by which our southern States have ever been characterized; these are the fine traits which adorn the lovely character of the South. This interesting country, in earlier and happier days, was united, was full of hope, and rioted in the grand prospective of the distant future; and as the series of events unfolded the rising prosperity of our State and common country, all was joy, hope, and gladness. The times are changing; slowly operating causes are producing discontents; undefined apprehensions are succeeding to full and unlimited confidence; a thrilling sensibility has been awakened, under clouded apprehensions that attempts may be made to unsettle the existing order of things by an interference directly in the District of Columbia, at no distant day, with the rights of the slave-owners; and by making this a mere first move, into a more extended and general system of operation in the slaveholding States at some still more distant day. The object of the friends of this resolution is to disabuse the public; to substitute for improper, correct statements; to present just views of northern sentiment and feeling, in relation to our institutions; and to give the other portions of our common country an opportunity of putting down those wild and erratic movements at the North, by which those who aim at pressing their memorials and petitions upon Congress, that they may produce discussion, excite feelings, and thus force themselves and their objects into the notice and under the consideration of a thinking, speaking, and writing age, may fall short of their aim. Their success will best be secured, and their ends best answered, if they can but so far press themselves and their objects upon the notice of the country as to produce excitement, awaken resentment, or elicit abuse. Under the silence of contempt, or under the indignant rebukes of the lovers of order and stable government, they will dwindle down to their proper and safe dimensions. If let alone, they will sink into that insignificance which they merit; they will sink under those rebukes, from the moral and intellectual forces of our northern brethren, which seem to await them. If they progress, the battle must be, will be, fought at the North. The good of society, the safety and happiness of every portion of this country, will bring about this result; for if these crusaders against the rights and interests of the slaveholding States are permitted by northern portions of this country to move on in their erratic course, they will produce such throes and convulsions, not only in the South, but in the North, that the established order of things will become unsettled; the reign of law and of liberty will be endangered.

The South, sir, ought never to debate this question; it ought never to discuss it; for discussion will produce excitement, one degree of excitement will beget another; a warm and animated southern excitement, will, nay, must, produce a corresponding northern excitement; each will grow in character and in degree, until a grand northern interest may stand opposed to a grand southern interest. The North, then, becomes arrayed against the South, and the South against the North. I will not allow myself to inquire, under a juncture like this, what will become of this our beloved and happy country? Under such circumstances, truly, will the hearts of patriots tremble for the ark of our political safety. The ground assumed in the resolution is not only a broad and common one, upon which all may safely unite, but is one broad and ample enough to sustain all the rights and interests of the South.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Under the compromises of the States, which led to the formation of this Government, and to the adoption of the constitution of the United States, we believe, however other gentlemen may differ from us, that Congress, under them, has no power whatever to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the slave property of the citizens within the District of Columbia, any more than it has to interfere with houses, or land, or any other description of property. It cannot do this otherwise than in such way, and for such high and necessary purposes, as has been clearly and definitely expressed in the constitution itself. Property cannot be taken by the Government from its citizens, without full and adequate compensation; and then only for such important purposes, and for such absolute wants, as the safety of the country may require. Under these compromises, in reference to the property of the slaveholding States, the constitution of the United States was adopted; with these understandings the Government was formed; upon these, as their proper basis, rest the constitution and Government. These, then, under legitimate deductions of reason, are the spirit and life of the constitution and Government; and under their broad banner we the people will protect and defend our property and lives, should this sad alternative ever be forced upon us. When Virginia and Maryland made a cession of the ten miles square, within the limits of this District, they never for a moment believed that the original and inherent right of those States would be or could be transferred to Congress, so that it could interfere with the rights of property of their citizens who lived upon the soil. Neither could Maryland or Virginia do any such act, or make any such transference. The constitution of neither State gave any such power to their respective Legislatures. If no such power resided in the constitution, then any such attempt to exercise it, on the part of the Legislatures, would have been a gross usurpation of power, never yielded by the people. Nothing but an act of the people, in convention, could have yielded that power, which certainly was never granted under those State constitutions. Then it is as clear as light that the Congress of the United States never can interfere, so as to emancipate the slaves in the District of Columbia, until the people of Virginia and Maryland, in conventions of the people of those States, shall see proper to confer the power. I believe that an unfortunate issue was made up, when a fundamental principle of our Government was connected with the question of slavery. What would, if this course should be pursued, be the result? By a forced and unnatural action of this House, you would drive—not the abolitionists, for they, under any circumstances, are and will be against us—but you drive on a most important vote those who differ with us on a mere abstract legal opinion, but who are among our very best friends, the abiding friends of southern rights, and who are firm and unwavering supporters of those compromises under which the States united to form the Government of the United States. This denial of the right to petition, gentlemen never could have yielded. They would have been rebuked by public sentiment for yielding one of those great principles upon which rests, fundamentally, not only our Government, but without which no free Government can exist. Besides, sir, where was the necessity of taking this ground? It is one which is impracticable, one which cannot be maintained by republicans. It would, if persevered in, drive from us those very friends who, to protect and defend the existing order of things, to preserve the Government, protect and defend the Union of these States, and the rights and interests of the southern, or of any other portion of this confederacy, would, in the manly and patriotic language of the present Governor of Massachusetts, used some years ago, "buckle on their knapsacks, and with arms in hand, rally to the support of the laws and constitution of this country." Yes, sir, to the defence of those very compromises under which our fathers, with their fathers, cleaved down British power in this country, and under which they, together, built up that form of government which is the admiration of the civilized world at this day.

I believe that without a resort to this mode, or to some other like it, by which the broad field of discussion, opened on this vitally important subject, should be closed, the heat created here, and thrown off in every direction, like as from a great central fire, would not, like common radiant heat, lose its intensity as it departed farther and farther from its great source, but would gain intensity and violence as it progressed, from the elements upon which it would feed. There is nothing in this country which has connected with it so many dangers to this Union as this very question of slavery. The unhappy relations which lately existed between this country and France, and which, I thank God, are so happily settled to the honor of my country, to that of France, and of England, were, to the lovers of order and security, a matter of secondary importance; nay, a war with France, and with the combined world, and a fortunate and happy issue out of it, could not be of half so momentous a consideration to this country as a proper and safe settlement of this vexing and harassing question.

This settlement could not be accomplished, and never will be accomplished, by motions to reject "in limine," petitions or memorials. Good results can never be produced by illegitimate and unwarrantable means. If petitions and memorials are presented, licentiously abusing the sacred and fundamental right of petition, on the receipt, Congress will instantly reject, or pursue such mode as either to treat them with the silence they deserve, or will take such measures, give such rebukes, or inflict such punishments, as the propriety of the case may require. The abuse of a principle must be separated from the principle itself. Fundamental principles ought not, cannot, be impaired or be trenching upon, because abuses grow out of practices upon them. Licentiousness but too often springs up from the wickedness of mankind, under the purest forms which free Governments can be made to assume. This is incident to all human institutions; but for this, the great foundation upon which they are built cannot, ought not to be disturbed. Those who administer this Government, and those who legislate under it, must have such virtue and wisdom as will check and control, so as to give a safe direction to whatever may come under their legitimate action. If this should be otherwise, the Government itself will fall to pieces.

In 1805, a memorial was offered in the Senate of the United States, praying for the emancipation of slaves in the States. On the question to receive, the vote in the Senate was nineteen in favor of receiving, and nine against it. Among the nineteen was the venerable and distinguished name of General Sumter, of South Carolina. It is impossible that the denial of the right of petition can be sustained under a republican Government. This distinguished patriot, soldier, and statesman, the immediate and intimate friend of Mr. Jefferson, in whose firmness, correctness of opinion, and strong republican virtue, Mr. Jefferson is said to have had more confidence than in any man in Congress at that time, could not, as a republican, with all his strong southern feeling, and his perfect devotion to the true interest of the South—could not, as a supporter of the true theory of the Government, do otherwise than vote that this principle of the Government should not be violated, and that the memorial “should be committed.”

In 1790, on the presentment of a memorial praying for the abolition of slavery in the States, debate arose, and began to take a warm and inflammatory character, and to assume such an aspect as to make it proper at once to dispose of the irritating subject. Mr. Madison, then a member of Congress, moved to refer it to a select committee. This was done. The report was made; this satisfied Congress and the country. Within a few years, petitions of a similar kind were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. A strong report was made by Mr. Doddridge, of Virginia, which was acceptable to Congress, and which satisfied the country.

Sir, excited gentlemen at the South are surely not aware of the extent and character of the injury they are doing to our interests, by discussions on the memorials and petitions which are sent here by unreflecting or wicked abolitionists. Is it not bad policy to bring either their newspapers, their books, or their false pictures, into public notoriety? Is this not accomplishing one of the objects which they most ardently desire?

The tendency of this course of action on the one side, and of the counteraction on the other, is, I contend, to throw the elements of civil society into dangerous commotions. The truth of this is deeply impressed upon my convictions, and I feel that something ought and must be done to arrest the tendencies which are rapidly developing themselves.

How different was every thing in relation to this subject during the last session of Congress, to what it has been during the present session. I was gratified then, as a southern man, and as an American citizen, to observe the direction given to such anti-slavery memorials as were presented. As they were offered, then, they were successively laid on the table, and were never again called up. This was in conformity with the common usage, and, with the few exceptions stated, has been the invariable practice of Congress, from the origin of this Government to this time. Not a word, during the whole session, was spoken, to the best of my recollection, on abolition, either on the floor of Congress or elsewhere.

I deplore it as a deep misfortune, that the common practice of the Congress of the United States has been abandoned; that the course of southern presses and southern policy has been abandoned; that the order of business and the time of this House, have been, to a considerable extent, occupied with the discussion of these miserably disturbing petitions and memorials.

From my earliest recollections, from my childhood up to this time, it has ever been the settled and fixed policy of the southern people never to write, to speak, or to print, any thing on this all-absorbing question. Consult the old men of this day—look over your public legislative journals—look over the columns of the newspapers in the southern States, and you will find nothing to disprove what I have here asserted. Sir, I am not mistaken: this has been the settled policy of the South, and wherefore depart from it?

The slave property of the slaveholding States has been, and is, so surrounded and guarded by the sanctions of prescriptive right, by long lines of inheritances, by the approbation of civilized man at that period; and, since its first institution, by the joint purchase with the united capital of northern and southern men of this kind of property; by the sanctions of laws, compacts, and constitutions; by the approval of a purely virtuous and enlightened clergy; and, more than all, by the arrangements under the plans of Divine Providence, that no question or doubt could ever be entertained by us. Our policy has been, and still is, never to discuss, never to entertain discussions. And if the countless guards, which we believe are sufficiently strong to protect and to secure our rights, should fail us, we should then be compelled to employ all those means of self-defence and protection which the providence of God has placed amply within our reach.

What I have said is not the opinion of yesterday. It is one which was publicly expressed, and which was, I presume, publicly recorded, in 1826.

One objection urged against the resolution under consideration is, that it is improper to reaffirm that Congress has no power to interfere with slavery in the States. How can a reiteration of a self-evident proposition impair or weaken its force? Can the repetition, for ten millions of times, that two and two make four, impair this self-evident truth? Or the reiteration of the truth, that the whole is greater than a part, weaken, one jot or tittle, the certainty of this postulate? Or can the fundamental truth, that Congress has no power to interfere with slavery in the States, add to or take from its certainty? It cannot. I believe, with many who have voted for and supported the resolutions, that Congress has no competent power to interfere with the existence of slavery in the District of Columbia. I have already declared that this is my own belief; but, sir, all the friends of southern rights do not believe as we do, but entertain a difference of opinion on an abstract constitutional question, with regard to the powers of Congress over this District. Those gentlemen who differ from us on this point are as staunch and abiding, nay, as devoted friends of our institutions, as the purest and loftiest patriots to be found on earth. Was it politic or expedient, under these circumstances, to assume a ground on which, for practical results, the advocates and friends of southern rights and southern security, under the compromises of the constitution, were unavoidably to be separated? Was it right to bring on a forced and unnatural action of Congress on the constitutional question, when it was to result in an impolitic division and separation of our friends? Was it politic that a weak vote should go forth, making it appear to the world that the great majority of Congress were against the rights and interests of the South? This would have given a false and unnatural presentation of the true feeling of Congress to the people of the United States. It would have produced distrust, created unkind feelings, and would ultimately have had an evil bearing on the safety and happiness of this country.

I approve the resolution offered by my colleague, [Mr. PIERCEMAN,] most cordially. I say to him, to this House, and to my country, that I believe his motives are honest and disinterested; and that his conduct on this occasion is worthy of that name which he bears, and which, connected as it is with the history of this country, is dear, and ever will be so, to the American people.

Sir, if this resolution fail to effectuate its legitimate and laudable object, it will be because the opportunity afforded for quieting the country, and for obtaining for all useful results a strong and decided declaration from Congress, shall be unwisely defeated. It will be defeated by creating, under unjust excitement, and from bitter invectives against our northern friends, counteractions to the efforts which they have been and are still making to rebuke and prostrate the wild and unhallowed efforts of those wicked men who are acting without a just regard to the rights and interests of the South, or without foreseeing the throes and convulsions which must inevitably result from their course of action, should it not be arrested.

If these reckless agitators continue their course, and northern integrity and northern patriotism should not put them down, these melancholy realities will be the result. They will convulse this republic to its centre, and lay bare its massy foundations. Instead of conferring benefits upon the black race, whose exclusive champions they profess to be, they will stay, and perhaps forever, those meliorating causes which have been gradually exercising their influences for the last thirty years upon the condition of the slave population of this country, and will consign it to a necessary and inevitable condition of greater severity. Yes, sir, they may produce that deplorable condition by which their utter destruction may be necessary to secure the safety of this country. Was it ever yet known, in the history of mankind, that two distinct colors could coexist on terms of equal civil and political liberty? Sooner than this shall ever be realized, the one or the other will be exterminated.

When the abolitionists, in their Quixotic notions of general emancipation, press forward to their objects against the arrangements and the established order of things under the plan of Divine Providence, they censure the wisdom and virtue of our common ancestors, condemn the usages of the patriarchal ages, disregard the sanction of the Bible, and arraign the justice and wisdom of God.

I feel assured that the virtuous, the considerate, the lovers of order, the supporters of the Union, and of life, liberty, and property, have made up a cool and deliberate judgment that northern people have nothing to do with the institutions of slavery in the South; that to attempt to interfere will eventuate in remediless injury to the black and to the white population, and that the end may be to destroy that beautiful fabric of Government which has for fifty years given unrivalled happiness and prosperity to this country, and which has produced, by successive actions, the happiest changes on every Government in Christendom. I have predicated my opinions and declarations, with regard to northern faith and northern patriotism in reference to slavery in the slaveholding States, upon my earliest convictions with regard to that enlightened and admirable portion of our common country; upon those historical recollections which made us one people; upon the declarations of gentlemen from every portion of the country, possessed of all the means necessary to enable them to give just views of public feeling and sentiment; upon the declarations of the people in their primary meetings, contained in their deliberate resolves; upon the addresses and avowals of many of the best and wisest of the North; upon executive messages to different State Legislatures in the northern sections of the Union, and upon the unequivocal declarations and assurances of the great body of both branches of Congress. These are the grounds upon which I predicate my belief that, with the exception of the mere abolitionists, northern feeling and sentiment are perfectly safe, and that the moral and intellectual forces of the country will prevail, if southern folly and excitement do not prevent it, in prostrating northern folly and fanaticism.

Under these circumstances, and with these convictions, I call on the Congress of the United States, under deep and solemn feelings, to regard this question, which is most injuriously affecting the people of this country, and to unite, by some decisive act, to quiet and arrest the course which things are taking; for, if this agitating subject be not settled, and excitement and agitation shall be allowed here, then you will meet in this Capitol, sir, some one or two years hence, under such circumstances of feeling and of deep dissatisfaction as will endanger the safety and duration of this Union. I call upon members, from every section of this great and powerful confederation, under a just and proper sense of duty to the republic, to compromise differing opinions, and to give confidence and security to every section of this blessed and happy country. This Government was born under a lofty and enlightened spirit of compromise, and it cannot exist one year without it. Moderation, justice, and forbearance, are necessary and cardinal virtues in carrying on the great plans of self-government first conceived and executed by the conscript fathers of this country. All will be elemental war, unless wisdom, rather than passion, shall preside over the councils of the nation, in the management of the multifarious interests and endless concerns of this extensive and mighty country.

Mr. GALBRAITH demanded the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Ayes 104, noes 70.

On the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. GRANGER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 123, nays 84, as follows:

So the decision of the Chair was reversed, and the memorial presented by Mr. BRIGGS, which was the subject of the point of order, was thereby referred to the select committee on the subject of slavery within the District of Columbia.

The memorial presented by Mr. ADAMS this day, also, took the same reference.

Mr. LAWLER sent to the Chair certain instructions, which he desired to go to the same committee, and proposed that they be read; which was objected to; and after some conversation between the CHAIR and Mr. LAWLER, as to the right to offer those instructions, the House,

On motion of Mr. McKIM, at half past 4 o'clock, adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. BOYD, from the Committee of Elections, made a report in the case of the contested election of the honorable JAMES GRAHAM, of North Carolina, which he moved be printed, together with the accompanying documents, and made the special order for Wednesday next.

[The majority of the committee reported adversely to the sitting member, and that Mr. David Newland was entitled to his seat.]

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Wednesday three weeks.

Mr. BYNUM remarked that this contested election had been before Congress for nearly four months. If it be a fact that the present incumbent was not entitled to a seat on this floor, he had been there already a sufficient length of time, and it became them, as an act of justice to the people of that district, and of the State of North Carolina, to see that the contest should be settled as soon as possible, and that the legitimate Representative should take his seat. He hoped, therefore, that no time would be lost in deciding on the question, more than was absolutely necessary to ascertain who was entitled to the seat. He thought one week was time enough to come to a correct understanding, and make a just and correct decision on the subject. He hoped the motion to postpone for three weeks would not prevail.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Virginia, felt very little interest, for his own part, as to the time assigned for the investigation of this matter; but he desired that justice should be done to both parties. The gentleman [Mr. BYNUM] had observed that the State of North Carolina, in this particular, had been long enough misrepresented. Mr. C. would inform the gentleman that the committee were divided as to who was entitled to the seat on this occasion, and that a counter report to the one presented that morning, exhibiting the case in an entirely different way, would be made as soon as the former should be disposed of. Mr. C.'s anxiety on the present occasion was not to smother this case in any way whatever, but to give a fair and full opportunity to every gentleman, disposed to go into it, to do so. It then became necessary to print both reports, and the whole of the testimony; upon the construction of some portion of which, it was readily and freely admitted that different views must of necessity be taken by different persons. The time first mentioned was, perhaps, too short; for it ought certainly to be long enough to permit the printing of both reports and the whole of the testimony, and to give an opportunity to the members of the House to examine it for themselves, and to compare it with the view taken of it by the different members of the committee.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD said that the present subject was a matter of interest not only to the House, but to the district immediately concerned, and also the State of North Carolina; and he regretted very much to hear the remarks which fell from his colleague upon this subject. He hoped the House would not enter into any other than the question, which of the candidates was entitled to the seat. There was a motion before the House that the documents be printed, and some days must elapse before the printing could be executed. He thought he understood, from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLAIBORNE,] that another report was to be presented. Was it not, therefore, right that all this matter should be laid before the House? and that could not be done hastily. It had been intimated to him that one of the parties in the contested election wanted time to make out the question, and prepare the evidence of his being entitled to a seat. Would it not, therefore, be better to make the simple order for printing the documents, and let them have a few days to determine whether it might not be necessary to recommit the subject, to hear other testimony? Let the matter be amply, discreetly, and dispassionately considered, and decided by the facts of the case.

Mr. HARDIN thought that all the members of the House ought to be acquainted with the subject, so as to enable them to decide understandingly. He had cast his eye on the report, and he very much doubted whether it could be printed before next Tuesday or Wednesday; therefore, to take it up at that time would most certainly be too soon. The decision was to be made from an investigation into the laws of North Carolina, of which laws few knew any thing, but the members from that State; and time must be had to examine those laws after the documents were printed. Gentlemen well knew the trouble and embarrassment experienced in the case of the Moore and Letcher contested election. Although he was intimately acquainted with the laws in that case, he must say that he never met with any thing which gave him more embarrassment than to apply those laws. Whether the district was misrepresented or not, he could not determine; but the the presumption was, that the gentleman who had obtained a certificate of election was entitled to the seat. Yet there was a probability that he might not be entitled to it. He was satisfied that Wednesday was too short a time, although three weeks might be too long. In relation to having a lawyer come before the House, to plead the cause of either of the gentlemen, he must protest against it. He could never consent to have a lawyer come there, who was not a member of Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM (the sitting member) presented a written communication to the House, in reference to the subject, which, by unanimous consent, was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARD moved to recommit the report to the same committee, with instructions to give time, for the purpose of taking further evidence, until the 1st day of April next.

The CHAIR remarked that the motion to postpone took precedence; but, when it was disposed of, the motion of the gentleman from New York could be entertained.

Mr. BELL said, as he understood the rules, the motion to recommit had precedence of the motion to postpone.

The CHAIR decided that the motion to postpone took precedence.

Mr. BELL then appealed from the decision of the Chair, but subsequently withdrew the appeal.

Mr. B. said it was of great importance that the rules of the House should be correctly understood. All men of experience must know that important questions were often carried by their having a priority over other questions. It was unfortunate that the question had not been brought up earlier in the session; but he did not mean to enter into the merits of the question now. He had, however, a word or two to say on the subject of its being made the order of the day for this day week. Here was a proposition to make the present question the order of the day for Wednesday next. They had already a standing order to proceed at the hour of one o'clock to the consideration of the appropriation bills; and on yesterday a gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] had said that the resolution had precisely the same effect as the standing rules of the House. That measure was adopted for great and wise considerations. The reasons urged in its favor were that the appropriation bills must be disposed of speedily.

The hour of one having arrived, Mr. BELL's remarks were arrested by the announcement of the special orders of the day.

Mr. BOYD asked the unanimous consent of the House to submit a motion for the printing of the report of the Committee of Elections; which was agreed to; when

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Virginia, from the minority of the committee, made a counter report; which was also ordered to be printed.

Mr. ABIJAH MANN moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of calling the States for petitions; which was negatived: Yeas 113, nays 58—two thirds being necessary.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the special order be postponed, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York; agreed to: Ayes 120, noes 41.

The bill was on its third reading, and the question pending was the motion of

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, to strike out the second section of the bill; which is in the following words:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the collector of the port of New York is hereby authorized and directed to extend the payment, in the manner prescribed in the first section of this act, of all other bonds given for duties at the port of New York, prior to the late fire, and not provided for in the first section, as aforesaid, for six, nine, and twelve months, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the seventeenth day of December last."

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that, under this section, about $2,700,000 would be included; that of this amount two millions have already fallen due, and that the prosecution of these bonds, at this time, would probably cost the Government between one and two hundred thousand dollars. That by extending the interest the Government would gain eighty thousand dollars in interest, which would otherwise be lost; for if the money could be collected at once, it would remain in the deposit banks without interest, in addition to the risk of losing a large portion of the principal by attempting to enforce immediate payment of the bonds.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, opposed the section at length, and maintained that the bill provided for the loan of the public money, to the merchants in New York and elsewhere, to the amount of two millions seven hundred thousand dollars. One argument of the gentleman he could not assent to the force of, viz: that the public money would remain in the deposit banks without interest. He was opposed to their having the use of any of the public money without paying for it. He again recurred to his argument, that the provisions of the second section were an effectual loan, and said it was very doubtful whether the Government had the constitutional power to loan out the public money in the way proposed. The bill was also objectionable to him in another point of view, by drawing a distinction between those who had lost to the amount of one thousand dollars, and those who had lost less, thereby bestowing its advantages upon those who possessed most and had been most fortunate, leaving the poor and needy altogether unprovided for. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STOREY,] he denied that the mercantile interest of the West would be benefited by this bill. There was no provision in the bill giving the western merchants any indulgence under it, nor had any pledge been given, or any understanding held out, that they would be indulged by the merchants of New York. He was at a loss to see wherein lay the claims of New York over any other section of country; and yet the bill was exclusively for the relief of that city.

Mr. HOWARD said that, although friendly to the bill, he had refrained from taking any part in the discussion, from an apprehension that the measure of relief might be endangered by consuming too much time in the debate; but he felt that he had a duty to perform towards those whom he had the honor of representing, by expressing very briefly what he believed to be their opinion upon the bill. He hoped, therefore, that the friends of the measure and the House would excuse him for trespassing upon a few moments of their time and patience. It had been said in the course of the debate, and not contradicted, that the meetings which were held in the commercial cities, to express public opinion, were the result of management originating in New York. As far as Baltimore was concerned, he undertook to say that the meeting was the spontaneous impulse of sympathy, and that it occurred before the ashes in New York had cooled; and every one knew that the firemen of Philadelphia had hastened with such alacrity to the assistance of their friends, that they aided in the extinguishment of the fire itself. There was another point which had been urged by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who had just taken his seat, and which was not a new objection: that the prolongation of the credit upon the bonds would be equivalent to a loan of money from the Treasury, and therefore unconstitutional. But how did the case stand? We had $2,700,000 worth of bonds in the hands of the collector, but no money—and it would be difficult to maintain the identity between money and bonds which might never be paid. Mr. H. said he had heard of a man who, when pressed for payment of a debt, at length gave his bond for it, and then thanked Heaven that "that debt was paid." Those who considered the present bill as a loan of money seemed to argue much in the same way. But it was thought unreasonable to indulge those who had not actually lost property by the fire. Those who knew the intimate fiscal connexion between classes of merchants in a city must be aware that the ability of a large portion of them to meet their engagements could not be lessened without in some degree impairing the power of the rest. They were like bees when swarming, so close was their dependence upon each other. As to the preference given by this measure to one port over another, he thought the merchants might be safely left to their own protection, without the gratuitous care of others; and it appeared, from their general friendship for this measure of relief, as if it could fairly be considered nothing more than a restoration of New York to that equality which she might otherwise lose by the recent calamity. Mr. H. insisted that the analogy derived from the indulgence heretofore extended to the debtors for public lands had not been successfully refuted. When gentlemen said that this extension of credit was owing to the reduction of the price of public lands, they forgot dates; for that alteration did not take place until 1820; and, from 1809 downwards, the statute book was full of laws extending the time of payment to those who had purchased public lands on credit. The merchant purchases, either in cash or on time, the privilege of introducing goods for consumption; and, when he becomes a debtor to Government, ought to be treated with the same indulgence which had heretofore been extended to another and meritorious class of public debtors. Mr. H. said that he thought and hoped the bill would pass, and would not consume any more time in its discussion.

Mr. DUNLAP said that he did not doubt there were many gentlemen in the House who intended to vote for the bill with the second section in it, who had not given the subject a full examination, and who believed they were only voting relief to those persons indebted to the Government, who were injured by the fire in the city of New York. Mr. Speaker, (said he,) if the members of this House will but take the trouble to read the second section, they will find that it gives a credit to all persons who have given bonds for duties on merchandise imported into the city of New York prior to the 17th day of December last. The first section gives a credit of three, four, and five years, to all those who have sustained an injury by the fire, and the second section gives a credit of six, nine, and twelve months, to all others. Now, this would be establishing a principle of giving a credit to persons who had met with no loss, and in fact had been benefited by the fire. Their rival merchants had been burnt out, and all their goods destroyed; and they still had all their goods on hand, and the competition was greatly lessened. They no doubt had advanced the price of their goods, owing to the scarcity and the demand for them. In what had they been injured, or what reason had been given for this unprecedented section? Not that the Government was likely to lose any part of her debt. But it was said that Congress had heretofore extended relief to purchasers of public lands, and that western gentlemen had not shown the difference between the relief extended to the purchasers of public lands, and the relief granted, by the second section of that bill, to the merchants of New York. Mr. D. said that when it was looked into, it would be found that, prior to April, 1820, the United States had sold, on credit, a large quantity of her lands, at very high prices, and that there was due to the Government upwards of twenty millions of dollars under the credit system. Congress changed the system of selling her lands in April, 1820, from a credit to cash sales, and reduced the price to one dollar twenty-five cents per acre.

The desideratum with Congress, in 1821, was how to save the debt due from the purchasers of public lands; and in their wisdom they passed a law authorizing the purchasers to relinquish part of their lands, and apply what had been paid therefor to the payment of the part not relinquished. It was also provided in said act, that those who paid the debt due to the United States prior to the thirtieth day of September, 1822, should be allowed a deduction of thirty-seven and a half per cent. on the amount paid. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the friends of this bill to examine one other provision of the bill of 1821, and say if they have the same provision in their bill. I allude particularly to the fifth section. That section provides that those who have laid off towns, part or whole of the lots whereof have been sold, are entitled to the benefits of the act, on condition of a remission of interest, and a discount of 20 per cent. to the purchasers of them, with a right to discharge their debts by bond, with security, in equal annual payments of four years. Here, Mr. Speaker, was a condition imposed on all those persons who were indebted to the United States for bonds, and who had been benefited by their purchase. No such condition is imposed on the persons who receive the benefit of the second section of this bill. They are not required to give a credit to all persons indebted to them; they have evidently received a benefit from the fire, and sustained no injury.

For what purpose was the relief granted to the purchasers of public lands? To secure the debt. It was known to every person, that at the time of the sale of the public lands, whereby so large a debt had become due to the United States, was in consequence of the then very high prices of all articles of agriculture, (cotton was selling at from twenty-five to thirty dollars per hundred,) and the great abundance of paper money put into circulation after the close of the war, when no bank pretended to pay specie. The great facility with which every person could procure accommodations at the bank had advanced the price of every article of property, and particularly the lands in the southern section of the Union, where they sold at from fifty to one hundred dollars per acre, and greatly over their real value. When the banks broke, money became scarce. All produce raised by the farmer fell in value. Cotton was reduced from thirty to eight or ten dollars per hundred. The Government had received only one fourth of the purchase money for her lands, and she was in danger of having them forfeited, and there was no hopes of their ever selling for one fourth of what they had sold for. It was a matter of policy, therefore, in the Government, to grant the relief she did to the purchasers. She made money by granting the relief. How was it with persons intended to be relieved by this bill? The first section provided for those who suffered by the fire, and if payment was attempted to be coerced, the Government was in danger of losing its debts; and, as a matter of policy, the credit should be extended, on the debts being secured. I have no doubt but that the Government will save money by the relief granted in the first section. Not so as to the persons relieved by the second section. They have sustained no injury, and have not shown that they are in any respect whatever unable to pay the United States the money they owe. The only argument I have heard in their favor is, that they reside in a city where property to the value of fifteen millions of dollars has been burnt. It does not follow, as a just conclusion, that they have thereby been injured, and are unable to pay at present, and that the United States would endanger her debt to attempt to collect it. I believe, sir, the argument is much stronger, from the nature of the property burnt, and that owned by the importing merchant, that the persons intended to be benefited by the second section have been benefited by the fire. I shall therefore vote to strike out the second section.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, moved a call of the House, which was ordered.

After the call had been proceeded with for some time, on motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, it was dispensed with.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the second section, and it was decided in the negative, as follows: Yeas 89, nays 116.

Mr. WILLIAMS then offered the following proviso: "Provided, That the indulgence authorized under the provision of this bill shall in no case be given without other and sufficient security be given, when, in the opinion of the collector, it shall be necessary to secure the sum due by the person or persons who ask indulgence."

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested that the bill already provided for the object proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS remarked that the language of the bill did not seem to embrace his provision.

The amendment was negatived without a count.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved the following proviso to the second section: "Provided, also, That if, in the opinion of the collector aforesaid, any of the bonds which may be given under this act, payment of which may be postponed, shall at any time be insecure, it shall be the duty of the said collector to require such additional security as shall be satisfactory to him; and on failure of such additional security being furnished, the payment thereof shall be enforced forthwith," which was agreed to.

The question then recurring on engrossing the amendments agreed to, and ordering the bill to be read the third time,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being then taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 125, nays 84:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Heman Allen, Bailey, Banks, Barton, Beardsley, Bockee, Bovee, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Bynum, William B. So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up and considering certain bills relating to the Bank of the United States.

Mr. C. explained that the Committee of Ways and Means had unanimously instructed him to make the motion, and it was indispensable that the bill in question should be acted upon before the 3d of March.

The motion was negatived, and the House then adjourned.

[H. OF R.]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday, being the subject of the contested election from North Carolina.

Mr. BOYD having moved to make the report of the Committee of Elections the special order for Wednesday next, and Mr. W. B. SHEPARD having proposed to extend the time to three weeks,

Mr. HARD moved to recommit the report to the same committee, with instructions to give time for the purpose of taking further evidence, until the first day of April next.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to postpone the report had precedence of the one to recommit.

Mr. BELL resumed the remarks which he commenced yesterday. When he rose yesterday, he did not rise to argue the propriety of negating the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BORD], he left that part of the question to other gentlemen. His main object was to make a question for the decision of the House, which he considered of the greatest importance. He alluded to the resolution making the appropriation bills the special order of the day. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] moved to make the New York fire bill the order of the day for a certain day, he must say that, although he was favorable to the speedy passage of that bill, still, had he been in his place at that time, he must have objected to its being made the special order. He would have felt it his duty to object to it, as he now felt it his duty to object to making this contested election the order of the day for Wednesday next, because he believed it to be a violation of the rules and orders of the House. On the 27th of January last, the House came to the resolution that each succeeding day, except Friday and Saturday, should be set apart for the consideration of the appropriation bills. That resolution was adopted by a vote of two thirds, and he yielded respectfully, though reluctantly, to the decision of the House. When the subject of another resolution was under consideration, the right construction was put upon that resolution; which was, that it was precisely the same as the rules of the House. Although that was the right construction, he begged leave to show that that was not the construction put upon them by the House; they considered them in the light of standing orders of the House, the execution of which any one member was entitled to call for. By that construction the orders might be changed as often as gentlemen thought proper. He thought he could demonstrate this. After one hour should have elapsed, a motion might be made that the House proceed to the orders of the day; and the question shall be put, "Will the House proceed to the orders of the day?" What, then, were the orders of the day? It was to take up the business on the Speaker's table, and dispose of it; bills from the Senate were to be read; engrossed bills read; executive communications presented; and then you arrive at the special order. If any business was made the special order, it was of course the understanding that it was to be after the morning hour. It was the order of the day from that hour. When that hour arrived, it was the practice of the Chair, heretofore, to put the question, "Will the House proceed to the orders of the day?" This was in compliance with the forty-third rule of the House. But, with regard to the resolution of the 27th of January, the Speaker had felt it his duty not to inquire of the House whether it would go to the special order, but had said that the hour had arrived for proceeding to the special order of the day. This makes it a special order, which the Speaker feels bound to obey. If that was conceded, any member might rise in his place, and call for the execution of that order, and the Chair would be out of order not to execute it. It was the standing order, by the construction placed upon it by the Chair itself. He had submitted to the decision of the Chair; but, as he had said before, reluctantly. We know that a resolution pending, of great interest to the country, was cut off by the operation of it; and on a late occasion the Chair was under the necessity of asking the consent of the House to proceed to put some bills lying on the Speaker's table to a third reading: that had to be done, from the necessity of the case. The House found that it had passed a resolution which would cut off its ordinary business. Well, on the first day that this was done, there happened to come up a bill in relation to executive patronage, which excited considerable discussion, and consumed the whole of the day. On the next morning, the Chair did not ask the consent of the House, but announced the orders of the day. A gentleman from Ohio asked the unanimous consent of the House to have those bills read and disposed of which would not excite debate; which was agreed to. Mr. B. said he had gone into the explanation to show that, by the construction given the resolution by the Chair and the House, the orders could not be set aside but by unanimous consent; however, he did not mean to interpose his veto. Whatever might have been the motives of gentlemen for adopting the resolution, he would not pretend to say; but he called upon them to look at their journal, and see the inconsistencies and contradictory orders with which it was filled. Did any gentleman know, when he arrived at the House in the morning, what business would be taken up? the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG], on yesterday, instead of calling on the House to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bills, intimated that he desired the House to take up another subject. Again, a motion was pending to make the North Carolina contested election the special order for Wednesday next. That motion came from one of the majority in the House, with whom would rest the responsibility of the measure.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose to make a brief explanation. After the New York fire bill had been ordered to a third reading, he had asked the House to go into Committee of the Whole on bills which he did not think would have occupied more than five minutes' time. He would say, however, for the future, that he would relinquish all other measures, for the purpose of getting through with the appropriation bills.

Mr. BELL was glad to hear the annunciation. Then we should not make the question of the contested election the order of the day for Wednesday next. But he wished to make a further appeal to the House. It had been seen that the order of the 27th January was unnecessary. Gentlemen had seen that of the twenty days which had expired since that order took effect, not one half of the time had been appropriated to the consideration of the appropriation bills. He hoped the House would do the justice to rescind that order, and then if they chose to make the question of the North Carolina contested election the special order of the day for a day certain, he would agree to it. He called upon the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. J. Y. MASON], who had introduced that resolution, and had enforced its passage by an appeal to the message of the President, to unite with him in his efforts to unshackle the freedom of debate; he called upon him, in the spirit of liberality, to give him his aid. The House had shown by its votes since, that there was no necessity for that measure. He hoped gentlemen would not think that he had any party interest in view in this matter. He appealed to the liberality, to the patriotism, and to the candor of gentlemen, since it had been demonstrated that the measure was no longer necessary, and when the pressing occasion which had brought it forward had passed, to rescind the resolution. Did gentlemen fear that the appropriation bills would not be taken up? He conceived there would be no opposition to taking them up. There never had been any opposition to taking up those bills, whenever the motion to take them up came from the proper quarter; he meant the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He remembered no case of objection being made, except on one occasion, and that Mr. B. had made himself, for the purpose of amending the rules and orders of the House, which he conceived to be of the utmost importance in any deliberative body. If any other opposition had been made to taking up those bills, he had no recollection of it; and he undertook further to say, that no opposition would be made. He had always yielded to the regularly constituted organs of the Government; and he believed, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENGE] should move to take up the appropriation bills, he would venture to predict that he would meet with no opposition. Then, would gentlemen not repeal the resolution he had spoken of? If it was not repealed, the effect would be that any one member might call for the execution of it.

As to the North Carolina contested election question, he left it to others to say whether it should be made the order of the day for Wednesday or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said that it might be necessary to recommit the subject to a committee, and he believed the general course to be, to lay the subject on the table, until the report and documents could be printed. He thought there would be no opposition to laying the subject on the table. It could then be taken up at any time, and acted upon, during the morning hour. He moved to lay the subject on the table; but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. JOHN Y. MASON said that the remarks which he felt himself called upon to make had no necessary connexion with the subject before the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] had made allusion not only to the resolution which he had the honor to submit to the House, but had alluded to Mr. M. personally, which made it necessary for him to reply. He did not think at the time that he introduced the resolution, nor did he think now, that the resolution had the effect the gentleman described. He could not conceive how the resolution tended to disturb or cut off debate. It would be remembered by the House, that when that resolution was brought before it, our foreign relations were on a very different footing from what they were at present. He agreed with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that the reasons urged in its favor had, in a great measure, disappeared. We had at that time no indications of the mediation of Great Britain, nor of the happy effect produced by the President's message on the councils of France. The committee were of opinion, at that time, that immediate action was necessary on the appropriation bills. The gentleman from Tennessee was right in supposing that the time had passed by when any extraordinary appropriations would be necessary; but Mr. M. must be permitted to say that the ordinary appropriation bills did require a speedy action. Some of the appropriations were already needed, and the public service must suffer until the appropriation bills were passed. There were ships of war now which could not be manned until some of those bills pass. It was a matter of vast importance that those bills should be speedily passed; and he thought the resolution adopted by the Committee on Foreign Affairs was well calculated to effect the object. It was true, that we had made but little progress; but, without meaning to cast reproach any where, he appealed to the gentleman from Tennessee to say whether the protracted discussion on the navy bill had not sprung from the motion made by the gentleman himself. It was time that the appropriation bills were disposed of. Let the appropriation bills be disposed of speedily, but with all the examination gentlemen may wish to give them, and with all the freedom of discussion asked for, and then he would be willing to rescind that resolution, unless an unlooked-for state of things should occur.

Mr. BELL said he saw already what was to be looked for. The public service was suffering, and that was to be the argument until the appropriation bills were passed. He called upon the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] to say whether the House had not, instead of going into the consideration of those bills, gone to other business, which had taken days to discuss.

Mr. J. Y. MASON said he was not responsible for the acts of other gentlemen. On one occasion he had made the motion to suspend the rule, for the purpose of receiving petitions; and as the operations of the Treasury Department had experienced considerable embarrassment, in consequence of the fire in New York, he had concurred with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENGE] in his efforts to get that bill through the House. He had, however, always been anxious, and was still anxious, to have the appropriation bills disposed of.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said, for the purpose of disposing of this question, and at the suggestion of several gentlemen near him, that it might be approached at some convenient time, if in order, he should move that it be postponed till Tuesday week, with a view of giving longer time than had been proposed on the one side, and shorter than had been asked for on the other. He would prefer that to laying it on the table, for the question was an important one to the State interested, and ought to be settled speedily. It usually happened, that cases of this kind were postponed to a remote period, or till nearly the termination of the session, before they were definitively acted on; but he hoped that course would not be followed in future. He knew nothing of the present case; and had heard scarcely one word on the subject. He understood, however, that the report and documents were not very voluminous.

It was a matter of deep regret, said Mr. M., to many gentlemen there, that the knowledge of the rules and proceedings of the House, possessed by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] should be the cause of giving him so much affliction; an affliction which seemed to press upon him daily, hourly, and continually, and which broke out sometimes to the affliction of the gentleman's own friends. Why, Mr. M. had been an observer of the proceedings there, under different administrations of the Chair, since he had had the honor of a seat there, and he had always observed that the first and regular business in order on that floor was to ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a motion to suspend the rules. That, he thought, was always business in order. As to the remedy to be applied, with regard to the various subjects that came before them, he had heard none suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, notwithstanding his great erudition in the rules and orders, and course of proceedings of that House.

That gentleman had seen fit to complain, in no very measured terms, of the decision of the present Chair in reference to the execution of the special order of the House; a decision, the gentleman informed them, not in accordance with the practice of the House, when the gentleman himself had a seat in the Chair. Now, so far as the correct proceeding might be concerned, Mr. M. would not profess to be qualified to decide between the various gentlemen who had occupied that chair, and who had found it necessary to give a construction to the various orders of the House in regard to their own proceeding. He only knew this: that, so far as his own observation extended, during the present session, comparing it with the two preceding sessions, he had not found greater or more confusion in the order of business now than heretofore. He was not, therefore, to attribute what confusion had arisen to the decisions of the Chair. Those decisions had been usually in accordance with the express orders of the House.

The gentleman from Tennessee said that, when the House had made an express special order, it became the duty of the Chair first to take up certain business on the Speaker's table, before that special order was executed. If so, then there would be very little use in making a special order at all.

Mr. CRAIG rose to a point of order, on the ground that the gentleman's remarks were not pertinent to the question before the House.

The CHAIR was of opinion that the debate was taking too wide a range. It was understood, however, to be the object of the gentleman from Tennessee, and other gentlemen, to show that the House should or should not make this special order, because there were other special orders; and any reason why the House should or should not adopt any special order would be in order.

Mr. MANN expressed his obligations to his friend from Virginia [Mr. CRAIG] for admonishing him that they were debating a very different question, and he would endeavor to conform himself somewhat to it. He was only replying to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, who, while he was complaining of want of order in the proceedings of the House, was, as Mr. M. considered, at the time, as widely out of order as any thing that could be found upon the records and journals of either that or the former session of the House. That being so, with the admonition of his friend from Virginia, he would resume his seat.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BOYD asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would withdraw the motion, as the sitting member had asked for more time to take further testimony; and it was therefore necessary to appoint some definite time for the consideration of the report.

Mr. MERCER hoped the call for the yeas and nays would be withdrawn, as about half the time of the session was consumed in taking them.

Mr. WILLIAMS then withdrew his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BELL denied that he had spoken disrespectfully of the Chair; and, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] had thrown no new light upon the subject, Mr. B. must say that what had fallen from the gentleman was impertinent.

Mr. MANN said he might have misunderstood the gentleman. He did not understand him to speak disrespectfully of the Chair, or in a spirit of complaint towards the Chair, but only in a spirit of complaint of the decisions of the Chair, in regard to the order of business. If it was "impertinent" to speak of the gentleman's complaint, then, surely, the gentleman himself must have been "impertinent" in making the complaint of those decisions.

The CHAIR pronounced the motion of the gentleman from New York, to postpone until Tuesday week, not to be then in order.

Mr. BOYD said he was willing to accept it as a modification of his own motion.

The CHAIR informed the gentleman that he could not do it without an order or instruction from the Committee of Elections, the original motion being so made to the House.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD then withdrew his motion to postpone till Wednesday three weeks.

The CHAIR announced the orders of the day, the hour of one o'clock having arrived.

Mr. McKAY moved to suspend the rules, in order to proceed with the consideration of the report before the House, and modified it for one hour, at the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG; but the motion, was lost, without a count, and the House proceeded to the order of the day.

By the consent of the House, several bills from the Senate, on the Speaker's table, were taken up, read twice, and referred to the appropriate committees.

LIMITATION OF THE TERM OF OFFICE.

Mr. PATTON moved that the House proceed to dispose of the bill on the Speaker's table, from the Senate, repealing the first and second sections of the act to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named, and for other purposes.

Mr. P. asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question on taking up the bill was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 104, nays 104—the Speaker voting in the affirmative, making the yeas 105.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Ashley, Bailey, Banks Barton, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Mr. PATTON remarked that, in moving to adjourn when the subject was last before the House, his object was not so much to address the House as to arrest what he considered an irrelevant discussion upon a simple question of commitment—a question not involving the merits of the bill, nor the consistency or inconsistency of parties or men heretofore. In order, however, that his motives and views might not be misunderstood, he would remark that he entertained strong prepossessions against this bill.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that the merits of the bill could not be discussed upon the pending motions; and that the range which the debate had taken on a former day would not be further permitted.

Mr. PATTON resumed. He did not intend to discuss the merits of the bill at this time. He had merely desired to say that he had strong prepossessions of opinion against the bill, which might possibly be changed by further reflection and discussion of the question involved in it. He had a few words to say in reference to what committee the subject ought to be referred. In doing this, it was necessary that he should advert to the character of the bill. It was a measure of vast magnitude, involving serious and important fundamental principles. It involved not only the question of constitutionality, but the expediency of the power of removal from office by the President of the United States—questions which had excited and agitated the country as much as any others which had ever been brought before it. It was a bill which ought to receive the most solemn, deliberate, and thorough examination possible. Could it be so well examined by a committee which had already before it a vast burden of important business as by a select committee raised for the special purpose? There could be but one response to the inquiry. Supposing every thing else out of the way, was there any thing appropriate or apposite in referring this subject to the Committee on the Judiciary? It was absolutely amazing to hear gentlemen contend, as had been done there, that this subject came within the functions of the Judiciary Committee, by the express terms of the rule. If the ground assumed should be sustained, that committee would draw within the vortex of its duties nine tenths of the business which came before the House. Without desiring to detract in the least from the eulogiums which had been made upon the Committee on the Judiciary, for their intelligence and legal attainments, he denied that there was any thing in the character of the committee, or the materials of which it was composed, which befitted them more than others to examine this question of constitutional law, or any other question. The subject was one which, from its broad character, did not peculiarly belong to any committee of the House. There was a special reason for not sending it to the Judiciary Committee, which, he repeated, was burdened with a mass of business greater than any other committee of the House, and could not, consequently, act on the subject as speedily as a select committee. It was desirable that the question should be disposed of one way or the other, in order that the country might decide upon the course of the Senate and this branch of Congress. He should therefore vote to commit the bill to a select committee, not only as an appropriate reference, but with the view of ensuring a speedy examination of the important subjects with which it was connected.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There could be nothing gained by referring the bill to a select committee. A report from such a committee, one way or another, was a matter of no consequence. By the adoption of his motion, an opportunity would be afforded to discuss the subject in the most free and ample manner. It ought to be so discussed. It was in this mode that gentlemen of all parties, and of no party, (if any such there were,) would have every facility for a full discussion.

The question was then taken on the last motion, and decided in the affirmative, without a count.

So the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then took up, for a third reading, the engrossed bill from the Senate, as amended by the House, "for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York."

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, addressed the House at great length in opposition to the whole bill, and reviewed the various arguments and precedents that had been urged and adduced in its support. Before Mr. P. had concluded, he gave way to Mr. BOULDIN, on whose motion the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be, first, on making the report the special order for Wednesday next, the motion of Mr. W. B. SHEPARD being understood by the Chair to have been withdrawn.

Mr. SHEPARD reminded the Chair that he had not withdrawn his motion, although he had intimated an intention of so doing.

The CHAIR said that the journal so stated; and it was also his own impression that the gentleman had withdrawn his motion. The journal could, however, be corrected.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD said, when he made the motion to postpone the subject for three weeks, he did so because the Chair was about to put the question on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BORN] to make it the order of the day for Wednesday next. He felt sensible that it was impossible, in that short space of time, for gentlemen to give the documents that careful examination which they required, to come to a correct decision. Every gentleman must be familiar with the difficulty of examining into such a matter. He had, however, since learned from his colleague, the sitting member, that his motion had, in some degree, interfered with the disposition which was intended to be made of the matter. It appeared that a gentleman from the Committee of Elections had made a proposition, which he understood to come from the minority of that committee, that the subject should be recommitted to that committee, for the purpose of taking further testimony in the case. He therefore intended to withdraw his proposition to postpone for three weeks; but he did so with the distinct understanding that the sitting member should be permitted to procure all the testimony necessary, and have his claims to his seat clearly stated, before the House came to act upon it. He hoped the House would send the matter back to the committee, and give the sitting member time to make out his case as fully as possible; and there was nothing inconsistent in giving the subject that direction. He confessed he was mortified to hear his colleague [Mr. BURNUM] say, that the sitting member had misrepresented his district on that floor. Did he mean that the sitting member was wasting the time of the House in unprofitable discussion, which served only to fill the columns of a filthy newspaper? If he meant to say that when a gentleman came to the House of Representatives by the vote of a majority of the people of his district, and attested by the proper officers, that that man misrepresented his constituents, he thanked God that he misrepresented his in the same way. How did the sitting member come there? He came with the certificate of election from the proper officers. Then, if you refuse to give him an opportunity to show that he is entitled to his seat, you stamp the charge of falsehood upon the returning officers. Mr. S. said he had made these remarks with no understanding with the sitting member, or with the members on the Committee of Elections. He did not know the nature of their report; and he had not the facility of intellect of his colleague, [Mr. BYNUM], to enable him to jump to conclusions without examination. He was willing the characters of gentlemen there should stand unimpeached until they were proved to be otherwise. He did not know the nature either of the majority or minority report, and he would not express an opinion in the case until he could examine it. He neither knew nor cared who they said was entitled to the seat; all he asked was that the House would not prejudice it before the necessary testimony could be procured. If the House took up this matter at an early day, it would deny the right of being heard to a large and respectable district of North Carolina; and on this subject they ought to hear every thing. His colleague [Mr. BYNUM] had told them that the present subject had been before the House for four months. The House had not yet been in session four months, and during the time it had been in session the subject was before the Committee of Elections; and how could any one there have ascertained any thing of the matter, except by going before the committee? And that would not have been the parliamentary course. It was utterly impossible to get the facts of the case except by having time to examine it.

Contested Election.

Mr. BYNUM said he sincerely regretted the course he perceived the discussion was likely to take. His honorable friend and colleague, [Mr. W. B. SHEPARD], a day or two since, expressed surprise and regret at the course taken in relation to this matter; he must confess that that gentleman entertained no more surprise and regret at the course he (Mr. B.) was about to pursue, than he felt at the course and proposition which that gentleman himself had made. He then thought, and he still thought, that, upon that occasion, gentlemen had manifested extraordinary and unnecessary sensibility. A gentleman who spoke the other day, and his colleague, who had just addressed the House, had expressed their astonishment at a statement which he had made, wishing a speedy termination of that question. He thought they had done him a little injustice in supposing that he was actuated from any motive less honorable and patriotic than themselves. They had also done him injustice, no doubt unintentionally, in misrepresenting his motives in respect to his colleague, the sitting member. He never intended to be understood as saying that that gentleman had misrepresented his district. What he had said was this: that if that gentleman was not the legitimate Representative on that floor, the people of that district had been long enough misrepresented. He had not expressed an opinion, but he again repeated, that if that gentleman was not entitled to a seat on that floor, he had been long enough there. He agreed most fully with his colleague, when he said they should not act until they had all the lights in the case which could be had; and until the documents were published and laid before the House. He should be the last man to urge the matter, until the documents were printed and laid upon the table of every member of the House. He again repeated that he was astonished at the remarks of his friend on the right, [Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD], and his colleague on the left [Mr. W. B. SHEPARD], when they endeavored to impeach him of having brought a charge against the sitting member. The simple statement was, that if he was not the legitimate Representative, there had been a sufficiency of misrepresentation. He himself was not decided upon the subject; he wanted to have more light, as well as the gentleman himself; but from what he had understood, if he might be permitted to express an opinion, he was predisposed to believe that the sitting member was not entitled to his seat.

The CHAIR remarked that the gentleman was not in order, in entering into the merits of the question before the main question came up.

Mr. BYNUM said he should endeavor to confine himself to the question before the House. He did believe that the motion of his colleague [Mr. W. B. SHEPARD] went to postpone the question longer than was absolutely necessary to have the House placed in possession of all the information necessary. For that reason he had opposed that motion, and still opposed it. He had been informed by those who had conversed with the printers to the House on the subject, that the documents would be printed and laid on the tables within eight or ten days; and they had also been told that, when the documents were laid on the tables, the whole subject could be investigated in a few hours. Then, where could be the necessity for postponing the subject three weeks? The gentleman who had just taken his seat had made some remarks which he did not distinctly understand. He supposed a case, and supposed that if he (Mr. B.) meant to say that the individual who occupied a seat on that floor did so for the purpose of filling the filthy columns of a newspaper, that he had made an erroneous charge. He did not understand the gentleman's allusion, and should like to be correctly informed.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD said, the remarks he had made were general. He had said that he did not exactly understand what his colleague [Mr. BYNUM] meant when he said the sitting member misrepresented his constituents on that floor. He further said, that if his colleague meant that any individual used his station there to get up useless discussions and unnecessary squabbles, to fill the columns of a newspaper, such an allusion would make any gentleman feel uneasy in his seat.

Mr. BYNUM said he would, on all proper occasions, express his opinions; but as to consumption of the time of the House, he believed himself and his colleague were on about an equal footing. He did not say, however, that he had consumed too much time; for Mr. B. had always heard him with the greatest pleasure. His colleague seemed to regret that he was not possessed of the facility of intellect to judge of the present question without time. He believed that, after the documents were printed and laid on the tables, every gentleman would be possessed of sufficient facility of intellect to judge of the case, without a postponement of three or four weeks. He believed that most of the information which would be brought in them was known now to the majority of the members of the House. Mr. B. would be the last man in the House to do an act of injustice to the sitting member; but while he would not do that gentleman injustice, he would be unworthy of maintaining a seat on that floor, was he to be guilty of committing an act of injustice to the gentleman who was petitioning for his seat. He was disposed to do both justice. His colleague had said that Mr. B. had stated that the subject had been before the House for four months. Mr. B. had remarked that if the motion was made and carried to postpone for three weeks, then it would have been before the House between three and four months. He hoped the House would not follow the example set them last winter, but that they would decide upon the subject speedily. In the case of the Moore and Letcher contested election, the documents were much more voluminous; and yet only one week was allowed for considering it after the documents were printed. With regard to his friend from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS], he had always had the profoundest respect for his opinions, and he approved his course, apart from his political views; but it did appear to him, that to lay that subject on the table was rather undignified.

Contested Election.

He had looked over the journal, and had never seen any disposition made of the report of a committee, but by making it the order for a particular day. He believed that the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] to postpone it until Tuesday week, would allow ample time to examine the subject, and he hoped that motion would prevail.

Mr. SHEPARD then withdrew his proposition.

Mr. MANN, of New York, then renewed his motion to postpone the subject till Tuesday week.

Mr. GRAHAM (the sitting member) begged to inquire if the pending question was not the motion of the gentleman from New York, a member of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. HARR,] to recommit.

The CHAIR stated that, under the thirty-second rule, that motion gave way to the motion to postpone. The Chair had made the same decision a few days ago, and in that opinion, independent of the rule, upon examination, he found himself sustained by the lex parliamentaria.

Mr. GRAHAM was desirous, he said, that the motion submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARR] should be decided by the House, before the question was taken on the postponement to a given day. It was true, as his colleague who had just taken his seat had remarked, that this was an important case; but it was more important that whenever a cause was about to be tried, it should be tried impartially, in such a way as to do justice between the parties, and to give satisfaction to the district interested in the issue. That was all he asked, and nothing more; and to which he humbly conceived he was entitled. He would not ask the House to try the cause without hearing the evidence; for he held the House to be in the situation of judges and jurors. It would be thought very strange for a judge or juror, about to go into the investigation of a cause, out of court or on the bench, before he had heard one word of the testimony, to express his opinion. It would be said he was forestalling the verdict, or, at least, that he had strong prejudices, and would not be considered as competent to give an impartial decision.

Mr. G. assured the House that he desired no delay, but sought for justice; and he would give to the House a few facts, to show the inconvenience to which the sitting member had been subjected. In the first place, the petitioner was in the situation of a plaintiff in a court of justice, who was necessarily in advance of the defendant with his testimony, and could not be taken by surprise. The defendant, like the sitting member in the present case, had no opportunity of knowing what testimony he should have to hunt up, nor what he should have to make replication to. Now, the elections in North Carolina were held on the second Thursday in August. The petitioner (Mr. Newland) being one of the three candidates before the people, did not give the sitting member notice until the second day of October of his intention to contest the seat, having had nearly two months to ascertain, as well as he could, the nature and character of his testimony. Before that he did not think proper to take any stand, contrary to the general rule of contested elections, where notice was very often given at the moment, though they were afterwards abandoned. The sitting member did not deem it his duty to take any active steps until the petitioner had commenced taking his depositions. On Thursday, the 29th October, the petitioner commenced, and continued through Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. He then went to another place, thirty-eight miles off, and commenced taking depositions on the Monday following, continuing through Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. The notices were so arranged that the sitting member attended with the petitioner. He then received a notice to attend some sixty-seven or sixty-eight miles on the Monday following; and he attended accordingly.

Mr. BYNUM begged to inquire if it was in order for his colleague to go into a detailed statement of the case at that stage of the proceeding?

The CHAIR replied that, though the merits of the question were not open, the gentleman had a right to state the grounds upon which he urged that the House should not postpone the subject to a day certain, or why he desired further time, with a view that the House should act on the motion to commit.

Mr. BYNUM would then ask if it would not be an act of justice to admit the petitioner to a seat on the floor, either in person or by counsel, to reply to the statements made by the gentleman himself, which, it was evident, must be prejudicial to the petitioner?

The CHAIR replied that that was a matter for the decision of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM proceeded. He was about to state the reasons, and he was borne out by the facts, why the sitting member should have an opportunity of placing the whole evidence before the House.

The depositions commenced on the 29th of October, and continued step by step, day after day, in constant succession, keeping the sitting member in a constant attendance for upwards of twenty days, until he was compelled to take his departure for Washington city.

The Mountain district, which Mr. G. had the honor to represent, was not only one of the most populous in point of numbers, but, for extent of territory, was perhaps the largest in the United States. The population was sparse; but the district was nearly two hundred miles in length, and about eighty or ninety in width, being shaped like a mall. Now, how was it possible for mortal man to have travelled over this whole space, and collect and investigate testimony, in so short a time? This was one reason why, in justice, he asked for further time to enable him to lay the whole of the evidence before the House.

Mr. G. then entered into a lengthy statement of the proceedings before the Committee of Elections on the subject of a protest he had offered, and of his application to be heard on the principles of that paper. From the Christmas holidays he had heard nothing from the committee, until about the 15th or 16th of January, when the committee assembled, and desired to know if the parties had any thing further to say. The sitting member then informed them that he had anxiously and confidently hoped that his protest would have been passed upon, and an extension of time given him to collect further testimony. Some time afterwards he was notified by the chairman of the committee that further time would not be allowed, and Mr. G. supposed he had then no right to make the motion in the House, because it had referred the whole subject to the committee. These were substantially the facts upon which he grounded his appeal to the House, that further time should be given him to take depositions.

Mr. HOWARD desired to make an inquiry of the committee, the necessity of which sprung from the remarks of the gentleman who had just taken his seat. It was proper that the inquiry should be made and promptly answered, because something like censure had been imputed to the committee. A report had been brought in from a standing committee of the House, after two months of inquiry; and upon the very same day that that report was brought in, the House was called upon to grant further time to take depositions. From the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GRAHAM,] it appeared that, on the 15th or 16th of January last, he applied to that committee for the privilege he then sought to obtain at the hands of the House. Now, if the House should undertake to grant that time, it struck Mr. H. that it would be entertaining an appeal from the decision of that committee, and reversing its opinions. They would be casting an implied censure upon the committee, for refusing to do, after mature deliberation, what the House itself saw fit to do the moment it was called upon.

The inquiry Mr. H. desired to make was this: He wished to know from the committee, what were their reasons for refusing, about the 15th or 16th of January, further time to the sitting member to take depositions? Being himself altogether ignorant of the merits of the case, and anxious to keep himself so until he was in possession of the testimony, he put this inquiry, in order that he might judge if the committee had erred or not in refusing to grant what the House was then called upon to grant.

Mr. BOYD, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD,] and to the remarks of the sitting member, said he had to state that the evidence before the committee showed that the petitioner gave notice, sixty-six days before the meeting of Congress, of his intention to contest the election of the sitting member. It was true, as stated by the gentleman from North Carolina, that the first depositions were taken on the 29th of October; and from that time up to the meeting of Congress the parties were each engaged in taking depositions; and as to the inconvenience complained of by the sitting member, that he was notified to take depositions at one point to-day, and at another seventy miles distant to-morrow, Mr. B. had only to say that that inconvenience, if it could be called such, operated reciprocally. The fact was, each of the gentlemen attended, either by themselves or by their agents, all the appointments for taking depositions; and they examined and cross-examined all the witnesses, except in one solitary instance; and in that case the sitting member, who failed to attend, had twenty-four or five days' notice given him. The committee thought an equal opportunity had been given the parties for taking testimony, and that sixty-six days was a sufficient time to collect all the evidence necessary to enable that House to determine who was entitled to the contested seat. These were some of the reasons which induced the committee to reject the application of the sitting member for time to take additional testimony. It seemed to Mr. B. singular that gentlemen who thought further time should be given for taking testimony should be found also urging the propriety of putting off the examination of the whole subject for more than three weeks. Ought they not rather, said Mr. B., to join in making this subject the special order of the day for Wednesday next, or some other early day, that we may act so soon as the testimony is printed and laid upon our tables? This course seemed to him to be the proper one, unless gentlemen were disposed to act without evidence, except such as should be furnished by the sitting member and the individual members of the committee. He, Mr. B., had no feeling on this subject; and in the whole investigation of this case he had been influenced alone by a desire to do justice to all concerned, and he had no doubt all the members of the committee had been actuated by a similar desire.

Mr. HARD merely wished to remark, in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOYD,] that the minority of the committee desired to put this matter off. He also wished to explain why he had submitted his motion to recommit. It would be recollected that when the gentleman from Kentucky made this report of the majority of the committee, the sitting member obtained the unanimous consent of the House to submit his protest, and it was also unanimously ordered to be printed, and Mr. H. had supposed that that paper furnished subject-matter upon which the House could act. With that view, he had submitted the motion that the prayer or application of the sitting member might be granted. It also then occurred to him and he still believed that motion to be in order, the House having granted their consent that he should submit his application; and he should still insist upon his motion, and renew it, that the sitting member have further time to make an examination of the evidence.

Mr. BOYD again rose, but the Speaker announced that the hour devoted to morning business had expired.

Mr. RENCHER remarked that it was exceedingly important that this subject should be promptly decided; and, in order to effect that object, he moved that the rules of the House be suspended, with a view to make some disposition of it; but the motion was rejected: Ayes 105, noes 58—not two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then made a similar motion, with a view to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York; which was lost without a count.

JESSE SMITH AND OTHERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Jesse Smith and others.

Mr. OWENS concluded the remarks against the bill, which he had commenced on a former day.

The bill was further advocated by Mr. WHITTLESEY, and opposed by Mr. CRAIG; when

Mr. DUNLAP moved the previous question; and, upon seconding the same, there appeared: Ayes 79, noes 31. No quorum voting.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved a call of the House; which was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; but, before the same was gone through with,

Mr. GARLAND moved to suspend further proceedings under the call; which was agreed to: Ayes 79, noes 53.

The previous question was then seconded: Ayes 95, noes not counted.

The question "Shall the main question be now put?" was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 111, nays 72.

So the bill was passed.

HEIRS OF JAMES LATHAM.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. PHILLIPS in the chair, upon the bill for the relief of the heirs of James Latham, deceased.

[This bill provides that the heirs of James Latham be permitted to enter a quarter section of land, by virtue of a pre-emption, in the State of Illinois. Mr. VINTON, of Ohio, moved to amend the same by restricting the entry to the location of such lands as are now in the market.]

Mr. MAY rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The opposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] to the bill now under consideration is by no means unexpected; for I have yet to see the first instance in which that gentleman has failed to exert his influence to defeat every measure connected with a liberal disposition of any portion of the public lands, especially if such disposition were likely to confer upon the people of the West the slightest benefit. Sir, had the gentleman been only a few moments since as solicitous to guard the Treasury as he now is to preserve the public lands, he would have voted with me against the allowance of a claim of 30,000 dollars which has just passed this House in the shape of a bill. But, whilst claims for large amounts against the Government are received and favorably considered by this House, the just claims of the people of the West to land, however limited in quantity and trifling in amount, are resisted with an opposition of the most determined character. Sir, I shall not trespass longer upon the time and attention of this House than may be necessary briefly to explain the nature and origin of the claim upon which this bill is predicated, and the reasons that influenced the Committee on Private Land Claims to report it to the House. This claim has been twice acted upon by the committee, and on each occasion there was no difference of opinion among them as to the propriety of granting relief. Last year a bill similar to the one now under consideration was reported and passed the House, but, for the want of time alone, failed in the Senate.

By reference to an act of Congress, passed on the 5th day of February, 1813, it will be seen that the right of pre-emption to 160 acres of land was, upon certain conditions, granted to every settler upon the public lands residing within the limits of the two land districts established at Vincennes and Kaskaskia, for the Territory of Illinois. The register and receiver at Vincennes, when called upon to act under this law, refused to allow the right of pre-emption to certain persons, as not being within the boundaries of the land district at Vincennes. This decision was afterwards found to be erroneous, and Congress, to remedy the hardships endured by the settlers, thus improperly denied the right of pre-emption by the decision of the land officers, passed a law on the 11th of May, 1820, allowing all such persons as had been thus deprived of the benefits intended to be conferred by act of Congress of —, 1813, to appear before the register at Vincennes, and upon their making proof that they would have been entitled to the right of pre-emption under the former law, had that law been correctly construed, and that they had not purchased the land claimed by them, either at public sale or private entry, the register was authorized to issue a certificate in favor of such persons, setting forth the fact of such proof having been made; and upon the production of such certificate at any land office in the State of Illinois, the original pre-emptor, or his legal representative, was entitled to enter 160 acres of any of the lands of the United States lying within the limits of the State of Illinois, which had been surveyed prior to the 1st of September, 1820, whether the same had been offered at public sale or not. Such, sir, is the origin of what is called the Vincennes pre-emption floating claims, and it was in virtue of one of these claims that the present town of Peoria was located by James Latham in his lifetime. For the period of almost seven years after this tract of land was purchased by Latham, although the Commissioner of the General Land Office was often urged to issue a patent in favor of the purchaser, he refused to do so. This refusal on the part of the Government to recognise the validity of the sale of the land was produced by the county commissioners of Peoria county, who made application to purchase the same land for county purposes, under the general pre-emption law of 26th May, 1824. The land officers at Springfield rejected the application of the commissioners of Peoria county to purchase the land, and it remained in this situation till Congress, on the 2d March, 1833, passed an act by which the county commissioners were authorized to enter the land, subject to the claim of Latham's heirs. Had the Commissioner of the General Land Office decided within a reasonable time the entry made by Latham to have been legal or illegal, which he was urged to do, Latham would have acquiesced, for he then could have selected other lands equal, or at least but little inferior in value, to the tract of which he has been deprived. But by reason of the great delay on the part of the Commissioner to make any decision in the case, Latham lost all opportunity of locating other lands, as almost all of the public lands which were surveyed prior to the 1st of September, 1820, were offered at public sale, and subject to private entry before the heirs of Latham ascertained that they would not be permitted to hold the land acquired by them, without a lawsuit. Sir, would the passage of this bill confer upon the heirs of Latham any greater or higher privilege than they enjoyed at the time of the location of the tract embracing Peoria? I undertake to say that it would not. The bill proposes only to give them the right to select from any of the public lands in Illinois which may now be surveyed, a quantity of land not exceeding 160 acres, by paying to the Government the minimum price of said lands.

It is well known that there are but few townships of surveyed lands now in Illinois, which have not been offered at public sale; and in those few, most of the valuable lands have already been taken by floats, under the pre-emption law of 1834. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Vinton] expresses his apprehensions that the present bill, if it become a law, will enable the heirs of Latham to locate mineral lands, salt springs, or situations embracing water privileges. Sir, I am greatly surprised that the gentleman, coming, as he does, from a State in which the public lands are situated, should possess so little knowledge of the subject upon which he has spoken. Does not the gentleman know that all mineral lands, as well as salt springs, are expressly reserved from sale, and are not subject to location? But if such were not the fact, still the passage of this bill would not enable the heirs of Latham to obtain, by their location, either mineral lands or salt springs; for the mineral lands lying within the State of Illinois are yet unsurveyed, nor is it believed that salt water is any where to be found upon any lands of the United States in Illinois, not heretofore offered at public sale.

The gentleman has alluded to the claim of an individual to the tract of land embracing Fort Dearborn. Sir, the gentleman's object cannot be mistaken. By referring to the claim, and value of the land, a prejudice is sought to be created against the heirs of Latham. It is not my purpose now to enter into any discussion on the merits of the claim to the tract of land embracing Fort Dearborn. The decision of that question belongs to another tribunal; but I feel constrained to repel the slanderous insinuation, made against the claimant of that tract, who has been represented by the gentleman from Ohio to be a poor dealer in whiskey. This, sir, is not the fact; Mr. Beaubien, although not rich enough perhaps to command the respect of the gentleman from Ohio, is not a dealer in whiskey. Had this property fallen into the hands of some rich speculator, perhaps the gentleman from Ohio would have regarded it with greater complacency. Sir, it is painful to witness the narrow-minded, contracted policy, on the part of some members of this House, in relation to any liberal disposition of the public domain. The people of the West have been again and again stigmatized on this floor as land-pirates and robbers. Sir, if the application of these opprobrious epithets are to be indulged in, it is not difficult to foresee the result. It must, in the nature of things, tend to alienate the feelings and affections of the people of the new States from those of the older members of the confederacy. The people of the West rejoice in the prosperity of their Atlantic brethren; they murmur not at the vast expenditures of public money, annually made, for the protection of their commerce, the improvement of their harbors, and the fortification of their seaboard; but while such enormous sums of the revenue of the nation are thus expended, they confidently expect that their own wants will enlist the sympathies and feelings of their northern as well as southern friends; and least of all do they expect to have hurled at them, when modestly urging those wants upon the consideration of this House, epithets which belong quite as much to those who use them as to those to whom they are applied.

Sir, the only land-pirates known in Illinois are found among the avaricious speculators who come among us, and who, in the absence of pre-emption laws, are enabled to purchase the improvements of the honest settler without rendering him therefor any equivalent whatever.

Sir, the gentleman from Ohio tells us that if Latham's heirs have acquired any right to the land embracing the present town of Peoria, their claim has not been impaired by the action of Congress, in passing a law authorizing the entry of the same land by the county commissioners of Peoria county. The heirs themselves thought differently; at least, they saw no prospect of maintaining their rights, without a long, tedious, and vexatious lawsuit, the great expense of which they were not well qualified to support; and as Congress, by its legislation, has left them no other alternative than a lawsuit, or an abandonment of their just rights, it would be strange indeed if they would add to their injustice by refusing to pass the present bill. The wild lands in Illinois are estimated far beyond their real value. It is only when these lands are cultivated and improved by what some term the squatters, that they command more than the minimum price of the Government. There is not an instance within my knowledge where any of the public lands in Illinois have sold for more than $1 25 per acre, except at the sales of the public lands at Chicago in June last, when some of those lands near that place sold perhaps as high as $10 per acre, and some lands which were lying along the line of the Illinois and Michigan canal sold in a few instances for from 3 to 4 dollars per acre. It cannot, then, be imagined that the heirs of Latham are likely to realize any great advantage from the passage of this bill.

Sir, let us now consider for a moment the character of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio to this bill. In that amendment he proposes to allow the heirs of Latham to locate their float upon any lands which are now subject to private entry. Would such an amendment confer any privilege upon Latham's heirs which they do not already enjoy, and which is not possessed by every man in the Union? Does not the gentleman know that it requires no additional legislation to enable the heirs of Latham or any other person to purchase as much land as they have money to pay for at private entry? Whence, then, the necessity or propriety of passing a law authorizing persons to do that which they may do already? Sir, I hope the House will at least save themselves from the imputation of folly so gross as that of authorizing, by the enactment of a special law, persons to do that which they now have the right to do without additional legislation. But, sir, the amendment offered to the bill proposes, instead of conferring a privilege, to deprive the heirs of Latham of a right they already possess—a right secured to them under the act of 11th May, 1820, to which I have already alluded, and in virtue of which they can now locate their claim upon any of the lands of the United States in Illinois which may have been surveyed prior to the 1st of September, 1820. But, Mr. Chairman, I have already detained the House longer than I had intended, and I shall conclude by expressing the hope that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio may not be adopted.

After taking up and considering some other bills, the committee rose and reported the bill, with an amendment; and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

After several unsuccessful attempts by members to procure a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of presenting petitions, the House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, against the sitting member, [Mr. GRAHAM,] on the subject of the North Carolina contested election; two motions pending:

one to postpone the consideration of the subject to next Wednesday, and make it the special order for that day; and the motion of Mr. MANN, of New York, to postpone it to Tuesday week.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he understood the question now before the House to be a motion to fix a day certain for the consideration of the report presented by the Committee of Elections, and he also understood that the sitting member, [Mr. GRAHAM,] and other honorable gentlemen, contended that the sitting member ought to have longer time for the taking of testimony; and he had already heard of a motion to recommit this case to the Committee of Elections, to the end that he might have further time. He was for taking up the case after the lapse of the shortest period of time within which the testimony and report could be printed, and gentlemen could possess themselves of the case.

The prominent facts of this case, as he had heard them from gentlemen of the Committee of Elections, who had addressed the House yesterday, and also from the sitting member, were these: In October last, and more than sixty days before the commencement of the present session of Congress, the petitioner gave notice to the sitting member that he would contest his right to a seat in this House: the parties some time afterwards took testimony; the petitioner came here with his petition, and it was referred to the Committee of Elections. They proceeded to act upon the case, and about the middle of January, and after more than six weeks had elapsed since the committee had entered upon the case, the sitting member applied to the committee for further time to take testimony. The committee refused to give such time, and have reported to us that the petitioner is entitled to his seat. The sitting member has addressed to us a paper, in the shape of a petition, for further time to take testimony.

He humbly conceived that this application could not be granted, consistently with the rights of the petitioner, and, what were more important, the rights of the electors of the district to which the gentleman belonged. He objected, wholly objected, to the position urged by the honorable sitting member on yesterday, that he was not obliged to commence taking his evidence until the petitioner had commenced taking his testimony. The sitting member was notified that his seat would be contested; he knew what evidence, what materials, he could command to fortify his claim to a seat; and it was his duty to secure them, with all reasonable diligence. He need not have waited till after the other party had taken his incipient steps. The law and reason in matters of this kind favored only the diligent. The sitting member had told us that his district was very large. Mr. V. thought, that if it was as large as was represented, sixty-four days was, in all conscience, time enough to have procured his testimony. The gentleman's State was very large, but he ventured to say that the laws and courts of his State did not require more than fourteen or twenty days' notice of trial in civil cases, though a party might have witnesses in the extremest portion of the State. But this was not all; not only had the sitting member had abundance of time to take his testimony before the meeting of Congress, but he was chargeable with most fatal laches for not making an earlier application for an extended time for taking testimony. Instead of making this application when the committee first entered upon their duties, it seemed he had waited till the middle of January, and then made this application to the grace and favor of the House. This application, after this lapse of time, was not only unprecedented, but he (Mr. V.) had found a precedent very much against allowing such indulgence. He here referred to the case of Taliaferro vs. Hungerford, reported in a book of contested elections in Congress, page 248. There, the sitting member, before the examination of the evidence was gone into, asked for time to take testimony. The Committee of Elections reported a resolution to allow him further time. The House refused to concur in this resolution, by a vote of 46 to 65. A motion to recommit the subject to the Committee of Elections was lost, and the House then passed a resolution that the petitioner was entitled to a seat in this House, by a vote of 67 to 29. The sitting member here, it will be perceived, does not make out as strong a case as did the sitting member in the case reported. There, the sitting member, before the examination of the case was gone into by the committee, asked for time to take testimony. Here, it seems that he waited more than six weeks before he made such application. What might be the consequence, if we granted the indulgence here asked for? Why, a party might first wait two or three months, and speculate first upon the chance of getting a favorable report from the committee; and then, upon ascertaining that the report would be adverse to him, he might come here and ask for and receive further time to take testimony, and thus protract the final decision of the case till near the end of the session. There was a time, in all tribunals, when testimony was to be considered as closed; and if, after the parties had had sixty-four days' notice to take evidence, and after having been six weeks before the first tribunal, (the committee,) we should grant an application to take supplemental testimony, he would only say it would be an instance of indulgence as extraordinary as it was unprecedented. Mr. V. said that the remarks he had submitted were made with a feeling of entire kindness and respect for the honorable sitting member; and without knowing any thing of the merits of the case, or how he should vote on the merits, he had felt constrained to say what he had said in relation to this preliminary question.

Mr. CLAIRBORNE, of Virginia, begged leave to make a response to an inquiry put yesterday by an honorable member from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD:] an inquiry that might be expected to come from every member disposed to give this matter a candid and impartial consideration. The inquiry would be distinctly recollected, and it was to this effect: what were the reasons which influenced the committee, both the majority and minority, the latter in agreeing, and the former refusing, to grant further time to take testimony? Mr. C. would not answer for others, but he could for himself. He had voted for giving additional time, for reasons that were perfectly satisfactory to his own mind; and he thought he should be able to satisfy the House that additional time ought, under existing circumstances, indispensably to be given, to advance the great cause of truth and justice. It was true that the petitioner gave the adverse party sixty-six days' notice, when, by the laws of North Carolina, he might only have given thirty; but then there was only an interval of thirty days from October the 29th, till the sitting member was under a moral obligation to set out to attend to his duties in Congress. If the House would examine the proceedings of the parties, they would find that the petitioner had monopolized to himself almost the whole of the time, and left to the sitting member only a few days to collect his testimony. Mr. C. assimilated the present case to a suit in chancery, where further time, under the same circumstances, was always given; and he earnestly appealed to the House to grant the application of the sitting member.

Mr. BOYD regretted the difference of opinion that existed on the part of the Committee of Elections, especially on the subject of the present application. Before he proceeded, he wished, if wrong, to be set right, and he begged, respectfully, to make an inquiry of the honorable chairman of the committee [Mr. CLAIRBORNE.] In relation to the notices given by the petitioner to the sitting member for taking testimony, the gentleman from Virginia and himself agreed, together with four other members of the committee, that the notices were sufficient. He believed this was so, and he desired to know if he was correct or not; for if his memory failed him in this instance, he would never undertake to recollect any thing again.

Mr. CLAIRBORNE replied that he recollected not only the decision of the committee, but also the words in which he had expressed his own opinion. He stated that the first notice was a sufficient intimation of the intention of the petitioner to dispute the election; and he also signified his opinion that the other notices were a sufficient indication of the intention of the petitioner to take depositions, and he said so still.

Mr. BOYD had understood the gentleman as complaining that there was no sort of specification in the notices given to the sitting member. He recollected very well that the gentleman said, in committee, that it was necessary, in cases of contested elections in the State of Virginia, that the names of the voters should appear in the notices, but that it had never been adhered to there. They all agreed, then, that the notices of the petitioner to the sitting member had been sufficient; and it was admitted that the facts Mr. B. had stated yesterday, in relation to taking the depositions, were also correct. The notices were reciprocal, and equally inconvenient to both parties; or, if there was a balance on any side, the hardship was greatest on the petitioner. Mr. B. then read, at length, memoranda of the various notices given on both sides, to prove that the sitting member had no ground of complaint to make on that head, with reference to the petitioner, but that the petitioner had been subject to most inconvenience and hardship. It would be found, however, that both parties attended, either by themselves or deputy, every meeting except one, and that exception was the fault of the sitting member himself, who had received ample notice. Mr. B's recollection also was, that nothing was heard about either party wanting further time till the testimony was all submitted. Then, would it have been reasonable, when the case was closed, for the committee to allow further time? Could it be reasonable that the House should allow further time? He had hoped no discussion would have arisen before the testimony was in possession of the House. He had hoped that an early day would have been fixed for its consideration; and he had an assurance that the documents would be laid on the table in the course of a few days. He would only remark, in conclusion, that if the House should grant further time in this case, he was perfectly satisfied that it would never be decided; and he would not give one single groat for the privilege of contesting an election.

Mr. BEARDSLEY desired to know whether the application for further time was to search out and find evidence that might be supposed to have a bearing in the case, or whether it was for time to take testimony of which the sitting member was already cognizant? If the latter, he would also like to know what was the evidence the gentleman had a knowledge of, and why it had not been heretofore taken.

Mr. McKENNAN said that the statement just made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BORN] had perfectly satisfied him of the propriety of granting the time requested by the sitting member to procure further testimony, so as to enable the House to come to a correct and satisfactory conclusion. From that statement, it appeared that the parties had been diligently engaged, from the commencement of the contest, in taking testimony to support their respective claims, and had continued their efforts down till the very meeting of Congress. The sitting member, after thus using due and extraordinary diligence, now comes before the House, and declares, upon his word of honor, that with all his industry he has not been able to obtain all the evidence which is necessary to enable the House to act correctly and understandingly on the subject. He put it to the gentleman from Kentucky, presuming that he was a lawyer, and to the House, to say whether, even in a court of law, there would be any hesitation in granting similar indulgence? On an application before that tribunal to postpone the trial of a case, the first inquiry made is, whether due and reasonable diligence has been used by the applicant to prepare for trial; and if satisfactory evidence is furnished upon that point, and the court are satisfied that there is no affectation of delay, he submitted that no court would refuse the application for a continuance. In the case before the House, there was no allegation that the sitting member had not been most diligently employed between the 29th October, when the petitioner commenced the taking of his testimony, and the time when the discharge of his public duties demanded his presence here. He now comes forward and declares that he is not prepared; and there is no ground for the pretence that there is any disposition on his part unnecessarily and improperly to delay a decision upon the case. He thought, upon principle, and from analogy to proceedings in judicial tribunals, justice to the parties and to the people of the district from which they came, as well as an anxious wish on the part of the House to come to a correct decision, ought to induce them at once to give the time required for taking additional testimony.

But in resisting this application, which to him seemed so reasonable, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN DERROCK], who had just addressed the House, had cited some precedents to show that similar applications had been refused by former Congresses. The first case he referred to was the contested election between Hungerford and Taliaferro, of Virginia; and, from the reading of the case, it was very apparent that it bore no analogy to the one now before the House, and of course ought to have no bearing upon the question. The election in Virginia took place in April; notice that the seat would be contested was given to the sitting member in May; and the depositions were commenced in September. In the case now before the House the election was held in August. Notice of the intention to contest was not given by the petitioner till some time in September or October, and he did not commence the taking of his testimony till the 29th of the latter month, leaving only about one month for the inquiry after, and examination of, all the witnesses on both sides, who were to be collected in that mountainous and very extensive district. As he said before, there was not the most distant analogy between the two cases. But the gentleman from New York, to bear him out in his position, had cited the case of Moore and Letcher, in the last Congress. The gentleman from New York was a member of the Committee of Elections, and one of the majority who reported on that case. This was a most unfortunate reference, and he (Mr. McK.) concurred entirely with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRUM] in deprecating the course pursued in that case, and in expressing a hope that neither this nor any future Congress would feel a disposition to consider it a binding precedent. What were the facts in that case? A majority of the committee, of whom the gentleman from New York was one, reported, after a very elaborate examination of the testimony, a resolution that Thomas P. Moore was entitled to his seat, and the House came to a conclusion that would have disgraced an illiterate jury of the country. That conclusion was, that it was impossible to say which of the two claimants was elected; that no election had been made, and they should therefore go back to the people. And what was still more extraordinary, was the fact that the gentleman from New York, after having, with the Committee of Elections, declared that Mr. Moore was clearly entitled to his seat, united with the majority of the House in the conclusion that the testimony was too voluminous and the case too intricate for decision, and should therefore be sent back to the people.

He hoped that such a case would not be set up as a precedent for future action, and particularly by the gentleman from New York. [The SPEAKER here intimating that he was taking too wide a range, Mr. McKENNA said he submitted to the correction of the Chair, and would pursue that case no further.]

Before he sat down, however, he must be permitted to say that it was with no little surprise and regret that he heard the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRUM] yesterday declare his opinion that the sitting member was not entitled to his seat, although no opportunity has been afforded for the examination of the case. For his part, he knew nothing of the merits of the controversy, and he wished to know nothing till the testimony was laid before the members, and he could have an opportunity of fairly and fully examining that testimony. He would then endeavor to make such a decision on the questions presented as would satisfy his own conscience.

He concluded by expressing a hope that the proposition to make the report the special order for Wednesday next would not prevail, and that the House grant the indulgence requested by the sitting member, to enable him to take further testimony.

Mr. WHITTLESEY here called for the orders of the day, the hour of one having arrived; but gave way to Mr. GRAHAM, who asked leave to address the House; whereupon,

Mr. BOYD moved that the rules of the House be suspended, in order to proceed with the consideration of the subject; but the motion was not sustained: Ayes 104, noes 67; not two thirds.

Mr. GRAHAM then, by leave of the House, replied to the interrogatories of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY.] The gentleman had inquired if the sitting member was able to answer whether he knew the names of the voters alleged to be illegal, or whether he had yet to look for them? To that inquiry, he had to answer, that he was able to put his finger on something like ten, fifteen, or twenty, illegal voters. Mr. G. here read over the names of several persons, alleged to be illegal voters, and stated that he wished to take the evidence of the sheriff of Haywood county. He said the case of Hungerford and Taliaferro was not a case in point. In the State of Virginia the elections came on in April, and notice was given of the intention of one of the parties to contest the election in May; so that there was much more time in that case than in the present, for the collection of testimony. In the State of Virginia, also, it was the practice for the petitioner to exhibit the names of the illegal voters, and the place at which they voted; but it had not been so in his case. Whenever he called on the petitioner to give the names, he received no answer, and was left in the dark; and in the Virginia case alluded to, it was almost within cannon shot of the Capitol, while his district was five hundred miles from it; one portion of it on the frontier of Georgia and South Carolina, and another on the frontier of Tennessee. He sincerely trusted that Congress would give him such time as might be necessary in bringing the evidence before them.

Mr. BOYD inquired at what time the information reached the gentleman from North Carolina of the additional testimony in the case?

Mr. GRAHAM replied that it was about the time that he was leaving home, to come to take his seat in Congress, and he had instructed his agents to get the testimony as soon as it could be procured.

Mr. BOYD inquired whether the testimony of the sheriff, mentioned by the gentleman, had not already been taken?

Mr. GRAHAM said he was not aware that it had been taken; if it had, he had never seen it.

Mr. BOYD said that it had been taken.

Mr. GRAHAM replied that he had never been examined when he was present, but he had been called from home for some time, and it might have been taken during that time.

HEIRS OF JAMES LATHAM.

The House now proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up several private bills reported from the Committee of the Whole yesterday; which, after being severally considered, were ordered to a third reading; among which the bill for the relief of the heirs of James Latham coming up, reported with an amendment—

The amendment was opposed by Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, who remarked that he was satisfied the Committee of the Whole House, who had acted on this subject yesterday, did not fully comprehend it, or else a different decision would be given.

It is no disparagement or insult (said Mr. R.) to the judgment of this honorable body, that they did not understand a subject that was not interesting to them, and of but small import to any one except the parties concerned in it. He coincided with the opinion of his friend, [Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana,] that the House had not sufficiently considered the subject, and had not examined it in all its bearings, or the opinion of the committee which was pronounced would have been different.

Mr. R. said his object was simply to present the case of the heirs of Latham to the House, for their consideration, and ask that justice be done their claim. He did not wish or expect to place the heirs in a situation better than the act of Congress found them. But should the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] prevail, they would, no doubt, have a very honorable notice taken of them, but, in point of fact and truth, a very unprofitable one.

On the subject of the public lands and pre-emption rights there are arrayed two distinct classes of men. The primary object of one class is the accumulation of money by the sales of the public lands, while the great and leading policy of the other is the speedy and permanent settlement of the country. This great and leading difference of opinion arises, for the most part, in the minds of gentlemen, not from any selfish or interested motives, but from the very great and essential difference in the education of certain individuals, and the country in which they are raised. There is, in this vast republic, which is extended over a great continent, such variety in the local situations and in the different sections of the country, that there will be, from necessity, a great diversity of opinion amongst the inhabitants thereof. This we see verified every day, and it will continue to be the case so long as the causes exist as they now do. Then, it is not strange that the gentleman [Mr. V.] and he (Mr. R.) should not agree on this subject. They were raised and educated in very different sections of the Union. He [Mr. V.] was raised in the old and respectable State Massachusetts, while Mr. R. said he was raised in the West, amongst the pioneers and pre-emptioners of that country. Mr. R. said he was proud, and considered it an honor to him, to be raised in the "far West," amongst a class of men that sometimes were traduced, and called squatters and land-pirates. It is this class of men, these brave and hardy pioneers, that first penetrated the wilderness, and brought the country into notice and character and it is to this class of men that the Government is indebted for so many millions of dollars for the sales of the public lands. They converted the wilderness into a country highly improved and productive of all the conveniences and comforts of man. These same pioneers did, and are always willing to, defend their country in the hour of danger. On all occasions, knowing the merit and worth of these men, Mr. R. said he would advance their interests. It is on this consideration that the claimants, the heirs of Latham, who are honest and respectable citizens, are the subject of these remarks.

In order to understand the claim of the heirs, it will be necessary to refer to the act of Congress of the 5th of February, 1813, which gave the right of pre-emption, in the following words, to wit:

"That every person, or legal representative of every person, who has actually inhabited and cultivated a tract of land lying in either of the districts established for the sale of the public lands in the Illinois Territory, which tract is not rightfully claimed by any other person, and who shall not have removed from said Territory, every such person, and his legal representative, shall be entitled to a preference, in becoming the purchaser from the United States of such tract of land at private sale, at the same price and on the same terms and conditions as are or may be provided by law for the sale of other lands sold at private sale in said Territory."

It will be necessary to state to the House that part of the Vincennes land district extended into the then Territory of Illinois, and, by some improper construction of the act of Congress, the settlers in the Territory of Illinois, residing in the Vincennes land district, were excluded from the benefits and privileges of the pre-emption laws. It may not be improper to remark that, on many occasions, these acts of Congress are construed to death by the officers who act on them. We have a memorable instance of it in the State of Illinois, in the case of the act of Congress which contemplated relief to those individuals that lost horses in the Indian disturbance in 1832. In order to relieve those citizens in the Territory of Illinois, an act of Congress passed on the 11th May, 1820, which provided, "That every person who would have been entitled to a right of pre-emption in the said Vincennes district, according to the provisions of the said recited act, passed the 5th of February, 1813, had it been so construed to embrace them, shall be allowed to prove to the register and receiver at Vincennes that they would have been so entitled."

"And every such person, or his legal representatives, shall, upon producing such certificate to the register of any land office in the State of Illinois, be allowed to enter one quarter section each, at the minimum price fixed by the United States, of any land which may be surveyed previous the 1st day of September next, whether the same shall have been offered at public sale or not."

The ancestor of the claimants became the proprietor of a pre-emption right, which is founded on these acts of Congress, and with it, on the 26th November, 1826, entered and located one quarter section of land, which included the ancient town of Peoria. Mr. R. said he was informed, as he did not personally know the fact, that no person, except probably one individual, resided on the premises at the time of the location of the pre-emption right. Mr. Latham paid into the receiver's office at Springfield, in the State of Illinois, the price required by law for this tract of land, and received the proper vouchers for the same. The constituted authorities of Peoria county, under the act of Congress of 26th May, 1824, allowing a pre-emption to the county for the use of the county, made some objection to the issuing of a patent to the heirs of Latham: and thereupon the patent never did issue. The case between the heirs of Latham and the county remained thus unacted on until the last session of Congress; at which session an act was passed permitting the county to purchase the same premises, which had been before that time located and entered by the pre-emption right of Mr. Latham, reserving the right of the heirs to bring suit for the land in question.

This is a plain and simple narration of the facts, as far as he knew them, and he believed them to be true in relation to the case now before the House. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] objects to this bill, as the claimants may select a very valuable tract of land, and even may locate it on a site for a town. This Mr. R. said may be true. Every one is justified to do the best he can with the means in his hands, so as he act uprightly and honestly in the transaction. Mr. R. said he would do so, and he had no doubt the gentleman [Mr. V. of Ohio] would do the same. The heirs of Latham cannot locate their pre-emption right on a more valuable town site than Peoria was at the time of location. This town occupies one of the most beautiful sites in the State of Illinois, or in all the West. It is situated on the Illinois river, at the lower end of Peoria lake, and in the centre of the most fertile and desirable region of country in the State. This site attracted the attention of La Salle and Father Hennepin, in their first exploring expedition to the West from Canada, in the year 1680. Their successors, of all nations and colors, who have visited this place, approve of their taste and judgment in selecting this position for a fort and town. It will at once be seen that the heirs of Latham cannot locate their claim on any place in the State of Illinois that will now be more valuable than the site of Peoria was. The gentleman from Ohio says they may resort to a lawsuit, and recover their rights. This remedy to recover the rights of the heirs is slow and expensive. It is attended with difficulty to prosecute the claim through the various courts, before a final hearing and decision could be had. And, in the mean time, the town, which is now in such flourishing condition, would wither and die. It need not be named to this House, that a town in dispute will not improve and prosper. This consideration will weigh powerfully with this honorable body in the decision of this case. The Congress of the United States have the power of doing justice to these heirs, and at the same time continuing the flourishing prosperity of one of the most promising towns in the State of Illinois. This case does not present a new and dangerous principle in the policy of our land system. It falls within the principles and policy which have been adopted and acted on from the commencement of the present system.

In the year 1800, the first right of pre-emption which he discovered in the law books was given in the country where the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] resides, to persons who had erected mills, or who had commenced them. This policy has never been abandoned, from that time to the present; and Mr. R. hoped in God it never would be, while the Government owned one acre of land in the United States. From the year 1800 down to the present time there have been passed thirty or forty, or perhaps more, acts of Congress allowing the right of pre-emption. It is the settled and acknowledged policy of the Government. There is at the present time a pre-emption law in existence, which will not expire until next June. This has been the course pursued by the Government for almost forty years. This policy is founded on equitable and just principles, which constitutes a part and parcel of our land system. He hoped its propriety and justice would not now be either questioned or disturbed, in this or any other case. A single moment's reflection will rivet it strongly in the breast of every patriot and friend to justice and humanity. The pre-emption system comports with the views of those individuals who think the public lands ought alone and singly to be considered and used for the benefit of the Treasury of the United States. And it is also strongly and warmly recognised by those persons who think the primary object of the public lands is to have on them actual and bona-fide settlers and farmers. If we desire the accumulation of money in the Treasury, to grant the right of pre-emption to farmers will accomplish this object. The lands adjacent to these pre-emptioners will sell higher and more rapidly, and be enhanced in value by being in the vicinity of improved lands. This will be recognised by all who have witnessed the operation of the pre-emption system. In this view of the case, the Government is greatly benefited in the Treasury by the policy. The other class of people is pleased with the pre-emption system, because the country is settled and improved. The lands are in the hands of the citizens, and the States in which the public domain is situated can exercise complete and sovereign jurisdiction over the lands, by taxing them, and performing other acts of sovereignty, which they now forbear to do. And, what is still more, and better, it secures to the actual settler a home and fire-side of his own. He is then, what every farmer should be, the lord of his own soil. It inspires him with confidence in his Government, and demonstrates to him, what is the proudest appellation on earth, that he is a "free and independent American citizen." Another great consideration is to the farmer that he is secured in his possessions from the devouring rapacity of speculators. His little farm and possessions, which he has toiled and labored to make, will be saved from the grasp of the cold and heartless miser. The poor but honest man may have spent all his means, and much of his time and labor, to improve a tract of the public lands; then to lose it is too much to bear. The pre-emption system will preserve it, and the Government not be injured in any manner whatever.

The case of the heirs of Latham is founded on these principles, which have been so long recognised by the acts of the Government and the people that they are as immutable almost as the constitution of the country. Mr. R. said he desired no more, nor less than that these principles and policy be applied to the case now before the House. Although it is an isolated case, yet if it does not fall within the general principle which is recognised by the laws of Congress, he did not expect or wish it to pass.

The gentleman from Ohio suggests the consideration that there may be fraud in this matter. In relation to this charge, Mr. R. said, he would vouch for the character of the claimants, that they sustained the reputation of honest and correct men; so was their father. Fraud is a kind of charge that may be made, with some plausibility, against any transaction whatever. The scriptures themselves have not been entirely clear of the charge; yet the great mass of mankind give the allegation no credence whatever. In fact, there can be no fraud gathered from the transaction; and we cannot presume fraud when there is no foundation for it.

It appears, from the report of the committee, that the assignment or transfer of the pre-emption right to Latham was acknowledged by the public officers at the land office in Springfield, and the pre-emption located. Latham, being the assignee, no doubt for a valuable consideration, has the same right as the original pre-emptioner had, under the laws of Congress; and so the register at Springfield has decided, by permitting him to locate it on the lands of the United States. It appears that the heirs of Latham, having legally located the pre-emption, had a good right to the premises, except by the act of Congress of the last session; and as the act of Congress deprived them of their right, and left them only the privilege and lean blessings of a lawsuit, it is just and proper that Congress should relieve them, and place them as near as practicable in the situation they found them.

In answer to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. R. said he would present the views of the great and talented statesman, Alexander Hamilton, to repel the argument that the accumulation of money in the Treasury ought to be the sole object of Government, in the disposition of the public lands. This great and wise man, on 20th July, 1790, while in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, reported, in "obedience to an order of the House of Representatives," that there appeared "two leading objects" of consideration: one to raise money, and the other to settle and improve the country, in the disposition of public lands. The first "leading object," which was to raise a revenue, has been fully accomplished. The only misfortune and trouble with the Government now is to know what to do with the surplus revenue in the Treasury. The tariff laws, which established what is sometimes called "the compromise system," will provide for more revenue, without the income on the public lands, than will be necessary for the ordinary operations of the Government. This being the case, there is now remaining in the Secretary's report but "one leading object," and that is to settle and improve the country, in which he hoped the gentleman from Ohio would aid and assist.

If it be necessary, Mr. R. said, he might present to this House the repeated and urgent recommendations of the Executive of the United States, "that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, except for the payment of those general charges which grow out of the acquisition of the lands, their survey, and sale." These continued recommendations, coming from the Executive of a great nation, and from a President than whom no President in the Government ever stood higher, or more esteemed by the people, must have weight on this subject with all classes of mankind, and even with the gentleman from Ohio himself. The President has, in all his messages, taken high and elevated views of policy throughout the whole Union. He has recommended strongly such measures to be effected on the seaboard as will be greatly beneficial to the Atlantic States: so has he, in various messages, for many years, urged to Congress the propriety to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands. These measures will be alike, and Mr. R. hoped together, considered by Congress. Let the western farmers have the public lands at reduced prices, while the citizens of the Atlantic States receive all the public money for fortifications, light-houses, and other improvements. The gentleman from Ohio has dragged before the House an isolated case from Chicago, in the State of Illinois, to show that Mr. Baubien had acquired a great fortune by his pre-emption right, and that the heirs of Latham might do the same. He said the pre-emptioner, Mr. B., was "a sutler," &c. Mr. R. said he was at Chicago a few days after the sale was made to Mr. Baubien, by virtue of his pre-emption right, and thereby became acquainted with the transaction. He had since his arrival here received documentary evidence on the subject, and presumed he could speak knowingly as to the whole transaction. Mr. Baubien was not a sutler, nor did he sell whiskey. If he did, in our State there is no law or public opinion established to exclude sutlers and sellers of liquors from the privilege of the pre-emption laws. With us, we act on the principles of equality; we know no orders of nobility. Sutlers and liquor-sellers are, like other citizens, permitted to come into the pale of our political church. Mr. Baubien was once, but not at the time he made the purchase, the clerk or agent of the "Fur Company," so called in our country. Mr. R. said he was informed that Mr. Baubien was in the possession of the premises he purchased by virtue of his pre-emption right for many years before the sale. He had long before the sale purchased the houses and improvements on the land in question, and had made other and further improvements on the land, to a considerable amount of money. Under the provisions of the pre-emption laws he presented himself before the proper officers, the agents of the Government, in the land office at Chicago, with satisfactory and conclusive evidence to entitle him, like other pre-emptioners, to the privileges of the pre-emption laws, and demanded his right. The officers of the Government had no choice left them. The land was not marked on the plat, "reserved from sale;" and they had no official evidence, verbal or documentary, to prevent Baubien from becoming the purchaser, by virtue of his pre-emption. The officers had no authority to prevent the sale.

Since Mr. R. came to this city, he has received copies of official letters, establishing the fact that the land purchased by Mr. Baubien was not reserved from sale, to the knowledge of the register or receiver at Chicago. It is true, as the gentleman from Ohio says, the land purchased by Mr. Baubien was very valuable. But, Mr. R. said, there are many more fortunes in Illinois for enterprising and talented individuals. The gentleman from Ohio himself, if he has not a fortune already, can make one in Illinois; and so can any other person of enterprise and temperate habits. Making fortunes in our State is the order of the day; and if Mr. Baubien has been fortunate, hundreds and hundreds more have been, and will be, equally fortunate in the State of Illinois.

Mr. R. hoped the fortunate case of Mr. Baubien would not defeat the heirs of Latham in their rights. He would propose an amendment to this bill, at the proper time, which would go to prevent the claimants from entering with their pre-emption right any mineral land, or the improvement of any actual settler. This last provision is almost useless; as no one dares to enter the improvement of a laboring man, although it may be on the public lands. There would be raised the storms and tornadoes of an insulted people, that would destroy the prospects of gain which might be attempted to be acquired in this manner. Mr. R. remarked, in conclusion, that all he wished was to place the heirs of Latham in the same situation as the act of Congress of the last session found them.

Mr. MAY, in order to give time for a further examination of the subject, moved to postpone the bill and amendment until Friday next; which was agreed to.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon a number of private bills; and, after spending some time in the consideration of the same, the committee rose, and reported them to the House; after which,

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY, 29.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The unfinished business of the last petition day, being an appeal taken by Mr. LAWLER from the decision of the Chair, in reference to instructions moved by the former to the select committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery, was taken up.

The CHAIR stated the question. Under the decision of the House, the Chair was of opinion that, upon the presentation of an abolition petition, it was, under the resolution of Mr. PINCKNEY, virtually committed, without further question. The Chair felt bound to conform to the order of the House, and therefore decided that the instructions moved were not in order. From that decision an appeal had been taken; and the question was, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. LAWLER modified the form of his instructions, requiring the select committee to report "that there was no power granted by the constitution to Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia."

FEB. 29, 1836.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

The CHAIR decided that, under the order of the House, the modified instructions were also out of order. From this decision Mr. LAWLER appealed.

The decision of the Chair was opposed by Messrs. LAWLER and W. B. SHEPARD, and advocated by Messrs. MERCER, VINTON, BRIGGS, and PATTON; when Mr. LAWLER withdrew his appeal.

The SPEAKER now proceeded to call for petitions and memorials, commencing with Massachusetts; when several petitions and memorials were accordingly presented.

The hour of one having arrived, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the special orders were postponed for the purpose of calling the remainder of the States for petitions.

Petitions and memorials were then further presented.

Mr. GRANGER presented a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and was proceeding to comment upon the character of the petitioners.

The SPEAKER said it was not strictly in order, if it was an abolition petition, to discuss the character of the petitioners.

Mr. GRANGER further proceeded.

Mr. CHAPIN called him to order.

Mr. WISE inquired whether it was not in order for a member to speak of the character of the petitioners, on presenting a memorial.

The SPEAKER said it was not strictly in order, as all abolition petitions were to be referred, without debate, under the resolution adopted by the House; and the standing rule admitted only of a brief statement of the contents of the petition on the presentation thereof.

The petition was then received and referred, under the resolution.

Mr. CLARK presented the memorial of a public meeting of sundry citizens of Dauphin county, Pennsylvania, held at Harrisburg, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the purpose of removing to the coast of Africa free negroes and manumitted slaves; and that if, in the opinion of Congress, the constitution should not authorize the appropriation, such measures may be taken to procure an amendment of that instrument as may be calculated to ensure the objects of the memorialists.

Mr. C. moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee, and printed.

Mr. PATTON moved to lay the memorial on the table, together with the motion to print and commit.

Mr. CLARK called for the reading of the memorial; which was done.

A debate being likely to arise upon the memorial, it was, under the rule, laid over to Monday next.

Mr. PATTON submitted certain resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia, on the subject of abolition, which he moved be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with the following instructions: "That the resolutions be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report forthwith the resolutions:

1. Resolved, That Congress has no constitutional power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia or in the Territories of the United States.

2. Resolved, That any act of Congress, having for its object the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories of the United States, ought to be regarded as affording great cause of alarm to the slaveholding States, and bringing the Union into imminent peril."

The CHAIR decided that the instructions were not in order, and that the resolutions of the Virginia Legislature, under the order of the House, must go to the select committee raised upon the resolution of Mr. PINCKNEY.

Mr. PATTON appealed from the decision of the Chair, on the ground that the instructions submitted by him were not identical, and went further in their principle, as applying to the Territories of the United States, than the resolution of Mr. PINCKNEY, which was limited in its operation to the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the States. Mr. P. also contended that the decision of the House, in reference to Mr. PINCKNEY's resolution, did not apply to the instructions moved by himself, for the same reason, that the object was not the same.

Mr. WISE also opposed the decision of the Chair in this instance, admitting it to be correct under the order of the House, and the decision of the House on Tuesday last, on which the Chair's decision was founded; and appealed to the House to reverse that vote, by which the Chair considered itself imperatively governed. Mr. W. was several times called to order by the Chair, for remarks not pertinent to the question of order then before the House, upon the last of which occasions Mr. W. said that the Chair, in calling him to order, merely expressed his opinion. Entertaining a different opinion, he (Mr. W.) should continue the course of his remarks, unless the Chair should appeal to the House to decide between them.

The CHAIR said the gentleman must resume his seat, and it was for the House to decide whether he should proceed, as intimated.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, moved that leave be granted to Mr. WISE to proceed.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE appealed from the decision of the Chair, that he (Mr. W.) was out of order.

The SPEAKER said that the latter appeal must be decided without debate.

Mr. WISE rose, and was about addressing the Chair, but was called to order by various members. He continued in his position until he had announced his determination to withdraw his appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIR. The decision of the Chair is then acquiesced in by the member from Virginia, and the question to be determined is the motion to permit the gentleman to proceed.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Bell, Borden, Bouldin, Bunch, John Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, John Chambers, Chapman, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Coles, Corwin, Craig, Cushing, Darlington, Deberry, Dickson, Dromgoole, Evans, Everett, Forester, French, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hannegan, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Albert G. So the House determined that Mr. WISE should not be permitted to proceed.

Mr. HOLSEY addressed the House in opposition to the decision of the Chair; but, before he concluded, he gave way to

Mr. FRENCH, who, in order to give an opportunity of calling the remainder of the States for petitions, moved to postpone the point of order, and the question connected with it, until Monday next.

Mr. PATTON proposed to-morrow; and, also, that it be made the special order of that day.

Mr. FRENCH had no objection to the latter motion.

Messrs. CAMBRELENG and LANE simultaneously moved to postpone the subject to Monday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to postpone until the 1st of July.

Mr. PATTON called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion; which were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS then withdrew his motion.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone until Monday next; which were ordered.

Mr. PINCKNEY inquired what would be the effect of the previous question.

The CHAIR said the question would be on the appeal from the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. PINCKNEY then moved the previous question; which was seconded: Ayes 93, noes 65.

Mr. EVANS moved an adjournment. Lost.

Mr. PATTON asked for the yeas and nays on the previous question; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Ashley, Banks, Barton, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Boon, Borden, Boyd, Brown, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Crane, Cushman, Darlington, Davis, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Fry, Philo C. So the House determined that the main question be now put.

The question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" was then propounded.

Mr. PATTON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved an adjournment; which was negatived.

The question was then taken on the appeal from the decision of the Chair, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bond, Boon, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Bynum, William B. NAYS—Messrs. Bouldin, Bunch, John Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, John Chambers, Chapman, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Connor, Dickson, Dromgoole, French, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Graves, Griffin, Hardin, Holsey, Henry Johnson, Lawler, Luke Lea, Loyall, Lyon, John Y. Mason, Maury, McComas, Patton, James A. Pearce, Pettigrew, Peyton, Pickens, Robertson, William B. Shepard, Shields, Spangler, Standefer, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Wise—40.

So the House sustained the decision of the Chair, and consequently determined that the motion of Mr. PATTON to refer the resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia, on the subject of abolition, to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions, was not in order, and that they must be referred to the committee raised under the resolution of Mr. PINCKNEY, conformably to a decision made by the House on the same subject on Tuesday last.

Mr. PATTON asked if he could withdraw the resolutions.

The CHAIR replied that he supposed the gentleman might withdraw them.

Mr. PATTON. I do withdraw them, then.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said he was about to suggest to his colleague a different course. He proposed to ask the consent of the House to suffer these resolutions to take the usual course, and be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. ADAMS objected to the withdrawal of the resolutions, as it would counteract an order of the House.

The CHAIR then stated that he was compelled to say that the resolutions could not be withdrawn without leave of the House. He had not anticipated that there would be any objection.

Mr. PATTON then moved that the rules be suspended, in order to enable him to withdraw the resolutions, and give them the direction suggested by his colleague.

Mr. JOHN Q. ADAMS asked if the question was debatable.

The CHAIR replied that it was not.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 1.

The Clerk proceeded to read the journal of yesterday.

Mr. PEYTON rose, and questioned the correctness of that portion of the journal which recorded the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] that his colleague, [Mr. WISE,] who had been called to order, be permitted to proceed. Mr. P. stated that the motion was, according to his understanding, that the gentleman from Virginia be permitted to proceed in order; and he moved that the journal be amended accordingly.

After some conversation, in which Messrs. PEYTON, BYNUM, BELL, MERCER, ASHLEY, BOON, MILLER, DROMGOOLE, HOAR, and REED, took part,

Mr. J. Y. MASON explained that his motion was that his colleague "have leave to proceed;" at the same time explaining, in reply to the question of a member near him, that if the gentleman was permitted to proceed, he must proceed subject to the rules of order.

Mr. PEYTON withdrew the motion, and moved that the words in the journal be so corrected as to read that the "member from Virginia have leave to proceed," striking out the additional words recorded, "in his speech."

After some words from Messrs. PARKER, ADAMS, and MANN of New York,

Mr. J. Y. MASON stated that he had no recollection of adding the words, "in his speech."

The motion to strike out those words was then agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to suspend the rules of the House, in order to proceed in the call of petitions, commencing with Virginia, and excluding the consideration of the motion relating to the letter of the Governor of Virginia, presented yesterday; which motion was agreed to.

Petitions and memorials were then presented.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WISE presented a memorial from an individual named John A. Smith, who represented himself to be a resident of the District of Columbia, protesting against the course of the northern abolitionists in a legal and constitutional argument of some length, and insisting that all abolition petitions should be forthwith rejected.

Mr. W. moved that this paper be referred to the select committee raised on the subject, with instructions to report the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Congress has no constitutional power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories of the United States."

The CHAIR decided that, on the construction given by the House to its own order, the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, in reference to the instructions, was not in order. He considered the question involved the same principles before acted upon by the House.

Mr. WISE took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, on the ground that the resolution of Mr. PINCKNEY embraced "every paper," and Mr. W.'s motion, being written, was embraced in that order. It was as much a "paper" as the resolutions and acts of the Virginia Legislature; and he contended that every thing within the vortex of abolition must go to the select committee on that subject. He called upon the House to act consistently, and not to send one set of papers to that committee, and refuse to send another; if the House did refuse to send these instructions, it would act inconsistently.

Mr. W. assured the House that the memorial was a bona-fide one, and that he had been requested in a letter from the memorialist, whom he knew not, to present it.

Mr. W. then read the letter.

Mr. LANE said that something like six weeks had been expended in the presentation and consideration of memorials and resolutions on the subject of abolition from the North, to the entire exclusion of all petitions and memorials from the western States and Territories. Having, after this protracted period, passed Mason and Dixon's line, it was fondly hoped no further delay would have occurred from this all-exciting subject. In this, it seems, we are mistaken; the firebrands of abolition seem to thicken around us from the South, and threaten equal if not more delay. To avert this storm, and to enable the people of the West to be heard in this House, he would move the previous question; which was seconded, tellers being appointed: Ayes 98, noes 63.

The main question was then ordered to be put, without a count; and, on Mr. WISE's motion, the memorial, resolution, &c., were read at length from the Clerk's table.

Mr. CHAPIN then asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

The main question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" was about to be propounded, when

Mr. ASHLEY asked if the motion to lay the memorial and the motion of the gentleman from Virginia on the table would be in order?

The CHAIR, after a few words from Messrs. CRAIG, WISE, and ADAMS, decided that, under the order of the House, viz: the adoption of Mr. PINCKNEY's resolution, the motion would not be in order.

The main question was then taken, and the vote was as follows: Yeas 163, nays 38:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Barton, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, George Chambers, Chaney, Chapin, Clark, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cramer, Crane, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Davis, Deberry, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Esher, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, French, Fry, Philo C. [Mr. PHILLIPS, upon being called, rose and said: If it be the decision of the Chair that it is not in order to move the reference of a petition to a committee already appointed upon the subject to which the petition refers, with instructions to that committee not conflicting with, but in addition to, instructions already given, I vote in the negative.]

The CHAIR stated the decision, and Mr. PHILLIPS voted in the negative.]

So the House determined that the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the House, and the memorial was consequently referred to the select committee on the subject of abolition, but without the instructions.

Mr. WISE then rose to present certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia, on the subject of the abolition of slavery, and was proceeding to read them, when

Mr. BROWN rose to a question of order. He desired to know whether the rules of the House had not been suspended merely for the purpose of presenting memorials and petitions, and whether these resolutions came under that character?

The CHAIR replied that it had always been usual to present joint resolutions of State Legislatures when the States were called for petitions and memorials, and under that rule these resolutions were in order.

Mr. PARKS begged to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia, whether a similar paper had not been presented by another member from Virginia [Mr. PARROT] yesterday. And, if it were the same, he would inquire of the Chair if it was in order to present the same paper twice?

The CHAIR replied that it was not in its power to say whether these resolutions were the same or not, until they were sent to the Chair for examination.

Mr. WISE replied that the gentleman from Maine could not make that point of order until he knew whether the paper was the same or not, but he would answer the gentleman's inquiry by reading the paper itself.

Mr. W. then proceeded with the reading of the resolutions; and, on concluding, remarked that he had done his duty by submitting them to the House, but he should not present them, to be carried to the select committee.

Petitions, memorials, and resolutions, were then further received, which occupied the remainder of the day till the hour of adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2.

Mr. DENNY, by consent, submitted a motion to print 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Franklin Institute of Pennsylvania, on the subject of the explosion of steam boilers, transmitted to the House yesterday by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIR said the motion must, under the rule, lie over one day.

Mr. DENNY moved to suspend the rule, in order to consider his motion at that time; which was agreed to: Ayes 88, noes 44.

Mr. PARKS said a copy of this report had just been laid on their tables. No opportunity had been afforded to examine it, or to ascertain whether it was of any value, when a motion was made and pressed to print an extra number of copies. He was opposed, under the circumstances, to forcing the motion though the House at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to postpone the motion until to-morrow; which was agreed to: Ayes 70, noes 64.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The report of the Committee of Elections, on the contested election from North Carolina, came up as the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday.

The question pending was the amendment of Mr. MANN, of New York, proposing to make the report the special order for Tuesday next, instead of Wednesday, (this day,) as moved by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. HARD said, with a view to have the House extend the usual courtesy to the petitioner, and understanding it to be the usual course, he moved that the petitioner, David Newland, have a seat assigned him on the floor of the House, and that he have leave to address it in his own behalf.

Mr. BYNUM was sorry the gentleman had made the motion. A similar motion had been made a few days ago, by one of the majority of the Committee of Elections. That motion was, that the petitioner have leave to be heard on the floor of the House, by himself or by counsel. As the gentleman representing the minority of the committee had made the motion in a somewhat different form, he hoped he would accept an amendment. Mr. B. then moved an amendment, that the petitioner be heard, on the main question, by himself or by counsel.

Mr. HARD said he had consulted both the majority and minority of the committee, in relation to the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] and he could not accept the amendment of that gentleman.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said, by leave of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] and his colleague, [Mr. HARD,] he would submit a motion which he conceived would meet the views of both those gentlemen. Mr. M. then moved that the petitioner, David Newland, have leave to appear, and also that he have leave to address the House on the subject of his petition.

Mr. HARD accepted the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN.]

Mr. BYNUM did not understand the motion precisely. If it extended only to the preliminary question, he must object to it. His object was to have the petitioner heard on the main question.

Mr. MANN replied that embraced the hearing of the petitioner himself in every stage of the question, but not the hearing of him by counsel.

Mr. McKAY said the request of a petitioner, in the case of a contested election, to be heard by counsel, had never, he believed, been refused, when asked for. He cited the case from Georgia, of General Jackson and General Wayne, where one of the parties, not being a lawyer, was heard by counsel. He also cited the case of a contested election from the State of Virginia, where the petitioner was heard by counsel. He therefore hoped, if the petitioner was desirous of being heard by counsel, that he would not be refused the privilege. He believed such application had never been refused, when asked.

Mr. DAVIS thought the motion should be, that the petitioner be permitted to address the House himself on the preliminary question, and by counsel on the main question, if he desired it.

Mr. HARDIN said he was in the House when there had been two cases of contested elections before it, and he had never heard even an application for counsel. When a man was brought before the House, charged with having committed an offence, then he would grant him counsel. Such had been the course in the case of General Houston. Here, however, was a member from North Carolina, who had been qualified, and was acting as a member of the House; another person contests his election; they were to go by the depositions in the case, and make up their minds from them, and not from the arguments which might be made. They were called upon to settle a great constitutional question, and the constitution gave to them the exclusive jurisdiction over that matter. They were the judges. When they were settling great national principles, growing out of the election of members, where was the difference between that and settling great national principles upon any other subject? And had it come to this, that they were to have lawyers brought into that House to assist them out in their deliberations! He did say it is a disparagement of that class of men, for he himself was one of the profession. But he would as lief hear any other set of men speak, as that profession; because, when they spoke as lawyers, they would argue for an hour to distinguish between the south and southwest side of a hair. He would ask his honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM], whether there was not some hundred lawyers on that floor, any of whom might compare with the lawyer who might be brought there as counsel for the petitioner; and were they not disposed to do him justice—strict, full, and ample justice? He recollected that in the contested election year before last, each of the parties had lawyers to advocate his cause, and he had no doubt it would be the case on the present occasion. He had no doubt, if there was to arise any difficulty, lawyers, enough would be found in the House to engage on both sides. Was a lawyer to be introduced on that floor, because the gentleman petitioning was not a lawyer? He hoped not.

Mr. BROWN begged to make an inquiry before he voted upon the question. He wanted to know if this motion, that the petitioning member have leave to appear by counsel, was made upon his authority and at his request? If such was the fact, he should hardly feel himself at liberty to refuse an application so just and reasonable. A resolution of that kind might be necessary, to place the petitioner upon something like a footing of equality with the sitting member. There was no petition for leave to appear by counsel, and it might be that the gentleman claiming the seat did not desire any such privilege. He might be willing to trust his claims to their own merits, to his own efforts, and the efforts of such friends as he might find upon this floor. He therefore begged that the honorable gentleman who made the motion would furnish the House with this necessary information.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, said he felt authorized in saying that, from the foundation of the Government to the present time, whenever either of the parties in a contested election requested to be heard by counsel, it was granted him. He cited the case from Georgia, of General Jackson and General Wayne, in which one of the parties had been heard by counsel. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDIN] had taken the ground that there were lawyers enough in the House to advocate the claims of either of the gentlemen. They ought not to act on the supposition that one half would go on one side, and the other half on the other. If a gentleman who is not blessed with the faculty of debating wishes to be placed on an equal footing with the other, let him have some person to do for him what he cannot do for himself. Neither ought they to go upon the ground that every gentleman would read over the whole of the testimony, and examine into it; then, how could one claimant be on an equal footing with the other claimant, unless he be heard by counsel? It might be necessary to collate the testimony, and make a synopsis of the case; then, if counsel be necessary, let it be furnished.

Mr. CONNOR stated that he was authorized by the petitioner himself to say he only desired a seat on the floor to be heard; and that he did not desire counsel. He therefore hoped his colleague [Mr. BYNUM] would withdraw his motion.

Mr. BYNUM begged leave to set the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN], who spoke from memory, right. The cases which he was about calling attention to were not from memory. He then read the case of a contested election from New Jersey, in 1789, in which Mr. Madison advocated the hearing of the petitioner by counsel, and the petitioner was heard by counsel. He cited another case in 1804, in which a petitioner was heard by counsel. He mentioned those, as additional evidence in support of those already mentioned. There were other cases which might be enumerated; and, in the whole book of elections, there was not an instance where counsel had been denied when asked for; and he was sorry to hear such sentiments come from the gentleman from Kentucky, who represented a farming people. And were the farming people not to be heard by counsel on constitutional questions? It was doing injustice to that people to exclude them from having counsel in that House. He wished to reply to some remarks which fell from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENZAN], the other day. That gentleman did not know Mr. B., and he must be permitted to tell that gentleman, when he became acquainted with him, he would be among the last members in that House whom he would attempt to misrepresent. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was reported to have said, "that it was with no little surprise and regret that he heard the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] yesterday declare his opinion that the sitting member was not entitled to his seat, although no opportunity had been afforded for the examination of the case." Mr. B. asked the House and the honorable gentleman if he had made such declaration? In reply to some remarks which had fallen from his two colleagues on that subject, he did make use of the following words, as he distinctly recollected: "he himself was not decided on the subject; he wanted to have more light, as well as the gentleman himself; but from what he had understood, if he might be permitted to express an opinion, he was predisposed to believe that the sitting member was not entitled to his seat." The gentleman from Pennsylvania had put words in his mouth which he had never said. When some gentlemen have not subject-matter to make a display of parliamentary talents, they fancy some monstrous object, to show themselves off to advantage. Mr. B. said he had not made such a statement, and the attributing it to him was gratuitous.

Mr. McKENZAN said he would be the last man who would attempt to misrepresent any gentleman. But as to what he had stated, he submitted it to the House to say whether there was any material difference between what he had said and the language admitted by the gentleman himself. He had said that he had not means of examining into the case; and as other gentlemen had not had an opportunity to do so, he only said that gentlemen ought not to prejudge it. As impartial jurors, they would be called upon to decide the case, and they should do so without any predisposition of it.

Mr. BYNUM rose to reply, but his remarks were arrested by the expiration of the hour.

The CHAIR announced the special orders, being the appropriation bills.

Mr. HARDIN moved to suspend the rules, in order to proceed with the preliminary discussion on the contested election.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was compelled to ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules. The public interest was suffering in consequence of the delay in the passage of the appropriation bills, and he could no longer remain quiescent.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and were: Yeas 66, nays 132.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

PORTUGUESE DUTIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 29, 1836.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report of the Secretary of State, communicating an application from the chargé d'affaires of Portugal for the passage by Congress of a special act abolishing discriminating duties upon the cargoes of Portuguese vessels imported into the United States, from those ports of the dominions of Portugal in which no discriminating duties are charged upon the vessels of the United States or their cargoes, and providing for a return of the discriminating duties which have been exacted upon the cargoes of Portuguese vessels thus circumstanced, since the 18th of April, 1834.

I also transmit a copy of the correspondence which has taken place upon the subject, between the Department of State and the chargé d'affaires of Portugal.

The whole matter is submitted to the discretion of Congress, with this suggestion: that if an act should be passed, placing the cargoes of Portuguese vessels, coming from certain ports of the territories of Portugal, on the footing of those imported in vessels of the United States, in deciding upon the propriety of restoring the duties heretofore levied, and the time to which they should be restored, regard should be had to the fact that the decree of the 18th April, 1834, which is made the basis of the present application, took effect in the islands of Madeira and the Azores many months after its promulgation; and to the more important fact, that, until the 1st of February, instant, an indirect advantage was allowed in Portugal to importations from Great Britain, over those from other countries, including the United States.

ANDREW JACKSON.

OHIO AND MICHIGAN BOUNDARY.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked leave to make a report from that committee, on the subject of the application of the Territory of Michigan for admission into the Union, and on the message of the President of the United States, in relation to the disputed boundary line between Ohio and Michigan. Mr. T. explained that he made the request of the House merely that the report and documents should be put in the hands of the public printer, as they would take several days to print, and not to discuss or even read the report at that time.

Mr. BRIGGS objecting,

Mr. THOMAS moved to suspend the rules; which was agreed to.

Mr. T. then presented the foregoing report, accompanied by a bill to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union on certain conditions; which bill was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. T. then gave notice that on to-morrow he should ask leave to move that the bill be made the special order of the day for the 15th of the present month.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

The House then took up the "bill for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York," which was on its final passage.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, concluded his remarks, and addressed the House at length, in opposition to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LANE, after a few remarks in reply to the last gentleman, demanded the previous question.

Mr. EVERETT hoped the gentleman would not press that motion, after making a speech himself.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House, which was ordered; and, after proceeding some time, it was, on motion of Mr. HOWELL, suspended.

The previous question was then seconded by the House, taken by tellers: Yeas 81, noes 78.

Mr. EVERETT asked for the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" which were ordered, and the result was as follows: Yeas 95, nays 110:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ash, Bailey, Barton, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bockee, Boon, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chapin, Childs, Cleveland, Coffee, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Darlington, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Philo C. Fuller, W. K. Fuller, James Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Halsey, Joseph Hall, Hannegan, Hard, Albert G. Harrison, Haynes, Howard, Hunt, Huntington, Huntsman, Ing-ham, William Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, Judson, Ken-non, Kilgore, Lane, Lansing, Lay, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Love, Lucas, Abijah Mann, John Y. Mason, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Moore, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parker, Patterson, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Ward, Wardwell, Webster—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Ashley, Banks Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Davis, Denny, Dromgoole, Evans, Everett, Forester, French, Fry, Galbraith, Rice Garland, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hamer, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawkins, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hiester, Hopkins, Howell, Ingersoll, Janes, Jarvis, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Klingensmith, Lawler, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Lincoln, Logan, Loyall, Lyon, Job Mann, Martin, S. Mason, Maury, McCarty, McComas, McKay, McKennan, Mercer, Miller, Milligan, Montgomery, Morgan, Morris, Parks, Patton, Dutee J. Pearce, James A. Pearce, Peyton, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Roane, Robertson, Russell, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, Weeks, White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams—110.

So the House determined that the main question shall not be now put; and the effect of the vote was to put the subject from before the House this day.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MILLER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1836.

Naval Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The question pending was the motion of Mr. BELL to reduce the item for the improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, one half, viz: from $67,000 to $33,500.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, took the floor, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I regret, sir, that these appropriations are presented under circumstances which make it impossible for me to vote for them. They may be, to a certain extent, necessary and proper. I cannot say that even the inclination of my mind is against them; but coming before us as they do, not in the usual routine, after an investigation of the subject and a report from the Naval Committee, but in a bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, I cannot vote for them. Instead of a bill providing for the general maritime defence of the country, the whole country, based upon evidence, reports, and estimates, from the proper sources, presenting one general system, equal and just, we are called upon to act in detail, upon detached, minute, and separate members. I cannot doubt that all the materials are at hand, and that there are officers capable of digesting such a plan. Why is it not done? What is the pressing exigency by which we are required in such haste to act on these particular navy yards? Why is it that the appropriations for these yards are thus pressed upon us, and brought up in this unusual mode, when the application for a yard at Pensacola, more important than any of them, and in my judgment of as much importance as all of them put together, is condemned to the usual but dilatory course of a reference to the Naval Committee. Whenever, sir, such a plan as I have suggested is presented, I am willing to appropriate as much money as can be wisely and economically expended; and if something like justice is done to the South and West, I shall not be over-captious as to the greater magnitude of the appropriations to the North. Until that is done, I will not vote one farthing: I will not vote these appropriations, and then take the chances for our own. No, sir, it is a common board, at which all must sit down, or none. I will not wait for the second table, and take the fragments which may be left by appetites which I will not call voracious, but which I shall show are not very easily satisfied.

The items of appropriation now under consideration are taken without the change of a letter or figure from the report of the Secretary of the Navy. I therefore take it for granted, that the other recommendations of the Secretary, in immediate connexion with this subject, will in due season also be presented to us. I have only to regret that they are not all under consideration at once. It may, however, have been prudent to give them to us in broken doses. I shall, however, take leave to advert to all of them in this discussion; I will endeavor to collect these scattered sweets, and I am utterly mistaken in the force of truth, if the result does not astonish this House and this nation.

Expecting, as I do, sir, the aid and co-operation of very many honorable members who are attached to the administration party, I shall endeavor, as far as practicable, to avoid even the imputation of making this unnecessarily a party question. Its importance rises infinitely higher than any such considerations. I have no motive to do so. The President of the United States is rapidly passing from the stage of public action, and is about to assume his station in history. I will not anticipate what that station will be; I feel that I am not an impartial judge. I cannot forbear to express the happiness which I feel, that we are called upon to act upon this important subject, free from the extraneous and exciting influence of the prospect of a collision with France. I can now vote money for permanent and progressive works, which, under such an apprehension, I would have husbanded for men and ships; and, sir, I will not disguise that the adjustment of our differences with France affords me a personal, a selfish satisfaction, as justifying remarks heretofore made, that I saw in the course of France nothing of threat or intimidation, but every thing of conciliation, even of kindness. Through the magnanimous interference of England, that controversy is now settled—magnanimous (if disinterested) beyond any thing in history. Our maritime frontier may properly be divided into three sections. 1. From Maine to the Capes of Virginia, denominated the north Atlantic. 2. From the Capes of Virginia to Florida point, the south Atlantic. 3. From Florida point to the Sabine, or the Gulf frontier. From the Capes of Virginia to Maine is less than one-third of the whole frontier, and the country dependent upon it less than one-fifth of the territory of the United States. I will endeavor to show, from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and other measures before the House, how much it is proposed to appropriate to these sections, respectively. I am aware, sir, that I am entering upon an invidious duty. I hope that it is not my nature to be over-querulous or jealous. I know that I should not properly represent those who send me here, if I were to scrutinize too nicely the measures of disbursement to the different sections of our common country—a disbursement necessarily unequal, to a certain extent. I trust, sir, for my apology, to the facts which I will develop.

Sums specifically estimated for the navy yards on the north Atlantic:

Naval Appropriation Bill.

[MARCH 2, 1836.]

South Atlantic. How much do you suppose, sir? You would never guess. I will tell you: Nothing, sir, nothing.

Whole Gulf frontier, - - - $275,000 00

I would forbear to remark upon these separate points until I had presented the whole, but I cannot. Is there any one man whose sense of justice does not revolt at this? One-third of the frontier and one-fifth of the territory is to receive, for one item of expenditure, $3,225,000; another section, more than equal in extent of coast and territory, to receive nothing; and against this enormous sum appropriated to this small section you have $275,000 to the other four-fifths. Can any people bear this—ought any people to bear it; from a Government, too, under the most sacred obligations so distribute, as equally as practicable, its burdens and its benefits?

I will now give you the estimates, the expenditures of which must principally be made on the north Atlantic:

Provisions, - - -	$560,000 00
Repairs of vessels in ordinary, - - -	950,000 00
Medicines, - - -	40,000 00
Ordnance stores, - - -	50,000 00
Miscellaneous items, - - -	295,000 00
Contingences, - - -	3,000 00
Pay of officers of receiving vessels at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Bal- timore, and Norfolk, - - -	63,683 50
Pay of officers at five recruiting stations, the same above named, - - -	37,750 00
Annual increase of the navy, expended, of course, at the northern navy yards, Completing steam vessels at New York, Building three steam vessels, of course at some northern yard, - - -	500,000 00 150,000 00 675,000 00
Hospitals at New York and Boston, - - -	45,410 00
Coast survey, confined to north Atlantic, Powder magazines at New York and Boston, - - -	80,000 00 19,200 00
Total, - - -	$3,599,043 50

&c., of course at northern yards, - - - 2,000,000 00

9,547,530 50

To which may be added the following, which must be incidentally applied to north Atlantic: Pay of officers and men, Pay of superintendents, naval contingencies, and civil establishments of yards, - - - 1,974,338 91

From which deduct amount expended on Gulf of Mexico, say - - - $150,000,00

1,892,878 91

Total for north Atlantic, - - - $11,440,409 41

South Atlantic and Gulf, - - - $393,179 00

Amount incidentally expended on Gulf, 150,000 00

$543,179 00

To which, sir, allow me to add the proposed appropriations for fortifications, which give to this same favored section $2,326,000, and $170,800 to the remaining four-fifths.

It stands thus:

Naval appropriations on north At- lantic, - - -	$11,440,409 41
Fortifications, - - -	2,326,000 00
	13,766,409 41

Whole south Atlantic and Gulf:

Naval appropriations, - - -	$543,179 00
Fortifications, - - -	170,800 00

$713,979 00

One-fifth of the country receives appropriations at about the rate of two millions to every hundred thousand given to the remaining four-fifths. These, Mr. Chairman, are facts depending on figures, about which I think there can be and is no mistake. If there be any error, I am happy to know that I shall be corrected, and no one be misled by me. Are they not appalling facts? Do they not demand the solemn consideration of the people of the South and West? Is this terrible inequality unavoidable? Is there any thing in the circumstances of the two sections, natural, social, or political, which causes it, and for which there is no remedy? I sincerely hope not, I believe not. If I were to say otherwise, I should feel that I had entitled myself, for the first time, to a name often unjustly applied to me—that of disunionist. Sir, if this be true, it never was designed, it cannot come to good, that two people, with interests so incompatible, should remain together. If, sir, there is no remedy for all this; if you announce, by a perseverance in this course of legislation, that this state of things must continue, one section almost exclusively to pay taxes, and another to receive them; that the relation of the South and West to the North is to be forever that of tribute-payers to tribute-receivers, of colonies to a mother country, ay, sir, to a step-mother country, and that this is our irreversible destiny, the result of causes inherent, permanent, you have not only started the strands of the Union, you have dissolved it. Sir, a union of States such as ours, like the relation of private friendship, to be honorable or lasting, must be one of the most perfect, the proudest equality. The moment you announce that we of the South and West must pay in dollars and cents for the honor and advantages which we derive from this union, the honor of benign day after day denounced in the hall appropriated to our common legislation as robbers and land-pirates, and the advantage of paying one-fourth of our income as tribute to another section, you announce that this Government is one which no man from the South or West could desire to perpetuate, but one who was born to be a slave, and deserves his destiny.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that these are unwelcome truths. I know, sir, that any allusion to these topics is not very graciously received, coming from one of that calumniated party to which it is my pride to belong; but,

MARCH 2, 1836.]

Naval Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

sir, they are truths which every consideration of duty compels me to utter. The attachment, sir, of the whole South to this Union is a wise, deep, and abiding attachment. It is one of the first articles of our political faith; not the very first; no, sir, we prize liberty more. It is a matter of political religion, almost superstition. It is an affair of combined principle and sentiment; one of those subjects in which all the colder calculations of the head are quickened and invigorated by all the impulses of the heart.

In the general, it is true that, when money is once brought into the Treasury, it belongs to the whole country, and too strict an inquiry should not be instituted whence it comes; but when such a monstrous inequality of disbursement is discovered, the inquiry is natural, where is this money levied? A plain, honest man would naturally suppose that, of course, it came chiefly from the region upon which it is so lavishly, so profusely disbursed. Let us make this inquiry, and according to the result will this seeming and most revolting enormity be mitigated or aggravated. Is it, can it be true that this favored region, which receives at the rate of at least forty to one in comparison with the rest of the country, does not pay more, does not pay as much, does not even pay one-third as much, as its fair proportion of the public revenues? How, sir, is our revenue raised? First, by duties on imports. How is it that the foreign merchandise is brought to us upon which these duties are paid? Because we can pay for it. Let our ability to pay cease, and it will cease to come. Credit between nations, which is only an aggregate of the credit of individuals, cannot outlast the ability to pay. In what is this foreign merchandise paid for? In the rice, cotton, and tobacco, of the South and West. Abstract these, and can the commerce continue? The northern section of our country has nothing, in comparison, which will serve the purposes of foreign exchanges. The people of that region have often declared that they cannot contend, even in our own markets, without discriminating duties. How could they meet, on even disadvantageous terms, foreign competition? I may be told that much of this money is collected at the North, New York, for instance. It is collected there, but it does not follow that the tax is levied there. People are generally very willing to relinquish the privilege of being taxed. Would New York give up the privilege of this collection, and all its incidents? No, sir. It is the profits which that city has received from the transit of southern staples and European goods which has mainly contributed to building up that modern Tyre, that city of commercial noblemen. I may be told that the consumer pays the duty, and therefore that the people of the North pay as much as we do. Admit that argument to be true, is it not manifest that, whilst that section (as a section, I speak not of individuals) pays with one hand as a consumer, it receives back with the other, under the protection of the tariff, more than it pays; whilst to us it is uncompensated taxation? No wise statesman ever considered this question but as involving the compound consideration of taxation and disbursement. It is not very material, in a general point of view, how high the taxes of a country are, if they are disbursed in the same region where they are levied. They will diffuse themselves through the whole system. It is the blood of the social system, which, if in the foot at one moment, is in the head the next; but take it from the arm, and feebleness follows. Sir, the heart of this system is at the South, whence the blood gushes out at those great ventricles, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and New Orleans. It flows out through the arteries, but returns through the veins. The South, sir, is the well-spring, deep, abundant; the North the reservoir; this Government the machinery by which the water is raised in one section, and deposited in another.

We only know our Government as a tax-gatherer; the North by its bounties and beneficence. It comes to us in exaction; it visits the North, as did Jupiter Dana, in a shower of gold. It comes to us in absorption; to the North in fertilizing showers. If we have it even in dew, it is not in its refreshing quality, but only in the gentleness of its fall.

The other great source of revenue, and destined to be equal at least to the first, is the public lands—a revenue derived exclusively from the South and West. Can the West—the youthful and comparatively poor, but gallant and patriotic West—which pays a large portion of the taxes on imports, both as consumers and producers, bear this eternal depletion, this tide that knows no reflux? It is estimated that there will next year be abstracted from that section twenty-five millions; with the Cumberland road, and every other appropriation, you will not return two. Can any country long endure this? Will any people who deserve to be free long endure it. I feel the responsibility of developing and commenting on these facts. We are told that, in the third or fourth century, a bishop was expelled from his diocese for revealing to others than the priests and catechumens certain mysteries of his religion; but as I do not like mysteries or secrets, either in religion or politics, I do not hesitate in the discharge of what I regard my duty. For a different course I might perhaps receive a compliment to my liberality, which I should regard as purchased by the sacrifice of the sacred obligations of duty and fidelity to those who sent me here.

Is this state of things beyond the reach of remedy? He is the worst enemy of this Union who shall say so—he its best friend who shall prove the opposite. It is, to a certain extent, true that the Southern and Gulf coast does not afford as many harbors fit for navy yards and requiring to be fortified as the northern coast; but it does afford some three or four, and they, I apprehend, are infinitely strengthened in their claims by the smallness of their number. The charge will be so much the less, whilst their importance, in time of war, both to ourselves or to an enemy, will be increased. Charleston, Port Royal, and Brunswick, present admirable positions for navy yards, with every possible advantage, and bars already deep enough for sloops and frigates, and capable of being deepened to any required extent—a process, which it has been demonstrated at Ocracoke and Nantucket is not only practicable but easy. But, sir, there is another point—Pensacola, whose importance I do not think I magnify when I say that it is greater than that of New York itself, and as great as all the other points put together! It is the only point on the Gulf where the ship of any enemy can lie in safety, and literally commands the whole of the commerce of the vast valley of the Mississippi—a country equal to eight-tenths of the United States. What are the object in selecting sites for navy yard and maritime fortifications? To secure a place of refuge, supplies, and repairs, to protect the avenues of interior commerce. To keep out of the hands of an enemy a strong position. As to the first, it is a roadstead in which half the navy of England can ride with perfect safety. As to the two last, what point so important? Suppose an enemy in possession of New York, the great city of New York, how small is the country absolutely dependent, and which could not find some other outlet? Let an enemy have possession of the debouché of the Mississippi, and you block up the trade of eight-tenths of the Union, the whole of that vast valley, in comparison with which Egypt is but a garden spot—a commerce, going and returning, of more than one hundred and twenty millions annually, and involving the interest of such a vast extent of our country, from the trapper of the frozen forests of the Rocky mountains, to the owner of the princely sugar estate on the banks of the Missisissippi, almost within the tropics. A safe harbor for an enemy, a place of refuge for repairs and for supplies, unsurpassed by any in the world; and as a point from which to harass an enemy, when engaged in war, "that unprofitable contest, which should do the other the most harm," it is more important than all the other naval places put together. Near what other point on our coast has any foreign nation islands or harbors? Here the West Indies are almost within a stone's throw. In the lately apprehended contest with France, at what point was it expected that the blow would be struck? At the North, where millions have been expended? No, sir, but upon this tempting, vulnerable, and neglected point. One would naturally suppose that this place not only possessed no advantages, but was absolutely incapable of being made a naval station. Is this so? Who knows? The coast survey, as reported by the Secretary of the Navy, has not extended to our coast; it has been confined to this consecrated section. Why has not the Southern and Gulf frontier been explored? The very first triangulation has yet to be made there. But, sir, the evidence, notwithstanding, as to the advantages of Pensacola as a naval station, is strong, conclusive, accumulated beyond any other place on our whole coast. I will give you some of the names, embracing every officer who has served in the Gulf, who not only concur in their opinions, but use language as to the local advantages and importance of Pensacola, which would seem extravagant if used by only one. I will read you the list: Bainbridge, Warrington, Biddle, Rodgers, Ridgely, Dallas, Woolsey, Clarkson, Bolton, Slidell, Kearney, Gratiot, and the whole board of engineers—and one other which I will not name. No, sir, I will not introduce the renowned hero of Charleston harbor into such company. To which I will only add the name of Southard, of whom I believe I only express the sentiment of our whole navy when I say that the Navy Department was never better administered before, nor as well since, as when he was at its head.

The board of engineers say: "Situated as Pensacola bay is, with respect to the country on either hand, and the immense regions behind, its rare properties as a harbor become of inappreciable value. 1. It is accessible to the largest class of sloops and frigates, and, as the bar is narrow, may be deepened so as to admit still larger vessels. 2. Its bar is near the coast. 3. It is perfectly landlocked. 4. It has excellent facilities for building, repairing, and launching, and for docks and dockyards. 5. Abundance of good water. 6. Is perfectly defensible."

Mr. Southard says the whole country, from the Alleghany mountains to the Gulf, and from the Rocky mountains to New Orleans, is interested in the maintenance of a sufficient naval establishment at that place.

Again: "With whatever nation we may be at war, the principal theatre of contest will probably be in the Gulf of Mexico, and the object of attack the commerce of the Mississippi. Every principle of prudence demands that preparations be made to meet such an attack." Have any such preparations been made? and why have they not? Captain Dallas says the bar is already 23 feet at low water, and only 27 feet are required for the largest vessels. He further says: "I see no difficulty in deepening the bar to almost any extent that may be desired; but to the depth of seven feet nothing can be more practicable."

Captain Chase, an officer of whom I will not say the half I know he deserves, lest it should be attributed to a too partial friendship, says: "The impediment to the bar at Pensacola may be removed, and, in proportion to its importance, at a comparatively small expense." He adds: "It is the only harbor on the Gulf, at which a great naval arsenal can be established, and is too intimately connected with the great western and southwestern interests to fear opposition." Com. Ridgely says:

"The incalculable advantage to an enemy of taking Pensacola, and making it a rendezvous for a blockading squadron, will make obvious at the first glance the necessity of fortifying it." I will not add to this evidence. I could multiply it to an almost indefinite extent. Has the Government been ignorant of all these facts? No, sir, but in full possession of them for years. By an act of Congress approved 3d March, 1825, the President is directed to purchase a site on the coast of Florida for a navy yard and a place of depot, and to erect the necessary buildings and make the necessary improvements." How has this order been executed? After the lapse of eleven years, a shipwrecked or dismantled vessel on that dangerous coast cannot be repaired without being brought round to one of those northern navy yards. I am told that a long-boat cannot be repaired there. Again, sir, by an act of 1827, two dry docks are ordered to be constructed; one north, the other south of the Potomac. This requirement, I am told, is satisfied by the construction of the dry dock at Norfolk. Why was it not fixed at Pensacola? Why was it established amongst the thick cluster of northern yards, at the very nearest point south of the Potomac at which it could be done in conformity with the law? In addition to all the advantages which I have enumerated, there are others not to be calculated: it is in the very heart of the live oak region, within the reach of all the materials necessary for that magnificent fabric, a ship of war, so beautifully described by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Sail cloth, cordage, iron, copper, lead, all supplied by the valley of the Mississippi. Why has this point of such vast importance been so long neglected? I will mention a fact, sir, and let others draw their own inferences. For once, in the history of our Government, all the heads of Departments charged with our internal affairs are exclusively from this favored section; and allow me to add, without any irreverence to that gallant and good man who is at the head of the navy board, or any disrespect to its members, that all of that board are from the same section. Others more given to philosophizing may discover the relation of cause and effect in this. And, sir, what have we now recommended for this important point? Sixty-four thousand dollars, and two hundred and seventy-five hereafter. Sixty-four thousand dollars to build a smithery, cook-shops, and the like, when I have the very highest authority for saying that, to put that station on a footing with the least respectable northern yards and dry docks, more than two millions will be necessary. Gentlemen are mistaken if they expect, with this sop to Cerberus, honey and drugs, in poppy juice steeped, to silence the South and West.

Mr. Chairman, it is not in the matter of naval appropriations alone that this gross, this monstrous inequality exists. It is in the whole scheme and practice of this Government.* I beg in this connexion to call the attention of the committee to another subject. I allude to the distribution of national armories, military schools, forts, and garrisons. As to them it will not be pretended that there is any thing in the localities of the South and West, which should prevent these sections from enjoying a fair participation.

	North Atlantic.	South Atlantic.	Gulf.
National armories,	2	none,	none.
Arsenals,	12	one,	three.
Military school,	1	none,	none.
Navy yards,	6	none,	nominally, one.

* To say nothing of one hundred other cases, such as the expenditures of clothing, &c., for the army, take, as an example, the subject of pensioners. This same favored section (exclusive of Maryland) receives $1,508,555, all the rest of the Union $812,424; less than one-fifth receive within a fraction of twice as much as the remaining four-fifths.

Naval Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

	North Atlantic.	South Atlantic	Gulf.
Forts,	16	seven,	ten.
Garrisons,	25	seven,	eight.

Sixteen forts and twenty-five garrisons in less than one-fourth of our territory, and only four (at Augusta, St. Stephen's, Baton Rouge, and St. Louis) embracing the whole country between the south Atlantic and our extreme western border, and between the Gulf of Mexico and the Rocky mountains. Of the arsenals, twelve are situated in this same small section, and one on the south Atlantic, and three more in the whole South and West. It will scarcely be said that there are no localities in this vast region which will not answer as fit places for garrisons or arsenals; and, sir, is not the enormity of this thing inexpressibly aggravated, when it is remembered that these garrisons and arsenals are situate where there is no sort of necessity for them, and not in that immense region of country where no man can say for a week to come that the fury and ferocity of an Indian war may not burst upon our defenceless frontier? Look at the scenes now exhibited in Florida; scenes in every way disgraceful to the country—disgraceful that cause should have been given for that war; still more disgraceful to the military character of the country, that such a war had not been instantly terminated. But, sir, if a handful of Seminoles, the miserable remnant of a once powerful tribe, have been able to effect so much mischief, what have we not a right to dread from the powerful tribes of the Northwest, the Blackfoot, Osage, Comanche, Sioux, and others, able to bring into the field 40,000 warriors, and to assemble in a month 15,000 of the most warlike Indians which this country has ever known, all well armed and mounted, with inexhaustible supplies of provisions and strongholds and fastnesses altogether inaccessible? It is not, sir, an over-excited imagination which alone may anticipate scenes on the frontiers of Missouri and Arkansas, which in every circumstance of atrocity and horror have no precedent, unless in the desolation of the Carnatic by Hyder Ali. Ask my gallant friend from Missouri, [Mr. ASHLER,] as little given to conjuring up imaginary dangers as to the shrinking from those which are real and present. He, sir, will tell you that the picture is not a fancy sketch. Why, sir, why is it when men and arms that may be had at a moment's warning, are so loudly called for by every consideration of the safety and protection of the West, that they are located far from the point of real danger, in places where there is none? Four companies in Maine, six in New York, and so on throughout the chapter.

I find my full justification in these facts, sir, for refusing to vote for any of these partial, piecemeal appropriations. When a broad, general, equal system is presented to us, I will vote as much money as can wisely be expended. I will not waste it with the profligacy of a spendthrift, only anxious to squander his patrimony. Of such a system I will throw out an outline. Three national armories: one on the Ohio, at Maysville, or some other more advantageous point; one somewhere on the line between North and South Carolina; another at some point in the neighborhood of Columbus, in Georgia. Arsenals at Fayetteville, Columbia, Natchitoches, Little Rock, Vincennes, Nashville, Columbus, Mississippi, and some point on the Ohio canal. The establishment of navy yards at Charleston or Port Royal, the best harbor on the Southern coast, and at some point on the Georgia coast; extensive yard at Pensacola, dry dock, materials for building the largest ships; naval station at Key West, and a perfect Moro Castle erected there. Let all this be done, and I will not withhold any thing that may be reasonably required by the North; until it is, I will hold the public treasure with a miser's grasp. I will vote as much as can be expended wisely. I have no idea whatever that one-half the amount asked for on the north Atlantic can be expended, and that a vote to appropriate it is only a vote to allow the money to remain in the pet banks. Looking at the thing a priori, it seems to me that forty thousand laborers cannot be obtained in that very small section. But, sir, we have authority on that subject. There being no appropriation for fortifications the last year, the only fund which was to be used in that way was an amount unexpended of the previous year. Of that sum about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars were appropriated to works in the vicinity of the city of New York. The work was not done. Hear the reason assigned by General Gratiot why the work was not done. He says:

"Fort Schuyler, Throg's Neck, East River, New York.—It was hoped, from the ample preparations made last year, and the funds available for their application, that the construction of this fort would have been prosecuted the present year with much vigor. But though materials and facilities of every description have been in waiting, it has been impossible to procure a sufficient force to carry on the work with the progress that was desired. No exertion has been spared to facilitate the operation, either by letting parts on contract or by hired labor, and unavailing efforts have been made to collect the necessary force in Boston, Newport, Connecticut, and the western part of New York."

Of the navy appropriations, three and a half millions remain unexpended. How much of those appropriations demanded labor, and were not expended for the want of that labor, does not appear, and therefore we have no certain data. Here, sir, was our Government, under such an apprehension of war that Senators are denounced for not committing what they regarded a violation of the constitution, to prepare for that war, and yet funds at the disposal of the Government to put the country in an attitude of defence were not used. Why were they not? The only answer that can be given, that is not disgraceful to the Government, is that given by General Gratiot—labor could not be procured. If the President did not anticipate war, he was practising a gasconade unworthy of his character; if he did, he was bound, as far as in him lay, to put the country in a state of defence. But, Mr. Chairman, even if this immense sum of ten or twelve millions can be expended, do not the enlightened men from that section, those especially representing the great manufacturing and shipping interests of the country, see that to send the Government there with ten millions of dollars as a bidder for labor must derange the whole industry of their country? The state of society at the North is eminently complex and artificial. The slightest shock must affect it. With the appalling scenes which a crash in our currency (a crash as certain as time itself) must produce, the manufacturing interest has already trials long and severe enough before it.

I entreat gentlemen to look well to the consequences of the experiment of sending the Government there as a competitor in the labor market, and under the constraint of positive orders to expend this vast sum, let labor rise ever so high. It is already one dollar a day, when in the South and West it is less than fifty cents. These appropriations are not for this year alone. They are the beginning of a system of lavish expenditure, which will last until 1842. No longer? No, sir, no longer, my word for it. Are the judicious men of the North, the property-holders of the North, disposed to organize in their bosom this army of day laborers—men who, all over the world, spend between Saturday and Monday the wages of the week, and who, at the period of their disbandment in the year 1842, will be penniless, and who must go supperless to bed, unless they rob by lawless insurrection, or by the equally terrible process of the ballot-box? Let gentlemen look to it: they are in quite as much danger of insurrection as we are.

Mr. Chairman, this business of fortifying such a coast as ours is not to be the work of a day, nor scarcely of a century. England, with all her resources, has not yet finished her fortifications. The genius of Vauban, and the magnificence of Louis XIV, required more than fifty years to place France in any decent condition of defence.

But, sir, I am willing to accelerate this great work to the utmost practicable point. If I am not wholly mistaken in the condition of things in Europe, a great struggle is coming on between the northern Powers; the colossal power of Russia, directed, in great degree, by the all-pervading genius of Metternich, on the one side, France and England on the other—a struggle, sir, between the principles of despotism and the cause of constitutional representative government. Such a contest must shake the civilized world to its deepest foundations. Either for the magnitude of the Powers engaged, or the importance of the issue, the world has heretofore seen nothing like it; no, sir, not even in the wars of the first fifteen years of the present century, when that man of destiny literally “stormed across the war-convulsed earth.” This, I rather think, has been the true reason for the wise interposition of England in our controversy with France.

In such a contest, where the cause of free government and of human liberty is at stake, we can scarcely desire to be neutral; we cannot be, if we do desire it, unless prepared to maintain an armed neutrality—armed, sir, to the teeth.

If there are any who think, by these and such appropriations, to dispose of the surplus, I have only to say that, if practicable, it would be unjust in the extreme, especially to the West, to draw such vast revenues from one section, and expend them on another. But, sir, it is impracticable, to the point of absurdity. The surplus in the Treasury, by the last advices from the Treasury, independent of bank stock, is nearly twenty-eight millions; to which add the United States Bank stock, and you have thirty-five millions. I say by the last advices from the Treasury, for one hardly has time to make calculations on the basis of one report, before another comes upon us, correcting some error; and I doubt not that, in less than a month, this last report will be followed by another, making some corrections, either in the estimates or the “ciphering.” With this 35 millions to begin with, and a revenue of at least thirty-five or forty millions next year, you will not only not be able to expend it, but it will continue to accumulate on your hands. Sir, it is miserable quackery, and, like all quackery, will not only not cure the disease, but ruin the system. I feel as deeply as any one can the portentous danger of further accumulation, and regard it as the very first duty of patriotism to devise some plan of disposing of the surplus. I feel, sir, that we are reposing under an avalanche, which a breath may precipitate upon us. Roman liberty first began to give way on the accumulation of corn in the public granaries. British liberty perished by the corrupting influence of public patronage, in the time of Sir R. Walpole. Even Lord Chatham, one of the greatest men in the tide of time, was scarcely able to galvanize it. I will go with any party which will devise any feasible plan of ridding us of this threatening evil; one which I contemplate with absolute dismay.

Mr. Chairman, there are practicable plans of disposing of the surplus, if gentlemen will conquer all their personal and party prejudices, and pass the land bill, and the constitutional amendment for the distribution of the surplus revenue. These are, in my judgment, the only practicable projects; and I rejoice in my heart that they come from those two great minds, which have for the last twenty-five years so gloriously illustrated the history of their country. In the present as in every past crisis of danger and difficulty, the war, the Missouri question, the compromise, two commanding figures have been seen above the horizon, with the eyes of their countrymen intently fixed upon them, with a well-placed confidence which has never been disappointed. These men are out of power, or my voice should not be heard here in their eulogy. Sir, the expunging process must be carried very far; you must expunge the history of your country for a quarter of a century; you must tear from that history its brightest pages; ay, sir, and you must expunge from the human heart every virtuous and honorable sentiment, homage for genius, gratitude for public services, before their well-earned laurels can be torn from their brows. They will have added another to their many claims upon the gratitude of posterity, if they can succeed in relieving the country from the great danger of an overflowing Treasury, a difficulty for the first time known in the history of the world.

Before Mr. THOMPSON had concluded his speech, (the whole of which is given above,) he gave way to a motion for the committee to rise.

The committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.

OHIO BOUNDARY LINE.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a resolution providing that the bill to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union on certain conditions, be made the special order of the day for the 15th of the present month.

Mr. BELL moved the same amendment moved by him to the resolution reported this morning, from the Committee on Territories, viz: Provided, That before that time the several appropriation bills should be disposed of by the House.

The amendment was agreed to. And on the resolution, as amended,

Mr. THOMAS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MERCER inquired of the Chair if the motion required a majority of two-thirds for its adoption?

The CHAIR replied, that, inasmuch as its object was to change the order of business, and consequently the rules of the House, so far as that order was concerned, it would require a majority of two-thirds.

The resolution, as amended, was rejected: Yeas 124, nays 79; not being two-thirds in the affirmative.

NAVAL SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MILLER in the chair.

The consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the year 1836 was resumed by the committee.

The question being on the motion of Mr. BELL to reduce the appropriation for the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, from $65,000 to $35,500.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, resumed and concluded his remarks on the subject, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. EVANS expressed his intention to address the committee on the subject, and, as the hour was late, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. E. yielded the floor to Mr. CAMBRELENG, on whose motion the committee took up for consideration

The bill making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1836;

And the bill to repeal so much of the act entitled "An act transferring the duties of Commissioner of Loans," as requires the Bank of the United States to perform the duties of commissioner of loans for the several States.

CONVENTION WITH SPAIN.

On motion of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the committee took up the bill to carry into effect the convention with Spain.

Mr. M., by order of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, moved a substitute for the above bill, the object of which motion he explained.

After some remarks from Mr. J. Q. ADAMS, expressing his preference of the substitute to the original bill,

Mr. CUSHING said that he desired to avail himself of this occasion to express his strong sense of the justice and honor exhibited by the Government of Spain, in the treaty of which this bill was the consummation. In the midst of national calamities, which she met with her characteristic fortitude, with a deadly civil war raging in her bosom, and weighed down with financial embarrassments, Spain has acknowledged and satisfied the claims of our citizens, in a spirit of manly promptitude and frankness, strikingly contrasted with the conduct of some other European Powers in a similar matter. This procedure on the part of that gallant and highminded nation did honor to the liberal policy which actuates her present rulers. And associated as Spain and the United States are by the ties of a close intercourse, reciprocally beneficial to both, Mr. C. said he felt that it was the duty of the American Congress, in passing this bill, to bear emphatic testimony to the integrity and dignified sentiment of self-respect manifested in this affair by the Queen Regent of Spain.

The amendment was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the committee then rose, and reported the foregoing bills to the House, with the exception of the naval service bill, on which the committee had leave to sit again.

The two bills reported without amendment were read a third time and passed.

The amendment to the bill to carry into effect the convention with Spain was concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HANNEGAN rose and remarked that he had seen with regret a settled determination on the part of the majority of the House to resist any attempt to expose the abuses of the Military Academy at West Point. He warned the House that they could not smother the truth, and that, one way or another, the facts should be made known.

Here Mr. H. was loudly called to order, both by the Chair and by several members; and he moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of offering the following resolution, which was read for information:

Resolved, That the report of the select committee appointed during the last Congress to investigate the affairs of the West Point Military Academy be withdrawn from the files, and that ten thousand copies thereof be printed.

Mr. H. again rose, and was again called to order. He said it was easy to teach a starling to cry order, but he desired to have the yeas and nays; which motion he hoped was in order.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. BROWN begged leave to make an inquiry of the Chair.

The CHAIR informed the gentleman the question was not debatable.

Mr. BROWN said he did not desire to discuss the question; he only wished to know whether the report of the select committee, to which the resolution referred, had ever been received by the House?

The CHAIR replied that he could not answer the question. It was a report made by a committee at the last Congress.

Mr. WHITTLESEY inquired if the motion was intended to suspend the rules generally, so as to set aside the ordinary business of the day?

Mr. HANNEGAN explained, that his motion contemplated only an application to the morning hour.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows: Yeas 112, nays 83:

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, in the case of the North Carolina contested election.

Mr. HARD, on a former day, made a motion, (which was modified on the suggestion of Mr. MANN, of New York,) that the petitioner, David Newland, have leave to appear, and also to address the House on the subject of his petition.

The question pending was the amendment proposed by Mr. BYNUM, that the petitioner be permitted to appear by himself or by counsel.

Mr. BYNUM said, when he made the motion, he had done so because he understood, in private conversation, that the petitioner wished counsel; and, also, in accordance with the views expressed by the majority of the Committee of Elections. His colleague [Mr. CORWIN] had stated that he was authorized by the petitioner to say that he did not wish counsel. Mr. B. had since had a conversation with the petitioner, and with his colleague, and had ascertained that the petitioner had made such a declaration; but the reason why he had done so was, that at that time the petitioner was unconscious that such a request had ever been asked, by any petitioner of the House of Representatives, and he was unwilling to ask any thing that had not been granted to others under similar circumstances. Upon mature reflection, however, the petitioner had stated to Mr. B. that he would ask for counsel; ascertaining that it had been the uniform practice of the House to hear petitioners in such cases by counsel, and that that privilege had been in no one instance denied when asked. Mr. B. said, in reciting the case he had the other day of a contested election from New Jersey in 1789, he had shown that it was the opinion of Mr. Madison, Mr. Stone, and various others, that the petitioner in such cases should have counsel. It appeared to be admitted by all parties that the petitioner should be heard by counsel on the main question, but it was doubted by some whether he should be heard on the preliminary question. He had understood it to be the almost invariable practice in the British Parliament, to grant petitioners in such cases a hearing by counsel. He had found other cases in our own country than those already mentioned, and in one of those cases the sitting member had been allowed counsel; and he had not discovered a single case where counsel had been refused. He took the liberty of dissenting from the broad ground taken by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARRIS.] That gentleman had stated that he thought it would be highly impolitic to admit lawyers on that floor to argue the cases of petitioners, in the case of contested elections. Mr. B. thought it would be politic to have counsel. He believed it would be better for each party to have counsel, and not have members of the House advocating each individual's claims; because, in so doing, gentlemen disqualified themselves from becoming judges of the matter, which they were bound to settle. For that reason, he believed the true policy would be to grant the petitioner counsel on the main question. The gentleman had very truly said that there were enough of distinguished lawyers in the House to advocate either of the gentlemen's causes; but he must tell the gentleman that those lawyers were not going to pay that attention to the case that one would who was employed expressly for that purpose. The members of the House were not going to make that search into the laws of the State, in relation to the matter, which a lawyer would, whose business it was to do so. He knew from his little experience that the practice was to give the documents a mere casual perusal. While up, he could not but express his regret at the remarks made the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENNA.] He did think that the gentleman's statement had misrepresented his views, and his persisting in it would justify him (Mr. B.) in using language towards that gentleman, that he had too much regard for the dignity of the House to use in its presence; but he was willing to let the country judge between what he had said and the gentleman's statement. He hoped the vote would be taken on allowing the petitioner counsel, and that the preliminary question might be at once settled.

Mr. MERCER did not rise to discuss the subject, but merely to state, in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] that counsel had not been admitted in such cases into the British Parliament since the passage of the Grenville act.

Mr. REED said he believed that counsel had not been admitted into Congress in the case of a contested election for thirty years past. At the commencement of the Government, when the House was small, counsel had been admitted; but time had become so precious of late years that they were not admitted. If they were to admit counsel, there ought to be good reason for it, and he did not think there was good reason for such admission on the present occasion. The matter had been before a committee of nine members, whose duty it was to examine into all constitutional and legal questions in relation thereto. They had, after examining the question, and hearing all the testimony from the respective parties for the last three months, made two reports to the House. After that, was the examination to stop? No; it would be still further examined, and there were enough of members to discuss the subject. There was no difficulty in finding a sufficiency of speakers. There were many lawyers on the floor, competent and willing to discuss any legal matters which might come before them; but he found other gentlemen, who were not lawyers, competent to discuss the present question, and to discuss it ably, too; and therefore he could not see the necessity of introducing lawyers to argue the case, and consume the time of the House. They might as well ask to have lawyers to come into the House to advocate the cause of the sufferers by the late fire in New York. Those sufferers certainly were as much in need of counsel as the petitioners. But his principal objection was to the time that would be wasted; if a lawyer was to be heard, he would take two days in making an argument. If the gentleman was not capable of advocating his claim to his seat, he would find plenty of friends in the House who would do it for him; and he ventured that no member would express an opinion which would make him incapable of acting afterwards as a judge in the case. He objected to it from want of time, and that it might be the means of introducing lawyers on the floor on other subjects.

Mr. HARD expressed a hope that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] would withdraw his amendment, and permit the petitioner to take his seat until this preliminary question was settled. He could not but think that the debate had taken a wide and unnecessary range at this stage.

Mr. GLASCOCK would be very unwilling himself to adopt, under any circumstances, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, that counsel should be allowed, even if he could bring himself for a moment to believe that there was any necessity for it. Independent of this, he believed that, unless where there was an absolute necessity, the precedent was a dangerous and bad one. But why should the petitioner wish for counsel, when the report of the committee was in his favor? Mr. G. did not look upon the question as a mere legal one, or as involving only a legal question. It was true, that it depended in a great measure upon the law of North Carolina, regulating the proceedings of elections in that State; but the whole testimony was now introduced, and could it for a moment be presumed that individual members of the House were not fully qualified to decide upon that evidence? Where, then, could exist the necessity for the employment of counsel, if there be no difficult points involved? Or even if there were difficult points involved, it appeared to him that it was both prudent and proper for the House to decide for itself, without the interference of counsel. He could not believe that any difficulties could arise in the discussion of this question, nor could he be induced to believe that any individual member of the House would undertake to decide a question of such importance without making himself perfectly qualified to do so, by fully informing himself of all the facts upon which he would have to vote. He would venture to assert that no individual member on that floor would vote upon this question without reading all the evidence, and without listening to all the arguments that might be advanced by gentlemen on both sides of the question.

Independent of this, Mr. G. must be permitted to observe that wherever counsel was employed for a specific purpose, for the purpose of advocating the particular cause of a particular individual, he was expected, from the very nature of his station, from the duty a counsel owed to his client, to bring forward the strong points only, those calculated to operate exclusively for the benefit of the individual he represented, and not to touch upon those that would go to sustain the other side. It did appear to Mr. G., then, that, taking a general view of the subject, both as to policy and precedent, believing that House competent to investigate for itself this question, there was no propriety on the present occasion of allowing counsel to the petitioner. He was opposed to the motion upon general principles, and he concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED,] that this principle once adopted, would have to be carried out on all subjects involving a legal point which might come up there for discussion. It was wrong, it was improper, and he could never consent to it.

Mr. WHITTLESEY here called for the orders of the day.

Mr. BOYD moved to suspend the orders of the day, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of this subject.

Mr. BYNUM wished to move simply to proceed with the discussion, as he conceived that motion required only a bare majority.

The CHAIR decided that that motion would require two-thirds, consistent with the precedents that had been long established by the House, and decided upon at least twenty times. The effect of the motion was to suspend the rules of the House, so far as private business was concerned.

Mr. BOYD then modified his motion, by moving that the House proceed with the consideration of the report from the Committee of Elections. The motion was decided as follows: Ayes 87, noes 83; whereupon,

The CHAIR decided that, in conformity with what he understood to be the declared sense of the House, by long-established precedents, the motion was not agreed to, because it required a majority of two-thirds.

Mr. BYNUM then took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, on the ground that a bare majority was sufficient to proceed with the business under consideration, and that Friday and Saturday were not so absolutely set apart for the consideration of private business as to make that subject the special order of those days. The 19th rule is as follows:

"Friday and Saturday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business, in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House;" and the point was, whether it required a bare "majority," or a "majority" of two-thirds. The decision of the Chair, and former precedents for more than six years, were in favor of the latter.

Mr. CUSHING said that a statement of the question, and of two or three considerations applicable to it, would explain the grounds on which he should vote.

There is a rule of the House which provides that the two last days of the week shall be appropriated to the despatch of private business, unless a majority of the House shall otherwise order. Another and a subsequent rule provides that the order of business shall not be changed without a vote of two-thirds of the House. The question is: What is the construction of these two rules, collated together?

Mr. G. said it seems to be admitted, in the first place, that in point of fact the second of these rules was introduced and established for the express purpose of controlling or explaining the first, and of meeting the very case under debate. Secondly, that it had been the uniform and settled practice of the House to apply the rule of two-thirds to this case; and, in the absence of any thing written, such a practice constituted a rule. And, in his judgment, the original design of the rule, and the current of decisions under it, were sound and right upon principle. It was the general doctrine, to suspend the rules and change the stated order of business for a temporary object, only by a vote of two-thirds, because otherwise the business of the House would be subject to the fluctuating will and unstable impulses of a bare majority, acting under the hasty impressions of the moment. And it would be particularly wrong thus to set afloat the immense mass of the claims of private individuals, who, as it is, labored under such intolerable difficulties in pursuing a demand against the United States.

The point of order was debated at some length, and the decision of the Chair was sustained by Messrs. MERCER, BRIGGS, WILLIAMS of Kentucky, WHITTLESEY, SUTHERLAND, and EVERETT, and opposed by Messrs. BYNUM, BEARDSLEY, HARPER, VINTON, MANN of New York, BELL, VANDERPOEL, and TOUCEY.

Mr. HAMER demanded the previous question; which was seconded: Ayes 108, noes not counted; and the main question was ordered to be put without a count.

The main question was, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and thereon Mr. MANN, of New York, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 132, nays 61, as follows:

So the House determined that the decision of the Chair should stand as the judgment of the House.

The House then proceeded to the orders of the day and took up several engrossed bills; which were read a third time and passed; and then

The house adjourned.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5.

OHIO BOUNDARY LINE.

The motion heretofore submitted by Mr. HAMER, to print 10,000 extra copies of the report and bill fixing the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union, was taken up.

Mr. HAMER modified his resolution, by proposing to print the usual number of copies of the brief on the same subject, presented on behalf of the Ohio delegation.

Mr. VINTON suggested that the papers referred to in the brief be also printed.

Mr. HAMER acquiesced in the suggestion, and modified his motion accordingly.

Mr. RENCHER had no objection to printing an extra number of the report and bill, but the number proposed he believed to be too large. He therefore moved to amend the proposition by substituting 5,000 for 10,000 copies; which was agreed to.

Mr. BEARDSLEY suggested that the brief presented on behalf of Michigan, and the papers therein referred to, should also be printed.

Mr. HAMER had no objection, and further modified his resolution, in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from New York.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. MANN of New York, HAMER, PARKER, THOMAS, and GRENELL, as to the character and extent of the briefs, and the papers therein referred to, when the resolution was further amended by excepting such papers as had been previously directed to be appended to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary; and, thus amended, it was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election from one of the districts of North Carolina.

The question pending was the amendment proposed by Mr. BYNUM, that the petitioner be permitted to appear by himself or by counsel.

Mr. GRIFFIN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. RENCHER wished to state one fact, which ought to induce the House to grant counsel, and that was, that the petitioner had the benefit of counsel before the committee; and he could see no good reason why he should not be entitled to the same benefit on the floor of the House. He would vote for the motion that the petitioner be allowed counsel, because he had asked for it, and he would have granted the sitting member counsel if he had desired it. He agreed with his colleague, [Mr. BYNUM,] that it more became them to listen to the arguments of others than to engage in it themselves.

The question was then put on the motion that the petitioner be permitted to appear by counsel, and decided in the negative: Yeas 67, nays 112, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Bean, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bynum, Chapman, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crane, Davis, Denny, Dickerson, Dickson, Farlin, French, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, Joseph Hall, Hannegan, Harper, Albert G. NAYS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Banks, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Mr. BYNUM said he was in hopes that, since the House had, by the vote which it had just given, refused the petitioner leave to be heard by counsel, it would act its principle out, and reject the motion offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRIS] to allow the petitioner the privilege to appear at the bar of the House, and to speak in his own defence, as it was a request that the petitioner had not made.

The vote which had just been taken was one to which he begged the liberty of the House to call the earnest attention of every farmer, mechanic, workingman, and tradesman, in this nation. It was one in which, in the sincerity of his heart, he believed their most solemn rights as freemen had been invaded and violated. For the first time it was, that ever a freeman and an American citizen had been refused the right or privilege to be heard in the Congress of the United States, the professed assemblage of the representatives of the only truly free nation on earth, in defence not only of his own rights and interest, which are involved in his seat on this floor, but in defence of the rights and interest of forty-seven thousand four hundred souls of the district whose representative he claimed the right to be in that House. He was glad that some honorable gentleman had called for the yeas and nays on that question, as the farmers and workingmen of the country might see what they had a right to expect from their Representatives there. [Here the SPEAKER called Mr. B. to order, and said it was not in order to speak on a subject that had been decided.] Mr. B. said he would submit with great respect to the correction of the Chair; but that, by the vote of the House, an act of injustice had been done the petitioner, and that it could not be repaired by the passage of the resolution of the gentleman from New York. He, as a freeman and an American citizen, had been denied the privilege of being heard by counsel in defence of his rights, and the rights of his constituents, on that floor; and he wished it to be marked and well noted by that class of citizens of this country who were not lawyers, and who were not professed speech-makers. Sir, said Mr. B., the act of injustice done to that portion of the community is gross, and violative of every spirit of freedom; the decision that has been made is in the very face of every precedent that has ever occurred in this House. I protest against it as being fraught with the grossest injustice towards every petitioner that may hereafter come before this House, who is not a lawyer by profession or a hackneyed public speaker. Surely gentlemen have not considered the consequences of the vote that has just been given, the vital rights of the great class of farmers and workingmen that it so seriously affects; the great advantage that it must give to the lawyers over every other class of men that have not been bred to speech-making. Can that class of the community who are not of the legal profession sanction so enormous a breach of their dearest rights, in a place where they should be so tenaciously guarded? Sir, said Mr. B., the working class of society cannot look with indifference at this act. He hoped their attention would be called to it in every section of the country; the denial of the privilege to be heard by counsel was against the uniform practice of the House, in every case where it had been asked, since the formation of the Government until the present time. There had not been a single instance where it had ever been before refused, and he thought the House assumed an awful responsibility in setting aside the precedent at this late day of the republic, in opposition to a practice so long acquiesced in. It was against the spirit and genius of the constitution.

The case operated with peculiar hardship on the present occasion. The petitioner was no public speaker, and did not ask to be heard, except by counsel; and the House had made a most singular decision, that he should not be heard by counsel, and was about to decide that he should or might be heard by himself. Now, said Mr. B., this is what the petitioner did not ask. He is no debater, and is, comparatively, a perfect stranger in this House; and no man could do himself justice, that was a stranger, however much he might be accustomed to public speaking, who might in his first attempt undertake to address this House; but for one unaccustomed to public speaking to attempt it, it was utterly impossible that he could do it with that composure and deliberation that was necessary in the discussion of a great legal or constitutional question. Yet, by the vote of the House, it had been decided that the petitioner, however illy competent to address it, was to be forced to attempt it, to the exposure of himself, and the great prejudice of his claim, and to the interest of all others interested in the decision. It was giving too great an advantage to the lawyers over every other class. No man in future might think of contesting a seat here, who was not a lawyer, with any prospect of success. Had this been a new case, so strong were the reasons to his mind, he should, without the least hesitation, have granted counsel, if desired by either the petitioner or the sitting member. Such had been the constant and uniform practice of the House, which he had taken pains to ascertain; and it certainly offered the strongest reasons at this time against deviating from a precedent so long held sacred, and founded, in his judgment, in the strictest policy and propriety. But he had said it had operated with peculiar hardship on the petitioner. The sitting member had been a member of this House near three years, a lawyer of eminence, who had formed many acquaintances and connexions of different kinds, and had had an opportunity, both in private and in public, of placing in possession of the strongest points of his case most of those with whom he had formed an acquaintance during this time; he had also made two lengthy arguments to the House, while the petitioner was excluded from the House, both in himself and counsel. Was such a course not calculated to bias the House in his favor, and give their prepossessions in the justness of his claim? It certainly appeared so to him.

But the gentleman from New York has moved to permit the petitioner on the floor, with the privilege to speak in his own defence. Sir, the gentleman from New York represents the minority of the committee that was opposed to the claim of the petitioner. The petitioner will ask nothing at the hands of those who are opposed to him: he is old enough to know what danger there has ever been found in the gifts of an enemy. The petitioner has not asked this from the gentleman from New York; the petitioner is aware that he has nothing to expect from that quarter. Sir, I think I see through the design of the gentleman from New York, and so does the petitioner. That gentleman thinks, no doubt, if his resolution be adopted, that it will supersede the resolution offered by the majority of the committee, who were friendly to the claims of the petitioner. Sir, is this not, by indirection, an attempt of monstrous injustice towards the petitioner, who has already had the strongest cause of complaint against the House? He certainly viewed such a course as being most unjustifiable.

Again, sir: has not evidence been presented, and ordered to be printed and laid on the desk of each member of this House, in favor of the sitting member, which was taken after the committee had decided they would receive no more evidence, which nobody was here to object to—the petitioner not being represented on the floor, either in person or by counsel? Can such a course be compatible with any principle of justice or equity?

Sir, said Mr. B., I am not a little astonished at the course it is manifest that the House is disposed to take already on this subject, and I hope that the decision it has this day made against the rights and interests of a certain class of the community may long be remembered, and not overlooked by them at a future day.

The resolution that the House was about to adopt had come from one hostile to the pretensions of the petitioner, and was, he was authorized to say, entirely gratuitous; and he viewed it as being wholly declusive, and, if adopted, could afford no substantial relief to the petitioner, and he thought it unnecessary to adopt it with any view of the kind. It would be adding insult to injury. He had asked for one thing; you will, by the adoption of the gratuitous resolution of the member from New York, with his known hostility towards the petitioner, have given him another.

NOTE.—Book of Contested Elections in Congress.—1789. The case to which Mr. BRUM had referred in his former remarks was case the 2d of the New Jersey members, page 42.

"On motion of Mr. Liney, that the parties appear, and be heard by their counsel before the House,

"Mr. Livermore said, I have no objection that counsel should be heard upon the merits of the principal question.

"Mr. Madison thought it would be proper to hear counsel.

"Mr. Page: If the jurisdiction of the House was questioned, the parties had an indubitable right to be heard by counsel, and he hoped no gentleman would refuse the people of the United States a privilege of this important nature, which had always been enjoyed by the subjects of Great Britain.

"Mr. Stone had no objection to admitting a limited number, if it was required.

"1792. Page 49.—In case 11, Jackson vs. Wayne, from Georgia, it was postponed to the 27th of February, and on that day it was further continued, on the suggestion of the sitting member, to the 10th of March, on which day leave was granted to the sitting member to be heard by his counsel at the bar of the House.

"1804. Page 129.—Case 20, Moore vs. Lewis, from Virginia. March 1st, 1804, the committee was discharged; and, resolved, that the memorialist and the sitting member shall, if they desire it, be heard by counsel before the bar of the House.

"Mr. Moore appeared at the bar, and spoke in favor of his memorialist, claiming the seat of Major Lewis.

"Mr. Jones, the counsel of Major Lewis, then spoke in favor of his right to his seat."

Mr. BRUM also referred to the case in the British Parliament, of John Luttrell, petitioner, vs. Sir Abraham Hume and William Joliff, when both the sitting member and petitioner were heard by counsel.

Mr. HARDIN said that the motion was that the petitioner have leave to appear and to address the House; but if that gentleman did not choose to avail himself of the privilege, there was no harm done. The resolution was not mandatory that the petitioner shall come and speak, but that he have leave if he choose to do so. If, however, the gentleman did not avail himself of the privilege, he expected the members of the House would do him ample and impartial justice. They were to decide the case partly as members of the House and partly in the character of a court of adjudication, and it was to be settled by the evidence which every member had on his table. The resolution proposed to give the petitioner a seat on that floor; but if that gentleman says he will not avail himself of those rights, because the House would not give him more, let him do so. But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRUM] had said that, because the House had negatived the motion to grant the petitioner counsel, it ought not to pass the resolution granting him a seat. The House, Mr. H. said, ought still to pass the resolution and if the petitioner did not avail himself of the privilege, it was his own look out. He had voted against the amendment granting counsel, and should do so again. When a man spoke on that floor on great constitutional questions, he wanted him to speak as a member of that House, impressed with the high responsibility which rested upon him. It had not been from any disposition not to hear the counsel the gentleman might produce; he would be willing to hear every thing that could throw light on the matter; but he could not consent to have the time of the House consumed by the arguments of a lawyer. In relation to the motion coming from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HARD,] he thought it was perfectly correct. Was that gentleman an enemy of the petitioner? He believed not. Was he an opponent of the petitioner? He believed he was not. The members of the committee might have made up their minds that one was entitled to the seat and another was not, but he was far from believing that either of them were opponents of the petitioner or of the sitting member. He would vote for the resolution, and then it would be optional with the petitioner to take his seat or not.

Mr. HARD said he wished to make a few remarks in explanation. If he understood the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRUM] correctly, he had said the motion came from a quarter unfriendly to the petitioner. He did not know what the gentleman from North Carolina considered a want of friendship in the members of the committee towards the petitioner; but he trusted, so far as he was concerned, and so far as he had acted, and in the course he intended to pursue, that he would not be governed by party, but by principle. He had been induced to bring the motion before the House at the instance and request of an honorable gentleman from Virginia; and if they were to judge from votes, that gentleman was the political friend of the petitioner. It was argued by that gentleman and others, that the sitting member had the privilege of making statements to the House, which the petitioner himself was better qualified to answer than any other individual. It was also urged by some of the petitioner's friends, that it was the duty of the committee to bring forward the motion. He had consulted both the members of the majority and minority of the committee, and he had to say to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BRUM,] that he disclaimed all unfriendly feelings towards the petitioner.

Mr. FRY, of Pennsylvania, said he was among those who had voted against the petitioner being heard upon this floor by counsel, and he should also vote against his being heard in person; and this he had done and would do, under the fullest conviction that the House were amply competent, and would do the claim of the petitioner ample justice, upon the final action of the House upon the subject. Sir, (said Mr. F.,) we have not only the report of the standing Committee of Elections, but we have a double report—a minority report upon the subject; and what member of this House would hazard the opinion that the reports did not embrace all the facts in the case? And if they do, do we want a lawyer to read and expound that report to the House? Does the House want a lawyer to distort the evidence? I have full confidence in the ability of the committee, who have made the report, to do justice to the contending parties; and having their reports, I want the opinion or advice of no lawyer to tell me what these reports are, and whether they do justice or injustice to either of the parties. I cannot see, if this petitioner is entitled to be heard upon this floor, why every person who has a claim is not entitled to be heard by counsel; I cannot make a distinction between claimants. Precedents have been referred to. I make precedents the rule of my conduct only so far as I consider them good and sound. I make precedents the rule of my conduct no further than I approve of them. Sir, I said I voted against allowing the petitioner to be heard by counsel upon this floor, and I repeat it, because I believed the House amply competent, and I cannot doubt but the House will do him full justice; and I was sorry to hear the insinuation of the gentleman from North Carolina, that a disposition was manifested by the vote of the House, to do the petitioner injustice. I have troubled the House with these few observations, in justification

Esbridge and Fisk—Alford and Brush, &c.

[H. OF R.]

of the vote I gave upon the amendment, and in justification of the vote I should give upon the proposition of the gentleman from New York; and with these observations I dismiss the subject.

Mr. ADAMS said he felt some embarrassment on the present occasion, as to the course he ought to pursue. It had happened that he was absent when the yeas and nays were taken, and he had not had an opportunity of recording his vote. It had not been his intention to enter into the present question at all; and he should have been satisfied by an opportunity of voting, which would have been in favor of admitting counsel on the part of the petitioner. He would have done so, because he conceived it to be the right of a citizen of the United States, sent there by forty thousand voters, or claiming to be sent by them. He should have considered it as one of the rights of the petitioner and of his constituents, to be heard by counsel, if he had thought proper to ask it. It was the only principle on which he could be placed on an equality with his competitor; because no one was capable of speaking for himself, in such a case. What was the result? Go into a court of justice, and see on one side one of the first lawyers of the land, and on the other a man who had nothing but the justice of his cause to sustain him; let the judges and jurors be as honest and capable as they might be, and nine times out of ten the suit would be decided in favor of the man who had the great lawyer. To deny counsel was to take away the equality which should be given to the petitioner.

Mr. BOON rose to a point of order. He did not think the gentleman in order in reflecting on the decision of the House.

Mr. A. resumed. It had not been his intention to trouble the House with any remarks; but he wished to give his reason for voting against the motion then before the House. The present motion was a substitute for the one which the House had refused to grant. It was now proposed that the petitioner should be admitted on the floor of the House, and that he should have permission of the House to use a faculty which his friends said he did not possess. Now, it seemed to him, if that principle was established, the question might be asked, have the people the right to send a man to Congress who was not a profound lawyer; a man who might be good in counsel, but had not the faculty of speaking? The right of the member was the right of his constituents, and he did not know of any law which required that a member of Congress should be a public speaker. That was a matter for their constituents to determine for themselves. And every gentleman knew full well that there were many members of that House who had not the peculiar faculty of speaking, but who were as useful members as any others in the House. But were gentlemen going to admit the petitioner, who was no lawyer himself, to plead his own cause, when his friends have told them that he was not capable of pleading it? and that, too, when his competitor was a debater equal to almost any gentleman on that floor? The proposition was fallacious. It had the appearance of placing the petitioner on an equality with his competitor, and at the same time amounted to nothing at all. It was a refusal of his rights, together with the pretension of granting him his rights. So far as a resolution went, taking it abstractly, he should vote for it, for the House had declined what he believed to have been the petitioner's rights; but he found the petitioner's friends were not willing to accept of it; and therefore he labored under some embarrassment, and he should rather be inclined to vote against the resolution. Gentlemen might consider it a sort of indemnity for what they had refused the petitioner, and it would be so, were it not for the fact that it was absolutely a delusive privilege; and it was better to say at once that he should not have a seat, and submit his case to the justice of the House. He begged not to be suspected of entertaining any hostile feeling towards either of the gentlemen. He had a high regard for the sitting member, and of his competitor he knew nothing. Not being in the House to record his vote on the subject, he had taken the opportunity of giving the reasons why he should vote against the proposition to allow the gentleman to plead his own cause, which he considered a delusive appearance of justice, and no reality.

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the orders of the day; but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. HAMER, who, by consent of the House, moved a reconsideration of the vote of this morning on the resolution directing extra copies of the report on the Ohio and Michigan boundary question, &c., to be printed, as he wished to move to strike out that part directing the printing of the briefs. Mr. H. said that, by a conversation with some members of the Judiciary Committee, he had ascertained that, under the resolution as adopted, there was no document or brief that could be printed on behalf of Michigan. To print one on behalf of Ohio, under such circumstances, might seem like taking an advantage of Michigan. This Ohio did not want; and he desired a reconsideration for the purpose of striking out all that part of the resolution which related to the printing of briefs on either side.

The House reconsidered the vote. Mr. H. modified the resolution as proposed, and it was then adopted.

ESKRIDGE AND FISK.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Thomas P. Esbridge and Alvarez Fisk.

An amendment having been proposed by Mr. PARKER, it was opposed by Messrs. LINCOLN and SEVIER, and advocated by the mover; when

Mr. PARKER varied his motion, by proposing to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions.

After some further remarks by Messrs. SEVIER, BOON, VINTON, PARKER, LINCOLN, MASON of Virginia, WHITTLESEY, and KENNON,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for a division of the question; and it was first put upon committing, and decided in the negative; the second branch of the motion fell, as a matter of course.

The amendment of Mr. PARKER to strike out the allowance of interest was then disagreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

ALFORD AND BRUSH.

A joint resolution for the relief of Benedict Alford was amended, on motion of Mr. WARDWELL, by adding a provision for the relief of Robert Brush; and, after some debate, the further consideration of the resolution was postponed until Friday next.

Mr. DAVIS moved an adjournment.

Mr. P. C. FULLER asked for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were not ordered.

The question on the adjournment was taken by tellers: Ayes 82, noes 61; and, at 3 o'clock, P. M.,

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 7.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The CHAIR announced the unfinished business of the last petition day first in order to be the motion of Mr. PATTON to suspend the rules of the House, for the purpose of enabling him to submit a motion for leave to withdraw the joint resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia (presented by him) on the subject of the abolition of slavery.

Mr. PATTON called for the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPANGLER (who voted in the majority) moved to reconsider the vote respecting the motion made by Mr. BYNUM to allow Mr. Newland to appear before the House by counsel, on the subject of his petition for a seat in the place of Mr. GRAHAM, of North Carolina.

The motion to reconsider was received and laid over.

NEW YORK TRADES UNION.

The motion heretofore made by Mr. HESTER to reconsider the vote referring to the Committee on Roads and Canals the memorial of the New York Trades Union, in reference to the hours of labor required by the superintendents of the public works, was taken up.

Mr. HESTER said that, in explanation of the vote he intended to give on the motion now pending, he thought it proper to state that he made that motion at the solicitation of an honorable member of the House, as an act of courtesy to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MOORE,] in order that he might again have the vote of the House on the reference he desired. When, on Monday last, that gentleman presented the memorial in question, and asked its reference to a select committee, apprehending that, if it was so referred, a report would probably be made, calculated to foster and encourage the agrarian and levelling spirit which, in my opinion, is already too prevalent in the country, I, in order to arrest in its incipency what I believed to be an evil, moved to lay the petition on the table. This motion having failed, and the gentleman's motion also failing, I voted for its reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals, because I then thought that the subject legitimately belonged to that committee. I still entertain the same opinion. I doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether there is a gentleman on this floor more conversant with the public improvements of the country than the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, or who understands better what is due from the Government to the laborers employed on public works. And I am sure there is none more willing than he and his associates of the committee to do what is expedient and right in reference to the subject-matter of the petition. For these considerations, I shall myself vote against the reconsideration.

Mr. EVANS moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, which was agreed to.

The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the CHAIR announced the special order, being the appropriation bills.

Mr. BOYD moved to suspend the rule for the purpose of considering the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election from North Carolina.

Mr. GRAYSON moved to amend the motion by suspending the rules for the purpose of proceeding with the reception and disposition of petitions; which was agreed to.

AFRICAN COLONIZATION.

The next business in order, lying over from Monday last, was the following:

Mr. CLARK presented the memorial of a public meeting of sundry citizens of Dauphin county, Pennsylvania, held at Harrisburg, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the purpose of removing to the coast of Africa free negroes and manumitted slaves; and that if, in the opinion of Congress, the constitution should not authorize the appropriation, such measures may be taken to procure an amendment of that instrument as may be calculated to ensure the objects of the memorialists.

Mr. C. moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee, and printed.

Recession of the District of Columbia—Removal of Obstructions, &c.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. PATTON moved to lay the memorial on the table, together with the motion to print and commit; and that motion was the pending one.

Mr. DENNY asked the general consent of the House to move that the whole subject be postponed till Monday next, as his colleague [Mr. CLARK] was unavoidably absent; which was accorded, and the motion was agreed to.

Numerous petitions and memorials were then presented.

RECESSION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked the consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of ceding the said District back to the States of Virginia and Maryland, respectively; and to report specially—

1. The prominent objections, if any, to the validity of such cession.

2. The advantages or disadvantages likely to result from this measure (if adopted) to the said States, to the District itself and its inhabitants, or to the United States.

3. The reservations and provisions that should accompany such cession, with a view to the permanent continuance of the seat of Government in the said District; the entire protection and preservation of the property of the United States therein, and the attainment of such other objects as the committee may deem necessary and proper, to guard the rights and interests of all; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Objection being made, Mr. ROBERTSON moved to suspend the rules, in order to enable him to submit his resolution.

Mr. R. GARLAND called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BOULDIN said, as the question was an important one, and the House was thin, he would move a call of the House.

The motion was negatived: Ayes 40, noes 68.

No quorum voting, Mr. WHITTLESEY renewed the motion for a call of the House; which was ordered.

After proceeding some time, on motion of Mr. VANDERPOEL, the further proceedings under the call were suspended.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the negative: Yeas 71, nays 114, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Beale, Beaumont, Bell, Bouldin, Bunch, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Coffee, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cramer, Davis, Doubleday, Fairfield, Forester, Philo C. Fuller, James Garland, Rice Garland, Glascock, Grayson, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hannegan, Albert G. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Ashley, Banks, Barton, Beardsley, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Bynum, William B. Calhoun, Carr, Casey, G. Chambers, John Chambers, Chanev, Cleveland, Coles, Cushing, Cushman, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Dunlap, Esner, Evans, Everett, Farlin, French, Fry, W. K. REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS AT HAVRE DE GRACE.

Mr. TURNER presented the memorial of a large and respectable portion of the citizens of Harford county, Maryland, praying that an appropriation may be made for removing obstructions at or near the head of the bay below the port of Havre de Grace, and causing the channel to be deepened. Mr. T. said: Mr. Speaker, the substance of this memorial is of such a character that it speaks for itself; but I cannot forbear saying that the magnitude and importance of its object are such as redound to the credit of the memorialists. The enterprise is one which, if carried into effect, will do much to promote the interest, not only of the citizens of Havre de Grace and its vicinity, but of the citizens of the great States of Pennsylvania and New York, by creating an export market immediately at the mouth of this magnificent river, where all the great mass of produce that descends the Susquehanna for hundreds of miles from the interior of a rich and fertile country, abounding in wealth, must concentrate, and ultimately make the town of Havre de Grace what it ought to have been years ago. I therefore move that the memorial be referred, without reading, to the Committee on Commerce, under a full assurance that they will give it that due consideration that its importance demands.

[The remainder of the sitting was consumed in the reception of a large number of resolutions of inquiry, until the hour of adjournment.]

TUESDAY, MARCH 8.

Mr. DIXON H. LEWIS, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Alabama, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. BOON moved to suspend the rule for one hour, for the purpose of enabling the standing committees to report.

Mr. HALEY moved to amend the motion, by including the presentation of resolutions; which was negatived.

Mr. BOON's motion was also disagreed to.

Mr. BOON then moved to suspend the rule, in order to enable him to make a report from the Committee on the Public Lands; which was negatived.

LAUNCHING FRIGATE COLUMBIA.

Mr. JARVIS said that it had been announced in the morning papers that the frigate Columbia would be launched from the navy yard in this city to-morrow at eleven o'clock. As many of the members had never witnessed the launch of a ship, and particularly of a vessel of war, and might desire to do so, he would move to suspend the rule in order to enable him to submit a motion, that when the House adjourns to-day, it would adjourn to meet to-morrow at 2 o'clock, P. M.

The motion to suspend the rule was agreed to; when Mr. J. submitted the motion indicated.

Mr. HIESTER moved to amend, by substituting one for two o'clock; which was negatived.

H. of R.]

Military Academy—Contested Election.

[MARCH 8, 1836.]

Mr. HALL, of Vermont, moved to amend the motion, by proposing to adjourn over from this day to Thursday.

Mr. HOPKINS said that it had been announced in the morning papers that the ship Columbia would be launched at the navy yard to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock. There could then be no necessity for the adoption of the resolution itself, and still less for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HALL.] On the contrary, those members who chose to do so would have an opportunity of seeing the vessel launched, without an adjournment, and might return to their seats in this House, without prejudice to the public business. He could not, therefore, justify it to himself to vote for the proposition, and hoped that the question might be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. BROWN moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table; which was negatived.

Mr. HALL's amendment was then agreed to: Ayes 118, noes not counted.

Messrs. CONNOR and CUSHMAN simultaneously called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution amended.

On a count by the CHAIR, there appeared 28 for and 141 opposed to taking the question by yeas and nays; but, before the decision was announced,

Mr. SHEPPERD asked for tellers, and the same being appointed, and a count being had, there appeared 27 in favor and 155 against taking the question by yeas and nays; and they were accordingly not ordered.

The resolution was then agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of offering the following resolution, which was read from the Clerk's table. Mr. H. remarked that he did not expect many votes in favor of it from gentlemen who were in the habit of having their sons, brothers, and kinsmen, educated at West Point.

Resolved, That the report of the select committee appointed during the last Congress to investigate the affairs of the West Point Military Academy be withdrawn from the files, and that ten thousand copies thereof be printed.

Mr. H. asked for the yeas and nays on his motion to suspend; which the House refused to order, and the motion was negatived without a count.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then took up the motion of Mr. SPANGLER to reconsider the vote whereby the motion of Mr. BYNUM, that the petitioner, David Newland, have leave to appear and address the House by counsel, was rejected.

Mr. SPANGLER called for the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered.

Mr. S. said it had not been his intention to debate the question of the contested election before the House, nor was it then his intention to do so, further than to state, in a few words, the reasons which had induced him to make the motion for a reconsideration of the vote whereby the House had determined, on Saturday last, that it would not permit the petitioner to be heard by counsel. As he had stated, when he made the motion to reconsider, he had voted with the majority on that occasion. He had done so without having given much examination and but little reflection on the subject. He had since become satisfied that he had voted erroneously, and he wished to have an opportunity of making known to the House and to his constituents the conviction that he had voted erroneously on that question. He had not the vanity to suppose that, with that motion, or any thing he could say, he could influence the opinions of any gentleman. He was too humble and obscure an individual to influence the opinions of gentlemen upon that or any other question; but he wished to change his vote, and make known to the House that he had changed his opinion. After the vote had been taken on Saturday, upon the proposition to allow the petitioner to be heard by counsel, and it had been rejected, a gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] rose, and stated to the House, and no doubt correctly, that the precedents showed that, in every case like the one before the House, where counsel had been asked, it was always granted. He took it for granted that that gentleman was correct; and if such be the fact, he was unwilling, by any act of his, to reverse the decisions of the House heretofore made in cases similar to the one then before them. He saw no good reason for departing from precedents heretofore had on similar occasions. One reason why he had changed his opinion was, that he had no doubt that the decisions heretofore had were made from good and sufficient reasons; and until some reason could be shown for departing from those precedents, he was unwilling to make the pending case an exception from all others. But there was another fact disclosed, which, to his mind, furnished additional reasons why the House should adhere to former practices, and one of which he was not apprized, which was that the petitioner did not belong to that profession which would place him on something near an equality with the sitting member, provided he could be admitted. And it had been truly remarked, on a former day, that if the petitioning gentleman did not possess that qualification, the privilege of being heard would be useless to himself, and useless to his constituents. Such being the case, he confessed that he was dissatisfied with the vote which had been given; he honestly believed that he had voted erroneously, and he wished to let his constituents know that he was dissatisfied with that vote. He would embrace the present opportunity of stating to the House that on yesterday, after he had submitted the motion for a reconsideration, he was requested by the petitioner to withdraw it, the petitioner stating to him that he had informed his counsel that his services would not longer be required, and had discharged him. He made that statement in fairness to the petitioning gentleman; but, nevertheless, he could not withdraw his motion. He had two objects in submitting the motion: one was, so far as his vote was concerned, to extend to the petitioning gentleman the benefit of being heard by counsel; the other was, as he had before stated, that he believed the vote rejecting counsel was wrong, and that if a majority of the House would concur with him they would reverse that decision. That decision had been recorded on the journals by yeas and nays, and would go to posterity as the decision of the House on that very important question. He was unwilling, so far as his vote was concerned, that that decision should remain, and therefore he wished it reversed. His feelings would have induced him to comply with the request of the petitioner in withdrawing his motion to reconsider, if he could have done so with propriety; but, as it was, he could not consent to do so. He had not risen for the purpose of detaining the House with a speech; it was what he had never yet done. He had stated the reasons why he could not withdraw his motion to reconsider. He wished an opportunity of changing his vote, and it would be for other gentlemen to determine whether the vote of Saturday last was right or wrong.

Mr. GRENELL said the vote given on Saturday last upon the question was so full, and apparently so decisive, that he had supposed it would stand as the deliberate and final judgment of the House. The proposition was, that the gentleman claiming the seat against the sitting member should be allowed to appear and address the House by counsel. The vote had been taken, not without consideration, and after reference to parliamentary precedents; indeed, after all those measures of inquiry, investigation, and argument, usually resorted to on such occasions. He would be happy to enable the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPANGLER,] for whom he entertained sincere respect, to change his vote and to record it anew; but it seemed to him that a due regard to the public business required them to stand by the decision of the House, unless they were urged by strong reasons to reverse it.

Why, in a case of this nature, of a contested election, should counsel be admitted on this floor? It had been said that former decisions were in favor of allowing legal counsel at the bar of this House in such cases. He must say, however, that, since he had the honor of a seat in that House, many cases of contested elections had been before them, and, in some of those cases, one or both parties were not of that profession which, it was argued, gave peculiar advantages, and he had never known counsel admitted, nor ever known the demand for the privilege made. The House had got along without the intervention of lawyers. But gentlemen had gone back thirty or forty years for precedents. What might have been the policy of granting counsel at an early period of the Government, he would not attempt to inquire. As his colleague [Mr. REED] on a former day had remarked, the members of this House were less than at present they are, and the press of public business much less, and the tedious discussions of lawyers here could better be endured. It had been said the petitioner was not a member of the legal profession, and therefore ought to have the privilege of legal counsel—an insufficient reason in a case of that character. Whether a farmer or a lawyer, he should neither gain nor lose by his occupation.

In order to magnify the importance of the demanded privilege, or, as it had been called, the right of counsel, the petitioner had been spoken of as a gentleman having in charge the interests of 40,000 freemen, and as claiming to be the asserter of their constitutional rights and interests. Mr. G. said he would speak of the petitioner with respect; but the plain state of the case was this: a gentleman [Mr. GRAHAM] had been returned as a member duly elected by his district; the petitioner contested his right to the seat, claiming to have received a greater number, perhaps a few more than half, of the legal votes given. But his right to be recognised as the representative of a great constituency remained to be proved; he was to be held to prove facts and show legal and sufficient reasons for displacing a member of that House. Nothing was to be assumed for him, but every thing to be proved. The petitioner came there claiming a seat, because it was an honorable station—a more honorable one he did not know. But other interests were involved, and of higher and more important bearing than those which were merely personal to the parties. If the petitioner obtained the seat, he would be a lawmaker, not for his own district alone, but for the whole people. He would be not merely the representative of that district, but, in a sense, of Mr. G's constituents. These considerations made the questions arising in this contest matters of high concernment to every member of the House, and imposed an obligation on all to investigate fully and decide deliberately and justly. And, to this end, was it necessary or expedient to bring in lawyers to the discussion? It was taking a very narrow view, to suppose this contest a mere personal matter between the petitioner and the sitting member. He took a more extended view of the matter, and did not wish to see the relation of client and advocate on that floor, as in a petty case of property before a court and jury; nor to listen day after day to the arguments of a retained and hired counsellor. He wished to hear no gentleman there who did not owe fidelity to that constitution which each member of that House had sworn to maintain. The counsel of a party owes fidelity to his client. Would he feel bound to an equal and impartial discussion, indifferent as between the parties to the contest?

Sir, said Mr. G., would it be favorable to the orderly and decorous transaction of the business of the House to admit advocates on the floor to mingle in discussions with members? Scenes might occur, in the course of discussions between members and the advocates introduced and placed on a level with them, of an unpleasant or disorderly character. The rules of the House were made for the government and guidance of its members, and might not be found suited to restrict members of the bar, animated with an ardent, though honest, zeal in their client's cause. Without going into a detail of the inconveniences that might ensue, Mr. G. put it to the House, whether it would be fitting, not merely as it regarded themselves, but the people whom they represented, to permit such a relation as that he spoke of to exist. When constitutional questions were to be debated there, they had no interest to bias them. And the presumption was, there were enough to discuss and decide them, without the aid of retained counsellors. Let it be borne in mind, an office is in view, which, in our consideration, is something more than a franchise, a property; it is a high public trust, to be exercised for the interest of the whole people.

Mr. G. said that the House was, or would be, in possession of all the facts in the case of the contested election. His position, then, was, that the House, of itself, has the ability to understand and apply the principles of the constitution and the law, by which it was to be governed. Another position was, that the House had motive enough to judge and to decide truly and justly on the election; for they owed obligations to their country and their conscience. The principal reason he had heard urged for admitting counsel was, to place the parties on the footing of equality before the House. The sitting member was said to be a lawyer, the petitioner not; and this circumstance created a disparity, a disparity which the House could not recognise, a disparity unknown to the constitution. Equality of position was the object with gentlemen. Was it hence concluded that the House felt the necessity of counsel? If so, let the ablest counsel be retained by the House. It was not enough that the petitioner thought he needed such aid. If it is not necessary for us, said Mr. G., it is not for the petitioner. One of the contesting gentlemen was a debater, the other was not. But how was equality of position on the floor to be attained? It would not follow, if both were lawyers, that they would be on a footing of perfect equality, because one may be a sound lawyer and an able advocate, while the other might be but a superficial wrangler in the courts. In such a case, there would be manifestly no equality in regard to the power of the individuals to present their constitutional claims. The House, then, must decide upon the debating qualities of the parties, and allow the weaker the privilege of counsel. And the result would be, you must admit counsel in cases of this character to any extent; an evil not to be tolerated.

This point of equality had been insisted on by his honorable colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] who had gone to courts of justice to illustrate its importance, and had supposed a case of a suitor, aided by one of the first lawyers in the land, in opposition to an humble individual, who had nothing but the justice of his cause to sustain him; and though the court and jury were capable and honest, yet that, nine times in ten, the cause would be decided in favor of the man who had the great lawyer. Mr. G's experience and observation in courts had led him to a different conclusion; not that counsel, and able counsel, was useless. But he had witnessed always great concern and care in learned judges and honest jurors to protect the weak and defenceless against the powerful and talented. And the latter were often known to contend with the former at a disadvantage, and for very obvious reasons. An upright and able court will see to it that the poor and powerless loses nothing of the law that belongs to his case; and a jury will take care that the justice of his cause on the facts shall be established, and this, too, from the power of sympathy, so common and active in the human breast. He had often seen the poor and helpless before judicial tribunals triumph, by the simple justice of his cause, against the rich and powerful, aided by great legal talents. Should he be told that this argument proved too much, viz: that great legal talents were useless in the trial of causes, it was enough for him to know that, when the facts of a case can be fully and plainly disclosed before an upright and enlightened tribunal, there is no danger that injustice will be done, provided sufficient time be allowed to it for the examination of the legal principles involved. Mr. G. said all the facts concerned in the case of the election were before the House; about them there could be no controversy. He had said all that was needful on the ability and integrity of the House in the judgment it may form on all constitutional questions.

If counsel were to be brought before the House on the present occasion, it would be difficult to see why it should not be done on a thousand others that might arise. How could we deny it to persons having private claims before Congress, of great amount, and involving legal or constitutional principles? It could not with reason be denied. It was true, one case had occurred since he had been a member of the House, in which a party appeared at its bar with his advocate. It was the case of Houston, arraigned for a breach of privilege, in assaulting a member for words used in debate. But, then, every reason existed for the concession. It was, to all intents, a criminal proceeding, and might have led, on conviction, to an infamous punishment, to the privation of personal liberty of the respondent. Besides, the House might be said to be the offended party, the prosecutor and the trier of the cause. Counsel, in such case, could not be denied. It is needless to dwell for a moment upon the difference in character between that case and the present.

The petitioner would be admitted to a seat on the floor of the House. In this there would be a fitness, perhaps a sort of necessity. If he felt incompetent to address it, he could present his views in written or printed form. He had been fully heard before the committee, through very distinguished counsel, who had been able to place and defend all his rights before them; and that committee had made report in his favor. This House, then, were sure to be in possession of all the facts and of every legal and constitutional principle appertaining to his case. The committee would feel bound to sustain their report, if it was well grounded, and under all the lights that wise and able counsel could impart. Mr. G. would be the last member on that floor to withhold from the petitioner the smallest of his rights; but, believing he had had awarded to him every just privilege, he could go no further.

The CHAIR here informed the House that the hour had arrived for proceeding to the special order of the day.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD moved that the rules be suspended, for the purpose of proceeding in the consideration of the contested election question; which was disagreed to.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

Mr. LAWRENCE said it was now between two and three months since a bill had been reported to that House for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York, and it was hoped by the friends of that measure that it would have been acted upon long ago. The time had now arrived, as he remarked the other day, that those who had suffered by that calamity should know what they had to depend upon from that House; and he now rose, throwing himself upon its indulgence, in behalf of these sufferers, asking the House to sustain him in the motion he was about to make, for the purpose of taking up that bill, and making, he hoped, a final disposition of it that day. He was assured the friends of the bill had no desire to debate it further. Mr. L. then made the motion indicated, that the rules of the House be suspended, for the purpose of taking up the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, was understood to express a hope that the House would delay acting on the bill till some further information had been furnished.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would only remark that the public interest was as deeply interested in this bill as in the special order, and he hoped the motion would prevail.

Mr. HARDIN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the result of the vote was: Yeas 139, nays 67, as follows:

So the motion to suspend the rules was carried in the affirmative.

The bill was taken up, the question being on its final passage, and

Mr. CRAIG demanded the previous question.

Mr. PATTON moved a call of the House.

Mr. VINTON said he had voted in the affirmative for the motion to suspend the rules, on the understanding that the bill should be debated; but if the previous question should be insisted on, he would move a reconsideration of the vote to suspend the rules; whereupon,

Mr. CRAIG withdrew his demand for the previous question.

Mr. EVERETT moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the following instructions:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

"That on account of the late destructive fire in the city of New York, on the sixteenth day of December last, the collector of the port of New York is hereby authorized to extend to all persons the time of payment of all duties secured at that port, by bonds given before and falling due on and after that day, and to cancel such bonds, and in case such bonds have been paid, to refund the money so paid, out of any money in his hands, upon their giving to said collector new bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of said collector, for the sums of the former bonds, payable with interest, (after the time of payment specified in such former bonds,) at the rate of three per cent. per annum, in equal instalments, in one, two, and three years from the said time of payment, or in one year from such time of payment without interest, at their election; which new bonds shall be proceeded with, in all respects, like other bonds taken by collectors for duties due to the United States, and shall have the same force and validity."

Mr. EVERETT said, though in favor of granting relief to the sufferers, he could not bring himself to vote for the bill in its present shape. He thought it could not be sustained on principle, and that the relief granted was too partial in its objects, and too limited in its effects. He was aware, from the large majority by which it was ordered to be engrossed, that it would pass, unless a substitute should be brought forward which should be acceptable to that majority. With him it was no longer an original question; it was no longer a question of choice, but of preference. The substitute offered was not what he would have presented, but had been made under the necessity of the case. He had gone as far as he could go to render it acceptable to the friends of the bill, and offered it as an alternative. To them he appealed, to say whether it would not be more beneficial and more generally acceptable to the commercial interest of New York than the bill; and of those opposed to any relief, he would ask whether it was not less exceptionable in principle?

Mr. E. said, I regret that I was not able to obtain the floor before the gentleman from Rhode Island. Sir, the tendency and effect of his remarks, I fear, have been to confirm the friends of the bill in its support; and to prejudice the House against the favorable reception of any proposition whatever for an amendment. They had been fatigued into an impatience for the question. I have, however, some hope that the amendment, as coming from one who is in favor of granting substantial relief, offered in good faith, and for no collateral purpose, may still be deliberately considered. If the proposition should be acceptable to the friends of the bill, they had the majority—the power to pass it. I desire no delay; if the motion prevails, the House can immediately go into committee, report the amendment, and take the final vote this day. For one, I hope they will sit out the question. Whatever may be its fate, I hope the proposition will be received in the spirit in which it is made.

An apology is perhaps due to the House for not offering the amendment in committee, or in the House before the bill was engrossed. After offering one unsuccessful amendment, I concluded to leave the bill to be shaped by its immediate friends, trusting that amendments from distant friends would be more heeded in a time of need than at that time. Indeed, I did not suppose it possible that the bill would pass in its present shape. I have found myself mistaken; it has passed by a majority so large, that I even derive some hope, from the absolute security it gives of their passing any bill that may give substantial relief, that the substitute may be at least examined. It is now offered as a substitute, to be adopted entire; under the motion, no amendment could be proposed in committee; and when reported to the House, good faith requires that I should not support any amendment that would render it less beneficial to the commercial interests.

By the bill it is left to the discretion of the collector to extend the time of payment on the old bonds, or to require new bonds; and to all who have sustained loss by the fire to the amount of $1,000, an extension of credit is given of three, four, and five years, without interest, and on the bonds of all other debtors of six, nine, and twelve months, with interest at five per cent.

The substitute proposes that new bonds, with sufficient sureties, shall be taken in all cases. It adopts the principle of the second section of the bill, extending relief to all the debtors of the Government on duty bonds; it considers the calamity as affecting severely, directly or indirectly, the entire class of importers who are debtors for duties, and extends equally to all the alternative of a credit of one, two, and three years, with interest at three per cent., or of one year without interest.

The pecuniary benefit, in addition to the convenience of the delay, which both bills confer on the debtors, is the amount of interest that is saved to them by the terms of the credit. The amount of bonds of debtors who have had property destroyed to the value of $1,000 may be assumed at - - - $1,000,000
And of all others, at - - - 2,700,000

Making, in the whole, - - - $3,700,000

A comparison of the effects of the bill and substitute will give the following result of the benefit of a pecuniary character to the debtors:

By the bill, the debtors of the first class save the interest at 6 per cent. on $1,000,000, equated at four years, - - - $240,000
While all the rest save the interest at 1 per cent. on $2,700,000, equated at nine months, 20,250

And this amount is a loss to the Treasury of - 260,250

By the substitute, the debtors save the interest at 6 per cent. on $3,700,000 for one year, - - - 222,000

Difference, - - - $38,250

This difference did not enter into the motive of offering the amendment, yet it will not render it the less acceptable to those who are opposed to the bill. One feature is common to both the bill and the substitute: both place those who have paid their bonds since the fire on the same footing.

One objection to the principle of the bill is, that it is in part founded on mere charitable considerations. The relief granted cannot, to its full extent, be sustained on any other principle than that of gratuity. The bill provides that those who have lost property by the fire to the amount of $1,000 shall be entitled to an extension of payment of three, four, and five years, without interest, on all their bonds, whatever may be the amount. The interest saved is equal to 24 per cent, (compared with New York interest of 28 per cent.) The amount of the benefit received bears no relation to the amount of property destroyed. I regret that we are not furnished with a statement of the bonds and of the losses. We should then have been relieved from the necessity of reasoning from hypothetical cases. But it is obvious, from this want of analogy between the losses sustained and the relief granted, what must be the effect of this provision. In many cases the sufferers are not only indemnified for their actual losses, but will receive large gratuities over and above the indemnity. I will illustrate the principle, in a case when the loss is $1,000 and bonds $50,000. The 24 per cent. gained on this sum is - - - $12,000

Deduct, for the actual loss, - - - 1,000

Gratuity, - - - $11,000

And the moment this bill passes, you will have put into the pockets of individuals gratuities of 5, 10, 15, and perhaps $20,000 each. Instead of sufferers, they become gainers by the fire.

The only principle on which I can sustain the bill, in any shape, is that of strict public interest. I lay out of the principle every motive of charity. It, however, is no objection that the course which interest dictates should produce benevolent results. We stand in the relation of a creditor, and, if you please, of a hard-hearted creditor, seeking solely our own interests. We have revenue due, and revenue accruing; and both are put at hazard by the calamity that has befallen the city of New York. Our object is to secure both, with the least loss possible.

One object is to secure the payment of the duties that have already accrued. The bill leaves it to the discretion of the collector to demand further security, or to extend the payment on the old bonds—the substitute requires new bonds in all cases, and thus guards against the loss that may arise from the inadvertence or neglect of the collector. The consideration of additional security does not apply to all the provisions of either the bill or the substitute. The extension of credit to debtors, and a new credit to those who have paid their bonds, are directed to be given: the real character of both is a loan. The principle of obtaining better security applies only to doubtful debts. I do not consider the substitute as deriving much aid from this principle, or from a reference to the situation of particular debtors, but that it can only be supported by considerations of a more general character.

The calamity of the 16th of December affected all the debtors of the Government. Such are the varied intimate relations of debtor and creditor, in a commercial city, no great calamity can fall on a large class of men that does not severely affect the whole. The sudden destruction of a large amount of active capital would create a general pressure on the entire commerce, particularly distressing to those who are debtors, and also on those who stand in the double relation of debtor and creditor. All merchants in active business must feel the pressure, and none more than the importers who are debtors to the Government. No line of distinction can be drawn. The fire may make the immediate sufferer a bankrupt. His bankruptcy may draw after it that of his creditor. Trace out the connexion, and then attempt to draw the line between those debtors of the Government who have suffered and those who have not. An immense capital has been suddenly withdrawn; all the debtors of the Government feel the pressure; and the relief, to be effectual should be as general as the effect of the calamity, so far as it may affect the future revenue of the Government, through the embarrassment of its debtors—and that the substitute proposes to do, by extending to all the same measure of delay; and this, for the sole purpose to enable all to continue their usual extent of importations. In order to insure a future supply of revenue, in the character of an extension of credit and of loans, the capital destroyed is temporarily replaced.

On what terms this capital should be replaced, is a mere question of public interest. In view of the future revenue, we may be considered as standing in the relation of a landlord to his tenants who have been visited by a calamity, which directly or indirectly causes general embarrassment, by which the rent due and accruing is put at hazard. We are then called upon by the motive of interest, and by interest alone, to give such relief as will enable them, not only to pay what is due, but to carry on their farms and pay the rent for the year to come. We have the means—we are under no necessity of calling the money immediately out of the hands of our debtors. On what terms, then, shall the relief be granted? What will best secure the great object in view, the future revenue of the Government? This is the issue between the bill and the substitute.

The bill divides the debtors of the Government into two classes; those who have suffered a loss of property by the fire, whether insured or not, to the amount of $1,000, and those who have not lost any thing, or not to that amount. To the first class, constituting in amount only one-fourth of the debtors, a pecuniary benefit of $240,000; while to the other class, constituting three-fourths in amount, it only gives $19,500. The accommodation to the first as a convenience of time, three, four, and five years, is given; to the others, only six, nine, and twelve months. The bill establishes a criterion by which it determines who shall be deemed sufferers; but preserves no analogy between that criterion and the relief it grants. The substitute distributes among all the debtors a pecuniary benefit of $222,000. The accommodation of time given by the bill to the first class is three, four, and five years, where only six, nine, and twelve months is given to the second. The bill establishes an arbitrary criterion, by which it determines who shall be deemed sufferers—and with equal absurdity preserves no analogy between that criterion and the relief granted. It determines that all who have lost property by the fire, whether insured or not, to the amount of $1,000, shall be entitled as sufferers—to what? To a credit of three, four, and five years, without interest. For the loss of $1,000, a gift is made equal to 24 per cent. on the whole amount of bonds, whatever may be their amount; while on all cases of loss under that sum, only three-fourths of one per cent. is allowed. The substitute proposes no criterion, for the obvious reason, that no satisfactory criterion can be established. It proposes to give a general and equal measure of relief to all, more moderate in extent, but more generally beneficial. To the relief as proposed, and on the principle of loans, I think no constitutional objection can be made; and, I repeat, the terms must depend on our views of public interest.

The substitute is not what I should have originally proposed, but such as I prefer to the bill as engrossed, and which I foresee will pass, unless that or some other substitute shall be acceptable to the majority. They have the power to pass either. The friends of the bill are certain of their majority. The opponents of the bill, generally, would not vote for the substitute as an original proposition; but I would ask them to consider which of the two is to be preferred; and how they can, without inconsistency, vote to adopt the substitute, and yet vote against the ultimate passage of the bill; they may select between two propositions, and yet vote against either.

There is one other view in which I wish to present this subject to the friends of the bill—to the friends of the sufferers by the fire. I will submit to them the consideration, whether the passage of the bill, in its present shape, will not prejudice, whether it may not defeat, the passage of a future bill for the remission of the duties secured on goods that were destroyed by the fire. In my judgment, such will be the effect; and here I ought, perhaps, to set myself right before the House. I find that on the bill for the relief of the Messrs. Bangs, for relinquishing duties on goods in the original package destroyed by fire, I voted in the negative. Since this discussion came on, I have re-examined the principles of that case. I am satisfied that my vote was wrong. The reasons which induced that vote had passed my mind; but the principal one has been recalled by an argument on this bill. It was then, as now, admitted, that duties on imports were intended as a tax on the consumer; that if destroyed at sea, at the wharf, or while in the custody of the officers of the Government, in conformity with the general principle, no duties could be claimed. They did not go into the consumption of the country; other goods must be imported to supply their place, on which duties would accrue; and the Government lost nothing. Yet it was said, when the owner took the goods into his own custody, they were at his own risk, and the Government ought not to be placed in the light of an insurer. It was said that the owner might insure, and that to him the loss was the consequence of his own neglect; and it was asked, by way of illustration, whether, if indemnified by insurance, he should pocket the duties. The argument denies the principle that duties are a tax on the consumer; the illustration takes it for granted that the insurer has no rights—that the remission could in no event enure to his benefit. But as to this question, the insurer stands in the place of the insured. Take the case of an insurance of $4,000 on the value of the goods, and $1,000 to cover the duties; or, what is the same thing, of $5,000 on the value of goods, including the duties. The goods are destroyed, and before the insurer is called on, the duties are remitted. The insurance is a mere contract of indemnity; and the value insured, less the amount of duties, only could be recovered. Nor is the case changed in principle by the point of time when the duties are remitted; if the whole amount of the insurance were paid before the duties were remitted, the money, when remitted, would belong to the insurer. This principle is familiar in the case of indemnity for foreign spoiliations. The Government is not, then, called on to stand as an insurer; the only question is, whether the goods have gone into consumption. The principle is general; but the danger of fraud requires it to be restricted to goods destroyed in the original package. Being thus in favor of the remission of the duties, I am unwilling to vote for a bill which, in my opinion, would and ought to defeat that claim; and why? This bill is solicited by those who may hereafter claim the remission; it grants to them a pecuniary benefit of twenty-four per cent. on all their bonds. When they shall hereafter ask that a part of those bonds shall be cancelled, the inquiry will be necessary whether they have not already received sufficient, over and above all losses, to meet their claim; and this will involve an account of their actual losses; an account which I cannot think the Government at any time, and especially at a future time, will undertake to take. Suppose the amount of the bonds to be $50,000; on this the twenty-four per cent. granted by this bill is - - $12,000 And the amount of actual loss by fire, and that, too, of goods in the original package, to be - - - 2,000

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

[H. OF R.]

The nett gain conferred by this bill is - - $10,000

The importer asks to have this bond of $1,000 cancelled, on the ground that it was given for the duties on the goods destroyed. If this be done, you add the amount to his former gain, $1,000. If this bill passes, I think it will be the only relief the sufferers will ever obtain. If they, however, are content, I have no reason to complain. The friends of the bill, with all those consequences before them, must take the responsibility of passing the bill or the substitute.

Mr. HARDIN opposed the instructions. They were, in his opinion, far more objectionable than the original bill, proposing, as they did, to extend the credit twelve months, without any interest; and for one, two, and three years, at an interest of three per cent. He was at a loss to perceive why the gentleman from Vermont should have opposed the original bill; for his amendment was ten times more favorable to those interested than the bill itself. Mr. H. should vote to recommit the bill, but without these instructions.

Mr. BOULDIN remarked, he would not say any thing upon this subject, if it were not that he had voted to take up the bill a short time ago. This, he said, might be misunderstood by the friends of the bill and his constituents to be an intimation that he would vote for the bill on its passage. He said he would not vote for it in its present shape, or as it was proposed to be amended, or in any shape that he had any hope it would be amended. He merely thought it was time the question was settled. He would vote for it, if so amended as to provide, first, for such cases as those in which the United States were about to lose a debt, in whole or in part, by reason of the fire. This was what any prudent creditor would do. If there were any goods imported, liable to drawback, he was willing to give up the duty on those goods if they were burnt. He said he was an inland man, and not well acquainted with commerce; but had understood that goods brought into this country, and intended to be exported, although the duty was charged on their being brought into the country, yet it was given up if the goods were exported. Were there any goods in this condition he would give up the duty, but he would go no farther.

The right to duty liable to drawback was one not perfect. The bargain was conditional, and the fire put it out of the power of the merchant to perform his part, if he wished to export the goods. The Government had to take the chances against it, and was entitled to the chances in its favor. They stood on the same ground of other creditors. They were mere creditors—their being debtors had been relied on as a ground to authorize the interference of this House. The money proposed to be loaned out or given away was money of the people of the United States, and not of this House. This House had no right to give it away upon objects of charity, whether their debtors or not. We had nothing to do, Mr. B. said, with the money of the people, except to lay it out for their benefit under the law and constitution. We had no right to lay it out in a charitable way. He could see no distinction between this and any case of private misfortune. Whether one or a thousand suffered by accident or providential occurrence, or otherwise, made no difference; only this, if one single individual suffered, he felt solitary and lonely in his misfortunes. If many suffered together, there was something like sympathy to console them. He did not mean that the people of New York had not the sympathy of this House. They had the sympathy of this House and of the country, and he was conscious they had his. But we had no right to gratify our charitable and sympathetic feelings at the expense of the public. He said he had admired the exposition given by Chancellor Wythe, of Virginia, of this text, so much admired, and often quoted: "Charity begins at home;" that is, said Mr. Wythe, we are to be charitable with our own money, and let other people's alone. A guardian had spent his ward's money, and his counsel replied that he was a generous, hospitable, and charitable man. He said we had no right to be charitable with the public money; but if we had, we ought to be equally so to all. We had no more right to give money or indulgence to the debtors of the United States than to others. Where, he asked, is the difference between the misfortune of the sufferers by fire in New York, and the sufferers by frost in the South? Thousands lost their crops of tobacco and cotton last fall; and why not relieve them? We had, he said, no right or power to relieve either. Yet all have the sympathy of the benevolent and kind; and many have shown, and many will show, their sympathy and kindness, in the way least of all liable to misunderstanding or reproach—by giving their own money to the sufferers.

Mr. PARKS wished to inquire of the Committee of Ways and Means if it was the intention of that committee to bring forward any other proposition on this subject?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that his own impression had been, from the beginning, that the duties upon the merchandise destroyed by the fire in New York, in cases of failure of the insurance companies, should have been remitted. From his own experience, however, and looking back to a period of thirty or forty years, he became convinced that no other bill would meet the approbation of that House or the other, and he therefore believed this would be the only one.

Mr. PARKS considered it due to the House that this fact should be known; for rumor had stated that some other measure was to be brought forward; and if this report were correct, it was not treating the House fairly. He hoped this bill never would have the sanction of that House until it was understood to be a final measure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD should vote to recommit the bill, so that it might be amended in such a form as would be acceptable to him, for he was willing to extend such relief as he thought was merited. Mr. U. read a provision he should, in that case, propose.

Mr. JUDSON addressed the Chair substantially as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The bill on your table purports to relieve the debtors of the Government, who suffered by the unexampled conflagration at New York in December last. At this late stage of the debate, it will not be my business to detain the House by adding to the arguments already addressed to its consideration. My only object now is a reply to some of the objections raised by an honorable member from Rhode Island.

The other day, when this subject was under discussion, I listened with much pleasure to the argument of that honorable member, addressed to us with so much ingenuity and force. He brought into the discussion the result of considerable industry and ability; and yet, sir, it is impossible for my mind to subscribe to certain portions of that argument. While I would most cordially unite with him in the eulogium pronounced upon the agriculturists of the country, I do also concur most fully that the class of our fellow-citizens thus alluded to are highly meritorious, and that their interest should always be regarded as important.

The honorable member has told us that he will not say any thing against individual merchants; but, as a body, I did understand him to allege that the merchants living in New York were not entitled to relief, because Arthur Tappan resided in that city. Now, let me ask, is that a valid objection, or a legitimate argument, against the relief proposed to the suffering community by this bill? Let it be tested. Suppose a member should rise in his place, and urge as an objection that the city of New York was visited by the yellow fever or small pox, would that be a good reason against our legislation? Should a portion of the Government debtors, being in New Orleans, be visited by a calamity like the present, and relief be proposed, would this House be influenced by the fact that any wasting disease, with its pestilential influence, had swept over that city? And would that constitute an argument against their relief? As much as I detest Arthur Tappan or his hypocritical cant, I would not vote against this bill because he has seen fit to locate himself in that city.

Another objection urged by the honorable member from Rhode Island is the fact that the members of the Hartford convention assembled at the house of a merchant in Boston the night before their departure. This is a charge now brought against the mercantile community as a body. It does appear to me that this objection is addressed to our prejudices, and not our judgment. I do not agree in this course of debate. It does great injustice to the mercantile community. Whoever may be entitled to the honor or odium of that assembly, it certainly does not belong to the merchants as a body. If you trace it to its true origin, it will probably be found to rest with the statesmen or partisans of that day, whose object perhaps was to overturn a particular administration, and get into power themselves. If this were their principal object, as many believe, even this is by no means chargeable to merchants. In looking over the names of the members, I am not able to recognise more than two merchants. To say, then, that this bill shall not become a law because two or three merchants were members of the Hartford convention, is great injustice to them as a community. It would be much such justice as was administered in a State adjoining the one represented by the honorable gentleman whose arguments have called forth these remarks. There an eminent judge was thrust out of office because he attended the Hartford convention, and another was appointed who actually voted for the bill calling the convention, and, as I believe, one who by his vote sent his predecessor to that body. According to my estimation, arguments like these should not influence us in the discharge of our duty. They have a tendency to create a jealousy and distrust between the three great branches of national wealth and national prosperity. Commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, are these great national resources. They have equal interests, and should have equal support from the Government. Commerce is the channel through which pass all our agricultural products, and our manufactured goods, to their final destination, and through that same channel also are returned to the agriculturists and manufacturer the avails of honest industry. There is, then, a mutual interest between these highly respectable classes, and no discussion here should tend to separate those interests. Pass the bill under consideration, and you will enable those who have suffered by this calamity to go on with their business. You will enable them to discharge the debts they owe the Government, and also enable them to pay the farmers, manufacturers, and mechanics, what is due them.

When it shall become the settled policy to break down either one of these great interests, you will inflict a wound upon the other branches, which will be injurious to the whole country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND warmly and at length supported the bill. The country generally, he was assured, was in favor of it. The very fact of the large cities coming forward only with resolutions instead of money, was a proof that they expected their representatives to act upon the subject; for they had sent those resolutions to them. Mr. S. also replied to the arguments of Mr. PEARCE, and entered into a succinct defence of the principles and provisions of the bill.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, replied to Messrs. JUDSON and SUTHERLAND, and those gentlemen briefly rejoined.

Mr. CHAMBERS again addressed the House as follows: I had hoped (he said) that the friends of this bill would have consented to modify it so as to give it the effect finally to dispose of the subject. I have given it all the consideration of which I am capable, and have come to the conclusion that, so far as the persons proposed to be relieved were importers and owners of merchandise which was consumed by the fire in the city of New York, the duties ought to be remitted. This class of cases presents proper ground for relief; they are clearly cases of failure of the consideration upon which the obligations to pay the duties were founded. The consideration was the permission given to vend the goods within the territory of the United States; of this permission the importers have not availed themselves, and the destruction of their merchandise by the fire has rendered it impossible; they ought, therefore, to be released from their obligations to pay the duties. To that extent, the policy adopted by this Government, of allowing a drawback of the duties upon goods re-exported, sanctions the principle, and I am willing to apply it. And to that it is to come at last; for, notwithstanding the pertinacity with which this bill is urged in its present shape, its advocates avow their opinions, that, in the cases I have designated, the debts ought not to be claimed by the Government. Why not, then, release them now, and have done with the subject? The proportion which ought to be released, under the principle which I have stated, can be ascertained at present with more accuracy than at a future day; in fact, every day's delay will increase the difficulty. But it is said that the speedy adoption of this measure is the only means of avoiding extensive ruin in the city of New York; and the same thing has been urged as often as this bill has been under consideration. There is not time, say gentlemen, to make the inquiries necessary to enable us to discriminate between the cases entitled to be relieved, and those which are not entitled to be so relieved; and but for an intimation from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] that the Secretary of the Treasury had authorized a suspension of coercive measures for the collection of these bonds, we should have been left to the impression that the debtors were to be held to the utmost strictness in their payments. The friends of the Secretary of the Treasury have not done him justice in keeping out of view what he has actually done in this matter; it ought to have been stated that he had actually directed a suspension of coercive measures for the collection of these debts until the result of the application to Congress should be ascertained. Such, I am well assured, is the fact; and, sir, the act does him honor; it was the benevolent exercise of a sound discretion, for which every just man ought, and every generous man will, award him his unlimited approbation. Why, then, I ask again, such extreme urgency for the final action of the House upon this bill? Would it not be better to recommend it to its friends, and require them to ascertain the proportion of the debts due to the Government which ought to be released, instead of making it a subject of future legislation? Is the time of Congress worth nothing, that it should be thus sported with? Or do gentlemen fear that if the attempt is now made to obtain the entire exoneration of a portion of the debtors for whose benefit this measure is intended, the House may recede from its intention of suspending the collection of the bonds due from those who have sustained no loss by the fire?

This measure, from its commencement, has been singularly conducted. No report has been made from the committee who reported the bill, to which the House can look for information as to the amount of the debts it is called upon to suspend; or the proportions in which they are to be suspended for three, four, and five years, and for six, nine, and twelve months. It is true, the bill now under consideration is one which originated in the Senate, but the bill reported by the committee of this House was equally unsustained by a report of facts; and we have thus been rendered dependent upon the information obtained in debate from the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. And what is the consequence? Why, sir, simply that there are gentlemen on this floor who do not now know what amount of debt due to the Treasury will be affected by this bill, or in what proportions it will be suspended in the hands of the debtors for the different periods contemplated. Are gentlemen thus situated prepared to act upon this measure to dispose of four millions of dollars of the revenues of the Government? I have paid some attention to the statements of gentlemen who profess to enlighten the House upon this subject, and yet I am not certain that I know the exact amount stated by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG rose and stated what he said he had repeatedly stated before as to the aggregate amount of the bonds intended to be affected by this bill, and the proportions in which the different sections would affect it.]

I (said Mr. CHAMBERS) had understood the gentleman to state before that the whole amount due to the Government at New York was four millions of dollars, and that two million seven hundred thousand dollars of that sum would come under the provisions of the second section of this bill; the balance, of course, under the first. From his statement now, it seems that less than one million will be affected by the first section, and, of course, more than three millions by the second. The variance is not very important; the fact, however, is shown, that more than three millions of the sum is to be legislated into the hands of individual importers, who have not lost one cent by the fire. The statement of the gentleman shows the precision and promptitude with which he can distinguish between those who did and those who did not sustain loss by the fire, and makes it manifest that there could be no difficulty in making the discrimination, if we chose to do it. It is, however, intended that all the duties due at the custom-house in the city of New York, on the 17th day of December last, shall remain in the hands of the debtors, regardless of the fact whether they have or have not lost property of any kind by the fire, and, if they have, whether they have been indemnified by the insurers. Why, sir, is this exclusive legislation extended to the city of New York? The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] whose very able and eloquent argument in support of this bill will, in all future appeals to Congress for similar relief, be referred to as the basis upon which they must rest, tells us that our power to grant the relief proposed by this bill is derived from the peculiar relation subsisting between the Government and its debtors; and he distinctly avows that the inhabitants of other towns and cities which do not occupy this enviable relation to the Government cannot bring themselves within the power of Congress to relieve them, however severely they may suffer by a similar calamity. He says: "The Government is under no obligation to the dealer in Cincinnati; it has subjected him to no legislative exactions; it holds him to no peculiar responsibilities; it sustains towards him no other than the ordinary relation between Government and citizen; it is more especially in no sense his creditor; it has no demand against him as a debtor, of whom it is requiring the payment of a debt for which it has given him no equivalent," &c. Now, sir, if the full force of this argument be admitted as to those whose goods on which the duties remain unpaid have been consumed by the fire, how is it to be applied to those who have not sustained any loss whatever? The peculiar, the mystical relationship of debtor and creditor must still be drawn upon to sustain the argument; but foreseeing that it could not be thus supported, the gentleman is driven to the necessity of founding the propriety and the power of granting this relief to that portion of the Government debtors who have not suffered in the slightest degree by the fire, upon the ground that they will thereby be enabled to disseminate it among those who have--among the working classes, the tradesmen, and mechanics. Upon the merchants, he says, the tradesmen and mechanics are immediately dependent for credit and employment, and in the stability of the merchants "the only hopes of these tradesmen and mechanics are directly and deeply involved." Then, according to the views of the honorable gentleman, the merchants, because of their peculiar relationship of debtors to the Government, whether they are or are not sufferers by the fire, may receive the bounty of this Government, with a view to its distribution, through them, to the laboring classes, "the tradesmen and mechanics." Could not the honorable gentleman, by some similar indirect process, extend his liberality, and the liberality of this Government, to the tradesmen and mechanics of Cincinnati, in case of a similar calamity?

Sir, I protest against this system of exclusive legislation for a favorite class. I can recognise no power to do indirectly that which we cannot do directly; and, more especially, I will not consent to make one class of men the recipients of the favors of this Government, with a view to their extending them to a poorer class. What guarantee can the gentleman offer that his favorite class, the importing merchants, will apply the bounty of this Government to the relief of the laboring classes? None, certainly none. Sir, if we have the power to relieve the suffering poor, if that is the object of this measure, let us march up to it boldly, and do it openly; it needs no cloak. I, for one, want no almoner. Let us be the distributors of our own bounty. If we can relieve them by legislation, let them learn to love and respect the Government which steps in between them and suffering, instead of being taught to consider themselves as only secondary objects of its munificence, and dependent for the distribution of its bounty upon the caprice of others.

Let us examine some of the other inducements to the adoption of this measure which have been relied upon by its advocates. One honorable gentleman tells us that the city of New York pays more than half of our revenue; another, more correctly, says it collects more than half of our revenue; and yet it is sometimes urged by our southern friends, that the South ("the staple States") pays it all. In this view of the subject, sir, the middle and western States, the bread and meat States, are peculiarly fortunate in having nothing to pay towards the support of the Government. Upon this modest assumption, it must be, I suppose, sir, (for I can conceive of no better ground for it,) that we are never taken into the account in the distribution or expenditure of the public treasure. But, to keep a little nearer to the point: What does the argument that the city of New York collects more than half the revenue of this Government prove? Why, that she has the finest seaport of this continent, possesses more than half the commercial capital of the country, and derives all the advantages incident to an import trade, paying annually upwards of eleven millions of dollars into the Treasury of the United States, in the shape of duties. Well may gentlemen call that city "the emporium of the Union," "the London of America," and boast of the investment of their millions in the stocks of the West. It is all true, sir; these advantages, and more, belong to the great city of New York. In its approximation to the wealth and commercial influence of London, it is treading closely in her footsteps in other respects. Yes, sir, power is concentrating there, as well as wealth. We feel it here at this moment; one-sixth part of the two hundred and forty members of which this House ought to consist, (but of which, practically, it never does consist,) are here as the representatives of the State of New York, supporting this measure in solid column. Sir, it is a fearful power in the legislation of this House, when united in support of a local interest, or in opposition to the local interests of other portions of the Union; but her power here is not more sensibly felt than is the power of her Wall street brokers over the money matters of the country. They can in one day reduce the best stocks of the country below par, buy them in the next, and sell them at an advance the third.

The city of New York has her Rothschilds and her Barings, in miniature, who aspire to be the bankers of the twenty-four States of this Union. Yes, sir, and she has her Arthur Tappan, too, about whose residence and employment, during the late war with Great Britain, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. JUDSON] seem to have misunderstood each other. I do not know, sir, whether, at that period, he was resident in one of the British Canadian provinces, and smuggling goods into this country in violation of its laws, as one of the gentlemen seems to have understood the other to represent; but whether he was, or not, a smuggler, he is worse than one now; yes, sir, worse than a pirate, for he aspires to mischief on a large scale. In seeking to establish for himself the character of a philanthropist, he is, in effect, plotting the destruction of the happiness and comfort of the colored population of the South, by instigating them to insurrection and murder. A gentleman before me from New York [Mr. G. LEE] says Arthur Tappan does not live in the city of New York. The gentleman is right in disowning him. He ought not to be recognised as a citizen of so respectable a city. Mr. Speaker, I ask pardon of the House for following the example of others in introducing the name of this miscreant, or the subject connected with it, into this debate; it was my intention to have avoided the subject altogether, for I cannot speak of it with the forbearance which I would prefer to observe. I cannot reflect that, while I am here discharging the duties of my station, he and his abolition associates are using their utmost efforts to instigate people whom I have raised with care and indulgence but little short of parental, first to discontent and resentment, and ultimately to imbrue their hands in the blood of my family and neighbors. Sir, such philanthropy, such zeal for abolition, cannot fail to meet its appropriate reward; and when the first drop of blood shall flow under their auspices, let them look well to themselves.

Again, sir, I ask pardon for mentioning this hateful subject, and especially in connexion with the city of New York. I do not do it in disrespect to the inhabitants of that city; far from it. I respect their enterprise, their character for integrity; and more especially I respect the munificent character of their merchants; it is creditable to our country; and I regret that the advocates of their interest here grasp at more than I can, consistently with my views of justice and sound policy, consent to give them; and regret still more the evidence which the passage of this bill will give of the controlling influence of the State of New York in the legislation of this nation. Such a measure could not, in my opinion, be carried in favor of any other portion of this Union. I had intended, sir, to move a recommitment of this bill, with instructions to the committee to report such an amendment as would meet the views I have presented; but am convinced it is useless to do so, and will not further tax the patience of the House by an opposition which will be unavailing.

Mr. TOUCEY said he was convinced that the discussion had been protracted to an unprofitable length, and that it was time it was disposed of; and he therefore demanded the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved an adjournment; not carried: Ayes 66, noes not counted.

The previous question was then seconded by the House, tellers being appointed: Ayes 106, noes 58.

On ordering the main question to be put,

[H. OF R.]

Mr. EVERETT called for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered; and the main question was ordered to be put, without a count.

The main question was on the passage of the bill; and on that question

Mr. HOPKINS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 113, nays 95, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ash, Bailey, Banks, Barton, Beardsley, Bockee, Briggs, Brown, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Chapin, Childs, Cleveland, Coffee, Corwin, Cramer, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Dickerson, Doubleday, Evans, Fairfield, Farlin, Philo C. Fuller, William K. Fuller, Rice Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Granger, Grantland, Grennell, Haley, Hard, Harper, Haynes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hoar, Holsey, Howard, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Janes, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Lane, Lansing, Lawrence, Lay, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Lincoln, Love, Loyall, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Manning, William Mason, Moses Mason, Samson Mason, McKennan, McKeon, McKim, Mercer, Miller, Milligan, Moore, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parker, Patterson, Phelps, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Russell, Shinn, Sickles, Slade, Smith, Spangler, Steele, Storer, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Vinton, Ward, Wardwell—113.

NAYS.—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Ashley, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Boyd, Bunch, John Calhoun, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chapman, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Everett, Forester, French, Fry, Galbraith, James Garland, Graham, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Hardin, Harlan, Samuel S. Mason, Maury, McCarty, McComas, McKay, McLene, Montgomery, Morgan, Morris, Parks, Patton, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Peyton, Pickens, Rencher, John Reynolds, Roane, Robertson, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Standefer, Thomas, Turner, Underwood, Webster, Weeks, White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise—95.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, then moved to amend the title of the bill, by striking out "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York," and inserting the following: "An act to relieve and confer exclusive benefits upon certain merchants and importers in the city of New York."

Mr. WISE inquired of the Chair if that was a debatable question.

The CHAIR replied that he supposed it was.

Mr. WISE then moved an adjournment; which was negatived.

Mr. KENNON rose to a question of order. The previous question having been moved and seconded, and the main question carried, he could not conceive how any part of the bill could be amended thereafter.

The CHAIR said it was the first time within his recollection that the question had been raised; but his impression was that the title was a distinct part of the bill.

The amendment was then rejected, and the original title agreed to.

On motion of Mr. VINTON,

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER, by consent, laid before the House additional testimony, (received through the post office,) in the case of the contested election from North Carolina; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The House then resumed the consideration of the motion made by Mr. SPANGLER, to reconsider the vote rejecting the proposition to allow Mr. Newland leave to appear by counsel, in the prosecution of his claim to the seat in the House at present occupied by Mr. Graham.

Mr. GREENELL, who was entitled to the floor, said he had but little to say, after what he had said on a preceding day. In reference to the motion to admit counsel, he remarked, although the decision might interest the parties personally, yet there were higher considerations which they should secure for the House. An office was in view; a high public trust, which was to be exercised for the good of the whole people, which made it of much higher consideration than a mere personal matter. The evidence was all before the House, and the House had the ability to understand and apply the law and the constitution in the case, and the members were sworn to decide the question truly and justly, according to the requirements of the constitution. But, in relation to placing the parties on a footing of equality, it was said the other day, in order to show the inequality which existed, that the sitting member was a member of the bar, and that the petitioner was neither a member of the bar nor a debater, and hence it was argued that there was a disparity between the parties. It was a disparity, however, of which the House could take no cognizance; it was unknown to the constitution. He asked if the House felt the necessity of counsel for that purpose? If so, the House should employ counsel, and the ablest counsel. If, then, the House did not need counsel, it was not needed for the petitioner. But if equality was the object, it would be a difficult matter to settle, even if both the parties were lawyers; one might be eminent, accustomed to make arguments and discussions in courts of law, and the other might be a silent counsel, and there would be an inequality, although both belonged to the same profession. Inequality would exist; and how was it to be remedied? They could not take professions as decisive. If they were to endeavor to place gentlemen on an equality, the House would be involved in an inextricable difficulty. It seemed to him that the proposition must satisfy every one that the object was unattainable. But did it depend upon the inequality of counsel in courts of law, that suits should be decided for the ablest and against the poorest? His views were different. On the contrary, he had often witnessed the weakest party, with nothing but the justice of their cause, opposed to the ablest counsel, and prevailing under all those apparent disadvantages. But the petitioner need not apprehend any want of counsel in the House, because he would be done ample and impartial justice. Did the facts prove that counsel was of no use? He would remark that counsel was mainly important to see that his client's case was clearly drawn up and presented to the House. And after the facts were drawn up, he would ask where was the vast importance of able counsel? The House had been told that precedents were in favor of counsel; but he must say that for the last thirty years no counsel had been admitted. Cases had occurred more than once where persons had been brought before the bar of the House for trial, and counsel was granted then; but that had been for the best of reasons. Counsel was always allowed in cases of a breach of the peace, in assaulting and beating a member of the House, or for the like offences. The House, of necessity, had to grant counsel in such cases, because they themselves were the judges and jurors to determine the matter. To deny counsel in such cases, would be taking away that liberty which belonged to an accused. In such cases, it was right. But the present was one of a far different complexion. An office of honor, dignity, and responsibility, was sought; and, if his arguments were correct, which he took them to be, the cases were dissimilar. It seemed to him that the petitioning member had had all the advocates that could, with propriety, be accorded to him, as he had been heard before the committee by eminent counsel. Having been so heard before the committee, and that committee having reported favorably to the petitioner, what more could he ask? Was not the committee able to present to the House all the facts which the petitioner's counsel spread before them? It seemed to him that all that could reasonably be asked had been granted to the petitioner. If he supposed his rights were invaded, he would be the last man to raise his voice against him.

Contested Election.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD said, to have a correct knowledge of the matter, it would be necessary to review the circumstances attending the proposition then under consideration. The gentleman from Kentucky made a report from the Committee of Elections, accompanied by a motion that the subject be made the order for a certain day, and that the gentleman petitioning for the seat be permitted to appear and be heard either by himself or by counsel. Some doubts arose as to the propriety of the motion, and, in the mean time, a report came in from the minority of the committee, and a paper from the sitting member. Some debate ensued, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARD] moved that the petitioner be permitted to take his seat within the bar of the House. His colleague [Mr. BRUNN] then moved an additional proposition, that upon the main question the petitioner have leave to be heard by counsel. On the next morning after this, a friend of the petitioner informed the House that the petitioner did not wish counsel, and on the next day, again, his colleague, [Mr. BRUNN], after consulting with the petitioner, ascertained that he had changed his opinion. In that state of the case the vote was taken and decided against admitting counsel; and at the earliest possible moment the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPANGLER] came forward and moved a reconsideration. As a matter of justice and consistency to the petitioner, Mr. S. wished the broadest resolution offered which the House could adopt. He was in favor of giving him the greatest privilege; and if a legal question should arise, then he would give him counsel if he wished it. He would let him have it whenever it was needed. If counsel was needed, he would give it without searching over musty records for a precedent. He had great respect for the petitioner, and he knew he was not a lawyer by profession. He sincerely hoped that the House would reconsider its vote, as he did not wish that this negative should apply for the first time to an individual from his own State.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he was one of those who, a few days ago, voted to allow the petitioner the privilege of appearing by counsel; and with all due respect for a majority of the House, which negatived his request, he must be permitted to say that he was surprised at the result on that occasion. Some very queer arguments had been urged in the progress of this discussion; and if he had not the utmost confidence in the modesty, as well as the patriotism of honorable gentlemen, he would almost be induced to suspect that they were the offspring of self-sufficiency. The substance of the arguments against granting the application of the petitioner was, "We are wise enough of ourselves; we want no instruction from any extrinsic quarter upon any questions, however important, that may come before us; we will depart from precedents established and adhered to by our predecessors ever since the foundation of the Government, because we are wiser than they were, and will deny to the petitioner a privilege which, when requested, has always been granted to every petitioner for a seat here." For, be it distinctly remembered, sir, that there is not a case on record where this privilege to appear by counsel has been denied. If, within the last twenty or thirty years, petitioners in cases of this description have not appeared by counsel, it is only because they have not asked the privilege of doing so. The contending parties have either in most instances both been lawyers, or the points involved have been few and simple, so that neither party deemed it an object to ask for the privilege of appearing by counsel.

What are the principal objections which are urged against the application of the petitioner in this case? It is said lawyers will make long speeches, and we cannot spare time enough to hear these speeches. In his (Mr. V's) humble opinion, we shall not be relieved from long speeches, whether we admit lawyers or not. The talking disease rages so violently here as to preclude the hope that we shall gain the great desideratum of less talk from the exclusion of lawyers in this case, nor need honorable gentlemen apprehend that counsel, if admitted, will preoccupy the whole ground, and thus leave us nothing to talk about. Who ever knew a subject exhausted here? After forty speeches, pro and con, topics plenty as blackberries still spring up before the imaginations of honorable gentlemen, and enable us but too often to prove that we were never converted to the maxim, that "brevity is the soul wit."

If we admitted counsel, we might be pretty sure that the controlling points in the case would be presented to us by them. Courtesy and a sense of responsibility would induce honorable gentlemen to listen to counsel; and if the attainment of truth was our object, it would be far more profitable to listen to methodical, well-digested argument of counsel, learned and respectable, as counsel always were, who appeared at the bar of this House, than to crude and desultory lucubrations from other quarters, however honorable. What pledge had we that the points involved in this case were so simple and easy to be disposed of? The honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. CLAIRBORNE], a few days ago had admonished him (Mr. V.) most eloquently, not to come to a precipitate conclusion upon the merits of this case, and warned the House that the questions presented by the two reports were complicated and multifarious; and if judges learned in the law deemed it no disparagement to their understanding to hear counsel in all matters upon which they were called to adjudicate, he could see no good reason in favor of our wrapping ourselves in our robes of self-sufficiency, and saying, in a case of such interest, not only to the petitioner, but to the electors of the district where the contending gentlemen reside, "We are too wise to be illuminated by counsel." There was no doubt that the vote a few days ago resulted from the belief that the petitioner did not want counsel. He now tells you, through gentlemen on this floor, that he is desirous to have the aid of counsel, and it would be as unreasonable as it was unprecedented to refuse to gratify him.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] had stated an objection to the allowance of counsel, which, to his mind, was wholly unsound. He says that counsel here would be peculiarly privileged, and would not be subject to the rules of order. This certainly could not be so. If we made an order to admit counsel, it was implied that such counsel should be subject to the rules of order prescribed for the members of the House. He addresses the Speaker or Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, and is, for the time being, as much subject to the rules of order as any member here. Counsel have been admitted in parliamentary bodies from time immemorial, and we could not learn that they had ever claimed to be exempt from rules of order, or that they had ever discovered a refractory spirit, unbecoming a member of a legislative assembly. He felt the House called upon, both by principle and precedent, to grant the reasonable request of the petitioner.

Mr. ANTHONY said he was present, and had voted that the petitioner should not be permitted counsel: first, that he did not desire it; and, secondly, that he did not need it. He viewed the case in a different light from some other gentlemen. If the gentleman was brought there on a charge of breach of the peace, it would then be proper that he should be heard by counsel. But the present was a different case. They stood in the relation of counsel to the petitioner, and they had taken an oath to that effect. They were also counsel for the sitting member. He was prima facie entitled to his seat, and had taken it. They would give the other gentleman the same privilege on that question, because a certain portion of the people had sent him there to claim his seat. It was the people they were to decide for, because the petitioner was the agent and representative of those people. It was not a personal matter they had to settle, but a matter of interest to the people of the district the petitioner represented. Gentlemen might as well argue that counsel should be employed in every case coming before Congress, as in the present. Some gentlemen might say they did not understand the laws and the constitution in relation to that case. That question was brought up every day, and therefore they ought to have an expounder of the constitution to tell them what was the law and the constitution. Two-thirds of the speakers in the House were not listened to at all; and if they did have counsel, he asked if he would be listened to? Mr. A. said he was counsel, and so was every gentleman counsel in that case, and they would decide not only for the petitioner, but for the people of his district. The petitioner did not ask any thing for himself, but as the representative of the people. There were many persons who came there in the same way, and might on the same grounds ask for counsel. They might say that there was no one to take care of their interests; and why not carry out the principle, and allow every one who had claims on the Government to be heard by counsel? It was paying a poor compliment to gentlemen to say that they cannot understand a question of law in North Carolina, without having feed counsel to give them information and advice. He protested against it. He believed the petitioner would not be deprived of what counsel was necessary from gentlemen who were not only schooled in the laws of the United States, but also schooled in the laws of North Carolina. But the principal reason why he protested against it was that they would have a long-winded argument to consume the time of the House, when they were sworn to decide the case from their own information. He thought they might as well allow a gentleman to say, when a matter came before the House in which his constituents were interested, that he was not able to argue the question, and must be permitted to have counsel. He considered it the right and the duty of the House to settle the matter; and if they allowed the petitioner counsel, they might as well allow any other gentleman on that floor to ask for counsel to argue the cause of his constituents.

Mr. BOULDIN arose to address the House; but

The CHAIR announced the arrival of the hour for proceeding to the special order of the day.

Mr. DUNLAP rose and said that, by the special orders of the House, no measure could now be brought before the House but by a vote of two thirds. He had heretofore voted against making the special orders of the House, because it was placing a bill in which his immediate constituents were interested in a situation that a majority of the House could not act on it, but it would require of him to get a vote of two thirds of the House, which he did not believe he could do but by courtesy. He had risen this morning to ask of the House the favor to suspend the rules and special orders, to enable him to make a motion that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on bill No. 68, the Tennessee land bill. The bill was one in which his State and immediate constituents were interested; in that not one hour of the time of the House had been occupied in the consideration of this subject since 1829. The House, surely, would now extend the favor to him of taking up this bill: a small portion of the time of this House was due to Tennessee. It not being in order to discuss this motion, he thanked the House for their indulgence in permitting him to make this short statement. He therefore moved that the rules be suspended, to enable him to make his motion.

Objection being made,

Mr. DUNLAP moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to submit his motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, expressed a hope that the rules would not be suspended.

The motion was then negatived, without a count.

SEMINOLE HOSTILITIES:

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON asked the consent of the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering certain amendments of the Senate to a bill from the House, entitled "An act for the payment of volunteers and militia corps in the service of the United States."

Mr. J. briefly explained that the amendments in question provided for the appointment of three additional paymasters of the army; a measure proposed in the bill already reported from the Military Committee of the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw the motion for the present, as he wished to make a report from the Committee of Ways and Means, connected with the same subject.

Mr. JOHNSON assented, and Mr. C. asked the consent of the House to make the report indicated by him.

Mr. BOON wished to amend the motion, so as to enable the standing committees of the House to report generally.

The CHAIR said it was not then in order to make that motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then asked the consent of the House, briefly explaining that the report was an additional appropriation of $500,000 for repressing the hostilities of the Indians in Florida, which was imperiously required, from the fact that the funds already appropriated were exhausted, and drafts were constantly coming in which could not be paid.

Mr. BOND objected, and

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to suspend the rules; which was agreed to without a count; and

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making a further appropriation for the repression of Indian hostilities in Florida; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON then moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the amendments from the Senate to the bill providing for the payment of volunteers and militia corps in the service of the United States, &c., and also the bill just reported.

Objection being made,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rules; which was agreed to, and the motion of Mr. JOHNSON being also concurred in,

[MARCH 10, 1836.]

The House accordingly went into committee, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, in the chair, on the foregoing bills.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill from the House, to provide for the payment of volunteers and militia received into the service of the United States, were first considered.

After a brief explanation by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the amendments were concurred in, with the exception of that which provided for the appointment of three additional paymasters of the army.

Upon adopting the latter amendment, Mr. UNDERWOOD called for a count; when

Mr. JOHNSON observed that, as chairman of the Military Committee, it became his duty to explain the matter in question, by a simple statement of the facts connected with the bill and the amendments. He was reluctant to intrude upon the time of the committee by any remarks of his; but the views of the War Department, of the chief of the pay department, and of the Military Committee, which were in perfect coincidence, ought to be known to every member before giving his vote.

The bill (said he) provides that the militia, when called into actual service, shall receive the same pay as the regular army, and that the widows of such as may die in the service shall receive five years' half pay, and that the widows of such as shall perish in the regular service shall also receive five years' half pay. This bill passed this House, and was sent to the Senate.

Another bill has been reported by the Military Committee, providing for the appointment of three additional paymasters to the army, but it has not yet been acted upon by the House.

The bill which passed the House has been taken up by the Senate, and amended by adding to it the other bill for the appointment of three additional paymasters, and, in that form, returned to the House for its concurrence. The bill, then, as returned from the Senate, presents to us the two bills amalgamated; one of which has already been passed by the House, the other matured by the committee, but not yet acted upon by the House. Though the committee of the House reported two bills to effect the object of the one bill as amended, the Senate did not discover such a want of relation between the two as to render it improper to embrace the whole subject in one bill. The whole is strictly military. It specifies the allowance to be made for military services, and it provides for a sufficient increase of the number of disbursing officers to carry this, together with the pre-existing laws, into effect. There is in it nothing of that complexity calculated to produce confusion; nothing novel or anomalous. The object of a law is lost, without the means of carrying it into effect; and the paymaster general, knowing from practical demonstration the immediate necessity of the measure, requested the amendment to be made by the Senate. The committee of the Senate gave to the subject the same investigation which the committee of the House had done, and arrived at the same conclusion. They incorporated, as an amendment, the same bill, verbatim, which had been reported by the Military Committee to the House. The Senate adopted the amendment, and ask the concurrence of the House. Their object appears to have been, not to counteract the views of the House, but to further them by so accelerating the business as to give efficacy to the measure at the moment when our bleeding country feels its necessity.

It is objected by gentlemen that we have already fourteen paymasters; a number quite sufficient for the payment of an army of but six or seven thousand men. The argument seems specious; and it is admitted that half the number would be amply sufficient for a much larger army, if they were consolidated at one, two, or three stations. But the labor imposed on the paymasters is not proportioned to the number of troops, as the gentleman would seem to intimate. It is proportioned to the scattered situation and the remoteness from each other of the stations occupied by the troops. It requires as much time and labor for a paymaster to perform a journey of five hundred miles to pay three companies at three different stations, as it would to pay three regiments, of a thousand men each, at one station. The present number of paymasters was fixed in 1821, when the number of military stations was much less than they are at this time; and even then, some of our troops, occupying distant posts, were kept out of their pay for more than six months together, and, in some instances, reduced to a state of actual suffering, in time of peace, for want of proper facilities to give them their pay according to law. Our military stations are now greatly extended in their distance, and multiplied in their number. They are spread along our maritime frontier, from Eastport, in Maine, to Florida and New Orleans, in the South; and upon our western frontier, from the Red river, along the western border of Arkansas, Missouri, and on the Upper Mississippi, to Green Bay and Mackinac, in the North, embracing the whole circumference of the United States, and forming a circuit of ten thousand miles. The whole of this circuit must be traversed once every three months by paymasters, or the troops cannot receive their compensation according to the terms of the law under which they enter the service. It is required of each paymaster to prepare pay-rolls, visit every station within his district, pay each person his due, and make his return, properly authenticated, to the paymaster general, for adjudication, once in every three months. The labor has been found to be physically impracticable. Officers and privates in Florida, the seat of recent slaughter, have been deprived of their pay for more than six months together; and it has been stated that the volunteers who acted so gallant a part in the Black Hawk war did not, in many instances, receive their pay for more than a year after their services terminated. In these cases, the fault is not ascribable to the disbursing officers nor to the Department, but to the want of a sufficient number of paymasters to perform the service. Is this the treatment which our heroic army merits from the nation which it defends?

Gentlemen now call for proof of the correctness of the statement. They desire such evidence as shall satisfy them that the present number is inadequate to the service. It is not possible, sir, to subject this to the rules of mathematical demonstration, because it is not a proposition of that nature. But we have sufficient evidence to satisfy the most incredulous mind, if credit is due to the asseverations of disinterested men of the highest honor and trust. The measure is recommended by the President, who is not utterly ignorant of what is necessary to perfect our military establishment. It is recommended by the Secretary of War, who is not unacquainted with the wants of his Department. It is earnestly recommended by General Towson, the paymaster general, who alleges the impossibility of punctuality in paying the army promptly with the present number of paymasters; and it is long experience which has demonstrated to him the truth of the proposition. His veracity is unimpeached and unimpeachable. His character, both as a man and as an officer, will stand every scrutiny. He has no end to answer in this request, but his country's good; and if any other temptation could present itself, no person would suspect him capable of yielding to it. With these authorities, I ask no farther evidence of the necessity of the measure proposed in the amendment. Without it the Government cannot fulfil its stipulations to the army. The money is provided; the appropriation is made; the service is performed; but, for want of a sufficient number of paymasters, the heroic band is defrauded of its timely dues; the officers and soldiers are reduced to suffering, and the Treasury is not benefited one cent by the delay. And is this true economy? No, sir; it is prodigality. Economy gives sufficient aid to effect the entire object of appropriations. The want of these means is alike destructive to public and private credit, and must end in disasters which years of true economy cannot repair.

The tendency of any measure which has an unjust bearing upon any class of citizens, whatever may be its present prospect, will always end in misfortune. But if any one class merits promptness in meeting to their stipend, it is the army. Their whole allowance is but a scanty competence. They serve not their country for money. They form a bulwark of defence around us, and glory is their reward. Of this they have surrounded themselves with a radiance as lasting as the sunbeams, which the eye of envy can never penetrate; we cannot deprive them of it. The complaint of officers occasionally visiting the seat of Government, whether on duty or on furlough, cannot eclipse their glory, nor pluck one laurel from their brows. Their deeds of chivalry during the late war have covered them with immortal honors; and the character of those who compose this little army, for intelligence and honor, is unsurpassed by any equal number in creation. Why, then, withhold from them their stipulated dues, after they become payable by contract, for the trifling consideration of furnishing a sufficient number of disbursing officers to perform this service?

This measure is but a branch of the system of defence which the safety of our whole interior frontier imperiously demands. The States bordering upon the savages are warranted in the expectation of protection from the tomahawk and scalping-knife. The want of this system has already stained the waters of the Upper Mississippi, and deluged the Illinois with the blood of innocence; and Florida is now bleeding under the hand of savage barbarity; when a small proportion of the moneys which these two wars will have cost, expended in perfecting the system of which this measure is an important branch, would have prevented the catastrophe. The same scenes will be re-acted in Arkansas, in Missouri, in our Northwestern Territory, unless the whole system of protection shall be adopted. The destruction of many valuable lives, and the waste of many millions of dollars, will be the certain result; though the annual appropriation of a few hundred thousand dollars, applied in proper time, may prevent the disasters.

Mr. DUNLAP said the House must now see the situation in which it was placed by the amendment of the Senate to this appropriation bill. He would venture to assert that there was not half a dozen members who knew what they were voting for, when they voted to suspend the rules of the House and postpone the special orders of the day, to take up this bill. He was warranted in this assertion from the vote just taken on the motion made by himself, to take up the Tennessee land bill. He had not complained of the House for that vote; he knew well the reason that induced gentlemen to give the votes they did. The special orders contain two bills that the necessity of the Government required the action of this House upon immediately. As to the other bills included in the special order, there was not that necessity for immediate action. Although the House refused to suspend the rules to take up the bill in which his State and constituents were so much interested, we find ourselves voting for a suspension of the rules to take up a bill to increase the number of paymasters. Sir, would any member on this floor have given such a vote, if he had known for what he was voting? How inconsistent must he have been, to vote to postpone the navy and fortification bills, since we have so often been told the public service is suffering for the want of money to be appropriated by those bills, and to take up a bill to increase the number of paymasters! Mr. D. said the House had voted for the caption of the bill, without any knowledge of what amendments had been offered by the other branch of the Legislature. The House believed they were voting to take up a bill "for the payment of volunteer and militia corps in the service of the United States." The bill had passed this House without any opposition. There was not a member that would for one moment withhold from that gallant band of soldiers now engaged in the service of the United States in Florida in putting an end to the cruel and savage war of the Seminole Indians, any thing to which they are entitled.

Mr. D. said, in what situation are we who are opposed to the increase of paymasters? We are liable to be charged of opposing the bill appropriating money to pay the gallant sons of the South, who did not wait, when their country needed their services, to be draughted; but, sir, the only draught was, who should stay at home—all, yes, all were ready, willing, and anxious, to go and fight the battles of their country. He, for one, was unwilling to be placed in such a situation. If this manner of legislation is adopted, of putting measures of a different character in the same bill, what will be our situation? Sir, take for example the case now before the House. Suppose a majority of this House shall be opposed to increase the number of paymasters, and non-concur in the Senate's amendment, and the Senate should refuse to recede from their amendment: the House would be compelled either to lose the bill (as the fortification bill was lost last session) or agree to increase the number of paymasters. Mr. D. said he was utterly opposed to such a practice of legislation. It was unparliamentary, and the House should unanimously refuse to adopt such a principle. Mr. D. said, as to the amendment, he desired that its merits might be considered when the bill of this House on that subject came up, and also the bills to increase the engineer topographical corps. It would seem strange to his constituents, that fourteen men were not sufficient to pay quarterly six thousand men what the Government owed them. It was certainly strange to him, if they could not each pay less than five hundred men, although they were stationed over a large tract of country. The facilities of travelling were now very great, much more so than in 1821, when fourteen paymasters were considered sufficient.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] would not press this amendment. He concurred entirely in the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DUNLAP,] that as this proposition had been reported to the House by the Military Committee, in a distinct form, it should not have been attached to the present bill, which should be immediately passed. He was therefore opposed to the amendment.

Mr. WARD said the House was already in possession of all the facts necessary to arrive at a decision on the amendment. He referred to the circumstance, that the present number of paymasters had been found insufficient to pay off the troops promptly, and that frequent delays on that account had taken place, and the officers and troops had gone without their pay for months together. In case of the sickness or death of a paymaster, the duties required of him could not be discharged by any other person, and a vacancy could only be filled by the President, with the consent of the Senate. He was satisfied that the amendment was not only proper, but absolutely necessary, and he therefore hoped it would be concurred in.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON could see no reason for disagreeing to this amendment. He adverted to the fact that the subject of the present amendment had been urged by the Department at a former session, as absolutely necessary, and that it had been favorably considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. It had, however, fallen among the unfinished business, and having, by chance or good luck, come up in the shape of an amendment by the Senate to a bill from the House, he could see no reason for setting it aside. The amendment was a literal copy of the bill reported in the House at the last and the present sessions. He was no more interested in the proposition than other gentlemen. He hoped the report of the Military Committee in relation to it would be read; and if a majority of the committee should be in favor of non-concurring in the amendment, he would cheerfully acquiesce.

H. OF R.]

[MARCH 10, 1836.]

The report having been read,

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, remarked that he had originally two objections to this amendment, the first of which was removed in some degree, if not entirely, by the reading of the report; the second, however, remained, and that was the mingling up of different subjects in the same bill. He thought the amendment should be considered in a separate bill, and he hoped it would not be concurred in by the committee.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and there appeared: Ayes 50, noes 61: no quorum voting.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the committee rise and report that fact to the House; which was negatived.

Tellers were then appointed, and the amendment was concurred in: Ayes 72, noes 59.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said it appeared that this Florida war was to be made a pretext for the appointment of three additional permanent paymasters.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose to explain. It was not on account of the war in Florida that this amendment had been made. For the last two years the paymaster general had urged upon Congress the absolute necessity for an increase in the number of paymasters. The Florida war was an additional reason for urging the speedy action of the House on the subject. It had not, he repeated, originated the proposition.

Mr. C. JOHNSON resumed. He thought fourteen paymasters (the present number) amply sufficient to pay an army of six or seven thousand troops. If it should be determined to increase the number, they would have an army of paymasters after a while. As the Seminole war would enhance the duties of those officers for a limited time, he would move to amend the amendment by providing that the three additional paymasters should hold their offices for one year, and no longer.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON was opposed to the amendment last proposed, and urged at some length the propriety and necessity of increasing permanently the number of paymasters of the army. The paymaster general, a distinguished and honorable officer, had informed them that he could not, with the present force, pay off the troops promptly and punctually. He had called for this increase, and he (Mr. J.) felt bound to take the word of the paymaster general, that it was required by the public service. He trusted, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. C. JOHNSON] would not prevail.

Mr. SMITH said the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. C. JOHNSON] was well worthy of consideration; for, in a bill for an appropriation of a temporary character, the Senate had appended a permanent proposition, without, at the same time, furnishing a single fact of its propriety or necessity. He therefore thought at least the limit ought to be somewhat commensurate with the occasion giving rise to it. If it was a proposition to add those three paymasters for a short period, or to a period approximating the time of the present emergency of the appropriation, objections to it, strong as they then would be, might be waived; but this was not the proper place or occasion to provide for these permanent officers. It was entailing an expense of nearly $6,000 a year upon the country, $1,934 66 being the pay for each of those officers. If he were as convinced of the necessity of the additional paymasters as the gentleman from Kentucky himself, he should vote against their being provided for in the present bill, though he might be in favor of a distinct proposition. If the House should, however, concur in the Senate's amendment, he hoped at least the provision of the gentleman from Tennessee would be adopted.

Mr. MANN said that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. JOHNSON] had well remarked that this was not a new proposition in the House. True, sir, (said Mr. M.,) to many of us it is an old acquaintance here. The honorable member, who had so long served the country, had not neglected to report a bill upon the subject for the time he (Mr. M.) had served here. The head of the bureau of the pay department had not, Mr. M. believed, neglected his duty in soliciting its passage; and we are now informed that he is a high and honorable man. Be it so, Mr. Chairman. Does this furnish a good reason for the passage of this bill to create these three new offices in addition to the present list of the army—I will not say sinecures? The heads of the military bureaux stationed at Washington were not backward in recommending additional force to their respective corps; and the kindness of heart for which the honorable chairman of the committee is so distinguished leads him to yield to their solicitations sometimes, Mr. M. feared, without that full consideration and investigation which the questions demand.

The honorable gentleman had reported bills to increase the corps of military and civil engineers, the corps of topographical engineers, and, perhaps, as is usual in such bills, "to regulate" (which, in nautical and military language, I find, means to increase) their pay, and to provide clerks and servants to do the business. These bills are also introduced with the pressing recommendation of those distinguished military heads of the respective bureaux over which they preside, appendant to the Department of War; and we shall be told that they are also "honorable men," and therefore we should pass their bills; that the topography and internal improvements of the country cannot move onward unless places are provided for those supernumerary "promising youths" who are annually ingrafted upon the stock of the military aristocracy of the country by the aid of the Military Academy at West Point. These young gentlemen, "more favored of Heaven than the rest of their kind," must be provided for at the public crib, through the instrumentality of these overshadowing bureaux, and sent beyond the mountains to teach the farmers and the hardy yeomanry there how to make roads scientifically. Yes, sir, and how to vote wisely and properly. It is said by some gentlemen that they have not neglected this latter branch of their business so much as to subject them to the censures of their superiors; but that the road-makers have sometimes manifested such a disposition to mutiny, that those "booted and spurred" teachers of scientific road-making have (to use a western phrase) "been found missing."

Now, sir, (said Mr. M.,) we are, under the auspicious influence of the honorable chairman and the honorable generals stationed in the military bureaux appurtenant to the Department of War, instead of the posts on the frontier, to go on increasing the officers of the army and regulating (increasing) their pay and allowances? Is it not time we should hesitate and investigate more thoroughly the real and actual necessities of these demands? For one, Mr. Chairman, I must decline going any farther until I have more data to show me that the interests of the country require our compliance. Moreover, sir, (said Mr. M.,) I am opposed, upon principle, to uniting the administration of mere ministerial and civil duties with military duties, in the same hands; yet who can shut his eyes to the fact that the officers of the army, since the reduction in 1821, have gradually become possessed (perhaps without fault of theirs) of the administration of a large share of the civil and ministerial duties of the country? Who disburses the vast annual appropriations of the public revenues? Who has the direction and application of the revenues annually applied to the improvement of the country? Is it not mainly in the hands of the military power, divided and subdivided "into detail," as they express it? Are these officers accountable to the people, or identified with them in feeling, to the extent necessary to a harmonious action? Many of them, sir, I believe, are of great worth, and deserve the confidence they enjoy, and the approbation they receive. These must, perhaps, be considered honorable exceptions, rather than as the basis of a general rule. The union of the military and civil powers should, however, always be regarded with jealousy, and resisted in its incipient progress. Some of the military bureaux, as they now exist, therefore, should, in my opinion, be placed upon a civil footing; and the "brevets," with which they are now filled, should be lopped off as a useless appendage, not in accordance with the spirit of our civil institutions. I know, sir, that there is not much "in a name," and I have learned here that "names are not things;" yet the propriety and faith of history would always induce me to endeavor to have names indicate what things were meant by them.

Seminole Hostilities.

Sir, the gathering of these bureaux, so near the public crib, serves at least to remind common people of the tendencies of our nature, and some, who have been inclined to tolerate them as incidents to the Government, begin to apprehend that the incidents may become the principals. I entertain, sir, (said Mr. M.,) a high and habitual respect for military service in its proper sphere, defending the country in the field, protecting our hardy and enterprising inhabitants upon the frontier, and would reward it liberally by pecuniary provisions, and the meed of public approbation; but that respect is much impaired when I see those military and chivalrous men withdrawing from their proper sphere into the cloisters of the Government, seeking civil employments under military garments, and receiving sinecure and patriotism money in exchange for the higher and nobler rewards of military service. But, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. M.,) I find myself digressing too far from the immediate question. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky had informed us that there was no immediate necessity for passing this amendment in order to pay the troops now in service in Florida, and that he himself would not vote for the provision for this purpose; and therefore he opposes the amendment moved by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CAVE JOHNSON] to limit this provision to one year. I cannot (said Mr. M.) see the necessity of these three additional paymasters, from any data now before me. It is perceptible, by this time, that I do not put such unqualified confidence in these brevet heads of bureaux as the honorable chairman on Military Affairs. This may be my misfortune—perhaps my fault.

There are continual calls for an increase of these officers. Bear in mind, however, that there are now, sir, six hundred and seventy-one commissioned officers belonging to the army of about six thousand men, or one commissioned officer for about nine men, forming what is called a "nucleus," around which an army could be gathered, if occasion should ever require. Now, sir, (said Mr. M.,) I am not, for one, disposed to enlarge this "nucleus" of officers, as now organized, without commands or men, or much active service, lest it should become an "incubus" upon the body politic, which, in medical phrase, might require "excision." There are now fourteen paymasters belonging to the peace establishment, besides one stationed permanently at West Point, who must be burdened with an onerous and responsible duty, judging from the amount of disbursements there.

The paymaster general wishes three more, and believes they are necessary, and would be useful, by making more prompt payments to the troops.

Now, sir, I am informed by a military officer, who has belonged to the service more than twenty-five years, that a less number of paymasters could perform the duty with more punctuality and despatch, if they were properly stationed. The evil existing, therefore, is not in a want of a sufficient number of officers, but in a disposition (a very natural one, I admit) of those we have, to desire the advantages and pleasures of civil and domestic life, while enjoying the rewards and honors of military office. The remedies for this evil, I believe, therefore, (said Mr. M.,) are in the hands of the worthy head of the pay department, and he has nothing to do but apply them. A paymaster should, I believe, be stationed at the general headquarters of each regiment of infantry, and of the regiment of dragoons, and at some central post of each regiment of artillery, instead of the cities and towns, where I am informed that most of them are now quartered, and sometimes more than one in the same town.

Sir, (said Mr. M.,) in every view which I am enabled to take of this question, so unexpectedly presented to me at this time, I cannot discover any actual necessity for the adoption of the amendment of the Senate, and I therefore hope it will be rejected.

Lest it may be supposed (said Mr. M.) that I am unfriendly to the army generally, from the tenor of my remarks upon this question, I take leave to disclaim all such feelings; but I admit freely that I fear that great abuses have crept into its administration. Such, I am confident, is the belief of some of its best and most experienced officers. I would, sir, if it were in my power, correct these; and I am confident it must be done, or the sense of the American people will, ere long, overwhelm the establishment. The very fact that this provision comes by way of amendment and rider from the Senate, shows that those who propose it are fearful of its fate, when separated from its yokefellow.

[Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, replied at length.]

Mr. MANN rejoined, that he felt constrained, in justice both to the honorable gentleman and himself, to say a word by way of rejoinder. He had been greatly misunderstood, or he had misrepresented the honorable member. Mr. M. did understand the honorable chairman to say that he did not urge the adoption of this provision as necessary to the service in Florida, and he believed he understood him correctly; but the honorable gentleman now appeals to me in behalf of our bleeding countrymen, our defenceless frontier, our women and children exposed to the relentless tomahawk of savage war. This appeal, sir, would be effectual and well in the proper place, but not after the admissions made by my honorable friend.

The honorable gentleman complains that I attack all the recommendations of the Committee on Military Affairs. In this, sir, he does me injustice. I do not condemn indiscriminately. Some, yes, many, of the recommendations of that committee have received, and will receive, my warmest support; others I cannot approve. I am obliged to scrutinize the recommendations of the honorable gentleman with some care, because I know that he possesses so much of the milk of human kindness in his "gentle nature," that it is hardly possible for him to resist the personal importunities of his friends, to which he is constantly exposed, and which impel him onward, unconsciously, forgetting for the moment, under the impulses of his generous feeling, the rights and interests of those masses of our fellow-men scattered over the surface of our wide country, alternately submitting to and contending with the curse of Heaven, which dooms them to till the ground for their daily food. I wish only to remind my honorable friend that all the revenues which Governments receive are obtained either directly or indirectly from the labors of this class, and that this consideration should never be lost sight of, while we are acting as their representatives.

Again, my honorable friend supposes that I am ungenerous with a high and honorable officer stationed here. I have not intended to be so, sir; but I must tell the honorable member that I do believe that these officers prefer to make campaigns to Washington, in preference to our exposed and defenceless frontier, which he brings to our view in such eloquent and feeling language. At all events they find it in the course of duty to be here, either in station or in proper discharge of duty. Their wants are not limited by the scale of civil life. But I shall have another and more appropriate occasion to comment upon the items of their allowances. Many of them now have both hands in your Treasury at once, while one at a time, in my opinion, would suffice, in these "piping times of peace," for any ordinary cupidity. I am confident that, if my honorable friend had investigated this question upon both sides, he would have come to a different result. There are, sir, I perceive, fifty-three military posts, besides thirteen arsenals, belonging to the United States; less than five for each paymaster. With the facilities now afforded for travelling, I am a little surprised that the worthy officer at the head of the pay department should have made himself believe that this provision was in any manner necessary.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said, so far from this being a temporary appropriation bill, it was no appropriation at all; for it merely provided permanent regulations for the payment of militia in the service of the United States, whenever they were called out; and the amendment could be as well added to this bill as to any other. With regard to the expense, he believed a larger sum of money would be disbursed without the appointment of these additional paymasters than their salaries would amount to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was convinced that the proposed addition to the army ought not to be made. He was not disposed, like his honorable colleague, [Mr. JOHNSON,] to take the mere assertion of any head of a bureau as his authority, unless that officer at the same time furnished all the facts and data upon which his assertion was based, and then Mr. U. would form his own judgment. There were now fourteen paymasters, and each of them had no more than eight or nine stations to attend to; which, with the great facilities for travelling, were surely not more than they could do. He was satisfied the requisition ought not to be complied with, and he hoped the amendment of the Senate would not be concurred in.

Mr. PARKER remarked that the provisions of this amendment had been before the House for the last two years, and the only reason they had never been acted on and passed was because the House, from the load of business before it, had never reached them. Mr. P. was disposed to take the evidence of an officer of the Government, whose high character and official qualifications were unquestionable, and his integrity unimpeached, and any measure recommended by such a man should have with him its due weight. Mr. P. then read some extracts from the report of the Military Committee of the last Congress, recommending the appointment of three additional paymasters, and expressed a hope that the amendment would be concurred in.

Mr. CAMBRELENG could not vote for this proposition in its present shape, even if he was in favor of the object; for he objected to the principle of adding such riders to bills, or rather bills upon bills, which had no connexion with each other. The gentleman from Kentucky had told them that the proposition had no reference to the campaign in Florida, and had objected to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee on that very ground. Mr. C. had no more idea that a measure which, if separately taken up, would occupy a week's discussion, would have come before the House that day, than that a proposition to double the army would have been introduced. Had he thought this measure would have been discussed, he never would have consented to waive the special order on the appropriation bills, nor would the House have gone into committee with such unanimity.

Mr. DUNLAP also complained of the manner in which this proposition had been appended to an extraordinary appropriation bill, thereby compelling the House to adopt it, or to jeopardize the bill. He warmly opposed the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY thought, if a measure that was right in itself could be brought in, it mattered little in what bill it was introduced, or in what place it was found. This was a matter that could as well be passed in this present bill as any where else. It was well known that the duties of this branch of the service had greatly increased, and every necessary data had been furnished by the paymaster general, whose report to the present Congress Mr. A. read.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON opposed the amendment, on the ground of the principle of introducing such a measure in a bill having no necessary connexion with it; and for this reason, if his own proposition was disagreed to, he should be compelled to vote against the whole bill. He could not bring himself to believe that the additional force was necessary, for he thought it did not require seventeen paymasters to pay some six or seven thousand men.

Mr. FRENCH was in favor of the amendment; on the ground of the great increase of duties, and the immense extent of territory over which the duties of the paymasters extended, and the time required (three months) to make the payments.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, for he was satisfied that fourteen paymasters were quite enough to pay five thousand men; but if an addition was asked, he should like to see the reasons for the requisition. The great objection, however, to the amendment was, that it did not belong to the bill. It was an attempt to "smuggle" in a permanent law in a temporary appropriation bill, and was entailing an additional charge upon the people. He strongly condemned the mode by which it was introduced, as it would be the means of compelling members who disagreed to the amendment to vote, against their wishes and intention, against the whole bill. He yet hoped, however, that in the House the amendment would not be concurred in, although a small vote in its favor had been taken in the committee. Mr. A. called the attention of the House to former precedents in tacking on new matters to appropriation bills, particularly one with reference to sending a minister to Great Britain. In the item of a general appropriation bill providing for the salary of a minister to that country, the Senate introduced a provision, that if he was appointed during the recess, he should not be paid unless his nomination was ratified by the Senate, which was a direct violation of the law and the constitution. Mr. A. entered into the history of the proceedings on this case at some length, by way of illustration to the present, which he contended, to a certain extent, was precisely on the same ground, because it gave the Senate the power to frustrate the legislation of the House.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON contended there was no incongruity in the introduction of this proposition in the present bill, for it was necessarily identified with the military regulations of the Government.

Mr. J. supported the amendment at some length, and denied that there had been any smuggling in the case. There was General Towson's report, the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the bill the latter had reported, all before the House. Mr. J. passed a high eulogy on the present postmaster general.

Mr. MANN, of New York, again opposed the amendment. The gentleman from Kentucky had himself distinctly stated that the first amendment of the Senate, making the provision for the appointment of additional postmasters, was not made with reference to the present situation of affairs in Florida; and it was no argument with Mr. M. that the head of a bureau required it, whatever might be his character for honor and integrity.

Mr. LANE said a few words in reply.

The amendment of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON was then agreed to without a count.

Mr. MCKAY said a few words in explanation of the amendment, which was merely to change the tenure of office to one year.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then non-concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, then moved a reconsideration of the vote of the committee concurring in the first amendment of the Senate, providing for the appointment of three additional postmasters; which was agreed to, and the amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

A further amendment, providing for the appointment and pay of the clerks, was then non-concurred in, and that part of the title of the bill setting forth the provision for the additional postmasters was then stricken out, and the bill was laid aside.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee took up and considered the bill making further appropriations for the repression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

The committee then rose, and the two foregoing bills were reported to the House.

The House concurred in the report of the Committee of the Whole on the last bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for the payment of volunteer and militia corps in the service of the United States, agreed to in Committee of the Whole, were concurred in by the House; and the House also concurred with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the other amendments of the Senate.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. JENIFER asked permission of the House to submit a resolution which he felt compelled, in duty to a portion of his constituents, to offer, in consequence of a letter which he had just received from one of the Departments of the Government; the resolution was merely to ask of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to do that which it was competent for, and the duty of, the Post Office Department to have done without the interposition of this House. That the House might understand the reason why he offered the resolution, Mr. J. said he would state that, in obedience to the request of a portion of his constituents, he had made application in person at the Post Office Department to have an alteration made in the time of arrival and departure of the mail at Prince Frederick and St. Leonard's, in Calvert county. That, understanding the Postmaster General was indisposed, he waited on one of the assistant Postmasters General, and stated the wishes of his constituents, with a request that their application should be granted, if consistent with the views and powers of the Department. Mr. J. said he had suggested changes also in another county of his district, which he hoped would be attended to, and understood from the assistant Postmaster General that he desired a written statement of the changes proposed. On that or the following day, Mr. J. said, he addressed to the Department a note, stating the wishes of his constituents, and desiring an answer at as early a period as convenient. A few days after, Mr. J. said, he addressed another note, in respectful and polite terms, to the Department, stating the anxiety of his constituents. This was also unnoticed. Some days after this second note, in conversation with one of his colleagues, he expressed surprise at not hearing in reply, when his colleague mentioned that he, too, had been similarly treated.

Mr. J. said, believing that his constituents, as well as himself, had a right to the respectful consideration of the Department, and learning that the Postmaster General was still sick, he addressed a third note to Mr. Hobbie, respectful in terms, though urging a reply so as to supersede the necessity of moving a resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Mr. J. said, this last note had brought forth the letter which he held in his hand; and, that he might do no injustice to the writer, he would read it for the information of the House.

[Here Mr. J. read a letter from the Post Office Department, dated 9th of March, 1836.]

Mr. J. said it was only to the latter sentence that he desired to call the attention of the House, to wit: "Two of your applications have been disposed of, and communications written respecting them, either yesterday or to-day. As to the third, justice will be done to it in its due order; but self-respect precludes the Department from giving any assurance more specific, after the intimation contained in the conclusion of your note."

S. R. HOBBIIE."

Mr. J. said, upon this subject he had one remark to make, which was, that he had been forewarned, before he came here, that an opponent of the present administration would not be listened to at the Departments, and that one of the strongest objections he had to meet, during the last fall election, was the unprincipled doctrine promulgated, that a friend of the administration could accomplish more for the benefit of his constituents than one who was opposed to it. This doctrine he had combated, and successfully, too, as striking at the integrity of the representative, as well as the liberties of the people; it was for this House to say how far they would connive at and sanction this insolent attempt to carry out this detestable principle, that the constituents of those who are too independent to be bribed into the support of measures inconsistent with their opinions are not to receive justice at the hands of their Government.

Mr. J. said he would move the following resolution, as a duty to his constituents, believing that the committee would not be governed by similar feelings:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of directing an alteration to be made in the transportation of the mail between Prince Frederick and St. Leonard's, in Calvert county, Maryland.

Objections being made, Mr. JENIFER moved to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays, but withdrew the call at the suggestion of several members.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.

The SPEAKER remarked that the first business in order was the report of the Committee of Elections upon the contested election from North Carolina. At the adjournment of the House on yesterday, a gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] had moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling him to submit a resolution; and the question would be on the suspension of the rules for the purpose stated.

Mr. JENIFER called for the reading of the resolution, and the same was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an alteration in the transportation of the mail between Prince Frederick and St. Leonard's, in Calvert county, Maryland.

Mr. TURRILL asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 68, nays 115.

So the motion of Mr. JENIFER was negatived.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON.

Mr. ADAMS, instructed by the Committee on Manufactures, asked the consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That 25,000 copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury relating to the cultivation and manufacture of cotton, with the tabular statement annexed thereto, be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the use of the House.

Objection being made, Mr. ADAMS moved to suspend the rule to enable him to offer his resolution; which was agreed to: Yeas 104, nays 36.

The resolution was then received; and the CHAIR stated that, under the rule, it would lie over one day.

Mr. ADAMS adverted to the importance of the report, it being on a subject interesting to every portion of the country. As the papers were now in the hands of the printer, and if an additional number should be ordered, it should be done at once, he moved to consider the resolution at that time; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to strike out 25,000 and insert 10,000 copies; which was negatived.

Mr. HOWELL called for the reading of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the accompanying documents, but the House negatived the call.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to amend the resolution by striking out 25,000 and inserting 15,000 copies; which was agreed to.

Mr. DUNLAP moved further to amend the resolution by proposing to print 10,000 copies of the report of the select committee of the last session, on the subject of the West Point Academy.

The CHAIR decided this motion out of order.

The resolution of Mr. ADAMS was agreed to, as amended.

KENTUCKY ASYLUM FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

Mr. HARLAN asked the indulgence of the House to permit him to submit a resolution of inquiry. Some years since, said Mr. H., Congress granted to the Kentucky Asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb a township of land, to be located, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in either of the Territories, on lands to which the Indian title had been extinguished. The locations had been made in the Territory of Florida. The time allowed by the act for making sale of the lands thus granted and located was about expiring; but, from causes not necessary to be then mentioned, (but which, he doubted not, when known, would be entirely satisfactory,) more than one fourth of the grant remained unsold. It was the desire of the trustees of that institution that further time be allowed for the sale of the remainder of the grant.

Objections being made to the introduction of the resolution, the rules of the House, on motion of Mr. HARLAN, were suspended, and he submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of granting to the incorporated Kentucky Asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb further time to make sale of the lands granted to said institution by Congress.

Objection being made, Mr. HARLAN moved a suspension of the rule; which was carried, and the resolution was submitted.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, objected to the adoption of the resolution; when it was agreed to.

Mr. JARVIS rose to submit a motion. He was opposed to making fish of one and flesh of another. He voted against suspending the rules in order to enable the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] to submit his resolution. Since that vote, however, the House had indulged several gentlemen in similar motions. He moved, therefore, to reconsider the vote whereby the House had refused to suspend the rules, on the motion of Mr. JENIFER.

The motion was received and laid over.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the motion made by Mr. SPANGLER, to reconsider the vote rejecting the proposition to allow Mr. Newland leave to appear by counsel, in the prosecution of his claim to the seat in the House at present occupied by Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. BOULDIN said it had not been, nor was it then, his design to detain the House more than a very few minutes; and he would not have spoken at all, had it not been to reply to some remarks which fell from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANTHONY] yesterday; which were, that every gentleman who had voted for counsel on that occasion gave a vote to disparage the petitioner. Mr. B. had before voted for counsel, and would again vote for it; but he protested against the idea that that vote was a disparagement of the petitioner. He did not consider it a disparagement of any gentleman to want counsel. He might need counsel himself in some cases; he might need it in relation to the laws of North Carolina, because he had never been under the necessity of examining those laws, and was unprepared to make a decision in relation to them. They had a vast deal of business on hand, besides the contested election, which called for their investigation. That being the case, he thought no gentleman should be unwilling to hear the arguments of any counsel that might be introduced. A gentleman might not be able to argue a legal question, and still he might do ample justice to his constituents. He did not understand that Mr. Jefferson was a great debater; yet he did not think any gentleman would say that he was not able to represent his constituents. Again: Lord Coke says that a man is not so wise in his own matters as in those of other persons. It had been said that they were the counsel for the petitioner, as well as the judges. He would ask gentlemen if they would go into a court of justice, and trust to the judges to be their counsel altogether? Did judges prepare themselves for every case which came before them? He thought not. He thought there was no better way of proceeding in such cases than by hearing the arguments on both sides; they would then be able to decide between them, and decide correctly. He thought that much the best and safest plan; because, when gentlemen became entangled in an argument, they seldom ever gave it up, whether it was right or wrong. They were then better capable, in his opinion, to judge of the case, after hearing each of the parties, setting forth their own pretensions in the best possible light. He did not consider it a disparagement to say that they had not time to make an inquiry into the matter. It was, to be sure, their duty to examine every question which came before them; but there were other questions which called their attention, of more importance to the people generally than the one pending. He did not know whether the petitioning gentleman did or did not want counsel; but if he did, Mr. B. would rather hear a gentleman argue the cause who had made it his particular business to study the laws of North Carolina, than any one else. He did not wish to disparage any one; and he considered it no disparagement to say that the petitioner was not able to argue his cause on the floor. If the sitting member was to ask for counsel, he would grant it to him. But if the House would not allow the petitioner counsel, he would say this much: that he would appropriate as much of his time as he conveniently could to the consideration of his case. These contested elections were supposed to be as much political questions as any others which came before the House, and in which party feelings were as likely to become enlisted as in any others. In such cases, when counsel was admitted, and they heard the argument on both sides, those who sat still and listened to the arguments were much more capable of judging correctly than those who might participate in the debate. He had no doubt but that, by hearing the arguments of men who had made the laws of North Carolina their particular study, gentlemen could come to a satisfactory conclusion, which could scarcely be arrived at in any other way. He was acquainted with the sitting member, but the petitioner was a stranger to him; although, if they looked to party, the petitioner belonged to the party with which he generally voted. Between those two gentlemen he was prepared to judge impartially; and he should like to hear the argument of some one whose business it was to set the matter in a proper light; he would then be able to judge.

Contested Election.

Mr. HUNTSMAN said, if he understood the question aright, it was simply whether the House would reconsider the vote whereby counsel had been rejected. That question had taken up the time of the House day after day, when it might have been encompassed in a nutshell. He therefore moved the previous question.

Mr. PARKER inquired of the Chair what the main question would be.

The CHAIR stated the case substantially as follows: A member from New York, by the unanimous consent of the House, submitted a motion that the petitioner be heard at the bar of the House. An amendment was offered thereto; and upon this amendment a vote was taken, and it was rejected. The question now pending was a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected. The Chair was therefore of opinion that the previous question, if sustained, would cut off the amendment and the motion to reconsider, and bring the House to a direct vote upon the original proposition.

Mr. HUNTSMAN then withdrew his demand for the previous question, and expressed a hope that the question would be taken without further discussion.

Mr. BYNUM said, before he proceeded to submit any further remarks on the subject then before the House, he would move that the orders of the day be suspended, for the purpose of proceeding with action on the North Carolina contested election.

[The SPEAKER said that the time for its discussion had not yet expired, and that the gentleman might proceed to discuss it until the expiration of the hour allotted to that subject.]

Mr. BYNUM said he would then beg the indulgence of the House to submit a few remarks to its consideration, in addition to what he had before said, and in reply to what had fallen from several honorable gentlemen who had opposed the amendment which he had the honor to propose to the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

He was truly sorry that that amendment had given birth to such a latitudinous and protracted discussion as had grown out of it. He had not expected, when he first submitted the amendment, that it would have met with any serious objection from any quarter of the House, and he regretted to see it coming from the quarters that he did.

The worthy and honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. HARRIS,] he believed, was the first to make war on the amendment that he had offered; and had, he thought, by his opposition, been instrumental in misleading the House in a degree. That gentleman had said that the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York was the customary and ordinary motion that was made on such occasions. In that, however, he would show that the gentleman was totally mistaken. The ordinary motion or resolution on such occasions was exactly the reverse of what the gentleman had stated. Mr. B. said he had not moved his amendment without the consultation of authority or precedent. He had referred to the whole history of contested elections in that House, and there had not been a single case in which counsel had been refused the petitioner, when applied for. The whole number of contested elections that had taken place in it was forty-two, but for the last twelve contested elections counsel had not been asked; but when applied for heretofore, said Mr. B., they had been granted in the following form, and not in that as stated by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky. He would read from the journals of the House, in the case of the contested election from New Jersey, in 1789.

"Mr. Seney moved that Wednesday next be assigned for the parties to appear and be heard by their counsel before the House, of which notice should be given; and that the committee be discharged."

The next case took place in 1792. It was the case from Georgia, of Jackson vs. Wayne, which he found in the following words:

"The 6th of February was assigned by the House for the trial of the cause; but by the agreement of the parties, and on the application of the petitioner, it was postponed to the 27th of February, 1792. On that day it was further continued by the sitting member to the 10th of March, and on which day leave was granted to the sitting member to be heard by his counsel at the bar of the House."

The other case to which he had before referred was from Virginia—the case of Moore vs. Lewis. This was in 1804.

"On the 1st of March, 1804," (says the journal,) "the committee was discharged; and resolved, that the memorialist and the sitting member, if they desire it, be heard by counsel before the bar of the House. Mr. Jones, the counsel of Major Lewis, then spoke in favor of his right to his seat." Since that time, Mr. B. said, a practice had grown up, and had been generally acquiesced in, that had measurably done away with the appearance of counsel vis à voce, but that the petitioners and sitting members had been in the practice of submitting their defence in writing, in the shape of memorials, and had had them printed and laid on the desk of every member of the House. The petitioner could have done so now; but he had been informed by his friends it might be best for him to be heard by counsel, in conformity with the earlier practices of the House.

Mr. B. said, in the Senate of the United States there had been but five contested elections since the organization of the Government.

In 1793 there was a case from Pennsylvania, of Alibert

H. OF R.]

Contested Election.

Gallatin, who was then the elected Senator. He found in the journal of that date, February 20, the following account:

"Mr. Livermore was of opinion that the sitting member should begin the debate, as the onus probandi lay with him. The counsel for the petitioner, Mr. Lewis, rose. Mr. Lewis hoped that he would be permitted to say a few words, in this early stage of the business, in regard to the manner of conducting it," &c.

Of the four other cases that had occurred, no counsel had been in the Senate.

In the case of Lanman, from Connecticut, leave had been granted that he be heard at the bar of the Senate. He appeared, and spoke an hour or more in his own behalf, who, he imagined had been a lawyer of some eminence. In the other cases no motions had been made of the kind, and there had been little contest about them.

Mr. B. said, such had been the invariable usage of the two branches of the American Congress. But, sir, said he, do not let us confine ourselves to our own body; let us not believe that we possess all the wisdom and all the parliamentary learning in the nation; let us not be too much intoxicated with our own importance and self-sufficiency: let us not shut our eyes to the motives and reasons and practices that operate on and influence other parliamentary bodies. Yes, sir, let us not feel our power and forget right, as the Senate of the United States did in 1834.

[Here the Speaker shook his head, as though he was on the eve of calling Mr. B. to order.]

Mr. B. said he would make no allusion to the present Senate; it was to the Senate of 1824. [Mr. Boox said in 1834.] Mr. B. corrected himself, and said in 1834. That Senate, forgetful of all that was right and just, and becoming them as Senators, had presumed to try and condemn the President of the United States by a foul and ignominious charge, and which remained as yet a blot of ineffable hue on the journals of that then frenzied and deluded body; and he would entreat the House to take warning from the example set by that unfortunate body, and not to stain its journal with a resolution or orders that would bring down on the House the denunciations of every unprejudiced freeman in the country. But, sir, said Mr. B., what are the feelings and motives and reasons and actions that govern the conduct of other legislative bodies? He would here refer to what was at that very time going on in an adjoining State.

"On the 7th of March" (he read from a paper that he then held in his hand, purporting to contain a report of the proceedings of the Legislature of Maryland, then in session) "Mr. McLean presented a communication from Samuel Harker, chairman of the committee of one of the branches of the city council of Baltimore, requesting the Legislature to postpone further action upon the report of the joint committee on the memorials of the sufferers by the late Baltimore riots, to afford an opportunity to the corporate authorities of said city to produce and have examined before the committee testimony on their part, and also to be heard by counsel."

Again: "Mr. Pratt submitted an order, which was adopted, directing the Clerk of the House to inform the corporate authorities of Baltimore that Thursday next has been assigned for hearing the counsel for the petitioners praying indemnity; and also to inform them that the joint committee on that subject will be instructed to hear any testimony which may be furnished antecedent to that day, or on the same day examined; and on the same day the counsel on their part will be heard, if they desire it."

Such are the existing feelings and sentiments and practice of an adjoining State, upon the subject of hearing counsel at the bar of their legislative bodies. He believed that the same practice existed, and had prevailed to a certain extent, in almost every other State in the Union, at different times; and he religiously believed that but one feeling and one sentiment existed amongst the people on that subject; there were none who did not think that they had a right to avail themselves of counsel before any tribunal whatever, whenever their rights or interests were assailed; a right which they had not, nor ever would relinquish, while they retained the spirit of freemen.

But, said Mr. B., why should we confine ourselves to this country, when others, less devoted to those sacred rights of freemen, and less regardless of the liberty and freedom of their institutions, have evinced the most unconquerable attachment to this right of being heard, either in person or by counsel. He had taken some pains to recur to the practice of the British House of Commons in contested elections, and had ascertained, by an examination of the journals of that body, and had found there, that it had been the almost invariable practice, since the first days of "magna charta," that counsel had never been denied, even to a British subject. He had found, as far back as 1816, two reports of contested elections, one of a Mr. Man and another of a Mr. Whitelock, in both of which a motion was made for them to be heard by counsel, and there was no report of its having been objected to; the right seemed to have been acquiesced in by universal consent. In fact, he had found scarcely an instance where an application for counsel had been denied in even the Parliament of Great Britain. There had been but one which he had found, and which he would exhibit to the House. It was a case in relation to the election of Sir Robert Walpole, that took place in 1711. The journals of the House of Commons are as follows:

"On the 23d of February, 1711, a petition of the freemen and free burghers of the borough of King's Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, was presented to the House and read, setting forth that Monday, the 11th of February last, being appointed for choosing a member to serve in Parliament for this borough, in the room of Robert Walpole, Esq., expelled the House, Samuel Taylor, Esq., was elected their Burgess; but John Baggs, present mayor of the said borough, refused to return the said Samuel Taylor, though required so to do, and returned the said Robert Walpole, though expelled this House, and then a prisoner in the Tower; and praying the consideration of the House.

"March 6. The order of the day being read, of taking into consideration the merits of the petition of the freemen and free burghers of King's Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, and motion being made that counsel be called in, upon a division, it was resolved in the negative."

Such was the report of the contested election referred to; and perhaps the proceedings of no body had ever proved more fatal and disastrous to its authors than did these proceedings prove to the authors of that Parliament. What, sir, had been its consequence? Sir Robert Walpole had been re-elected in the very teeth of the party that had refused him counsel, and expelled him from Parliament; and the contest finally terminated in the revolution of the criminal Parliament, and an entire overthrow of the party that were sustaining measures so flagrant and incompatible with every principle of justice and liberty; and the object of their vengeance was soon placed at the very head of his persecutors. By such a system of persecution and injustice was it that Sir Robert Walpole had been made the Prime Minister of Great Britain, to the total overthrow and discomfiture of his enemies. That House should be aware, he thought, how it left an order on its journals, at that time, that should require and justify a process of expunging and purifying its records. There was a striking case of that kind, that was held up as a beacon to all posterity. It was the case of the celebrated John Wilkes, that occurred in the British Parliament on the 17th of February, 1769. In that year it was that the House of Commons of Great Britain, after passing many orders and resolutions, negative of the freedom and incontestable rights of the subjects of Great Britain, did pass a resolution, not only of expulsion of the victim of their resentment, but declaring him incapable of being elected to serve as a member in that Parliament. Here the Parliament had taken upon itself to investigate the qualifications and character of one of its members, which had been acquired before his election. And his honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENELL] had made a strong intimation that this House should also take into consideration the qualifications or competence of the petitioner. For, said the gentleman, (if he understood him rightly,) this House was interested in the decision of this question; it was not alone the people of the district of the contesting member that were interested. He was to become a member of Congress of the whole nation, and the whole people of the country were to be affected by his acceptance or rejection from the floor of Congress. Sir, said Mr. B., do not such declarations involve the right of this House to pass on the qualifications and competence of the contesting member and petitioner? He thought the inference irresistible, and which would place the House precisely in the condition of that Parliament, to which he had referred, which had presumed to decide on the qualification and incompetence of one of its members to take a seat in its body. That was a question with which this House had nothing to do. Sir, he said, I will read you the opinion of one of the ablest and most distinguished men that England has ever produced, on that subject, and in relation to the character and body of that Parliament. He hoped the House would pardon him, while he dwelt for some moments on this subject, as he conceived it had a striking analogy to the case then before them, as well as a strong resemblance to the proceedings of a certain other body, which it might not be deemed proper for him there to mention.

Sir, said Mr. B., in a speech made in support of the following motion submitted to the House of Lords, in 1771, by the Duke of Richmond, "that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, most dutifully and earnestly beseeching his Majesty that, under the late violations of the rights of electors of Great Britain, in the election for Middlesex, still undressed, and in the present conflict which has so unhappily arisen between the claims of privilege of the House of Commons on one side, and those of magistracy on the other, his Majesty will, in his paternal wisdom, deign to open the way to compose this alarming warfare; and that, in order to prevent the said House and nation from being involved in interperate discussions of undefined powers, which in the extreme may endanger the constitution, and tend to shake the tranquillity of the kingdom, his Majesty will be graciously pleased to recur to the recent sense of his people, by dissolving, after the end of this session, the present Parliament, and calling, with convenient despatch, a new Parliament." Chatham, in denouncing the arbitrary conduct of that most slavish and unprincipled Parliament, in relation to their unwarrantable act in refusing to hear by counsel or otherwise the individuals whose claims they had passed on, in his clear, forcible, and drastic style, is represented as having used towards them the following bold, elegant, and cutting language. The extract from his speech was in these words: "The depraved system of Government, which had in a few years reduced it from a most flourishing to a most miserable condition. He warmly defended the magistrates in the conscientious discharge of their duty; that the House, in committing them to prison, without hearing their defence, upon the points of privilege, had been guilty of a gross and palpable act of tyranny; that they had heard the prostituted electors of Shoreham, in defence of an agreement to sell a borough by auction, and had refused to hear the Lord Mayor of London in defence of the laws of England; that their expunging by mere force the entry of the recognizance was the act of a mob, not of a Parliament; that it was solely to the measures of the Government, equally violent and absurd, that Mr. Wilkes owed all his importance; that the King's ministers, supported by the slavish concurrence of the House of Commons, had at once made him a person of the greatest consequence in the kingdom; that they, in effect, had made him an alderman of London, and representative of the county of Middlesex; and now, it seems, they intend to make him sheriff, and, in due course, Lord Mayor of London; the proceeding of the House of Commons in regard to that gentleman made the very name of Parliament ridiculous; that to save the name and institution of Parliaments from contempt, this House of Commons must be dissolved."

Sir, such is the description given of that parliamentary body, by the first man of his age, in imitation to the proceedings of which is the refusal of hearing the petitioner by counsel, at the bar of this House; and such is the language of a noble and patriotic Englishman, denunciative of the course of that body, who undertook to decide on the qualification and competence of a member of the English Parliament, as the gentleman from Massachusetts had intimated that we should do on this occasion. Such was the opinion of that great and illustrious man of that Parliament that had refused to hear counsel in the defence of even a subject of Great Britain; but to show that House in what light the whole nation of Great Britain viewed this conduct of their Parliament towards one of its subjects, the people again returned the member that the Parliament had expelled; and in the year 1782, Mr. Wilkes, after several unsuccessful attempts, again brought forward his motion to expunge from their journals the disgraceful proceeding that had been enacted by the former Parliament.

Mr. Wilkes, after having been interrupted by the Usher of the Black Rod, in bringing forward his motion, is represented again to have addressed the House as follows:

"I return my thanks to the Black Rod, for so luckily interposing in favor of this House, when I might possibly have again tired them with the important, however stale, case of the Middlesex election, which their patient ear has, for several years, with much good nature, suffered. I will now make some return to their indulgence, in profiting by the circumstance of this happy interruption, and not saying a word about, &c. I will not detain the House longer than by observing the parliamentary form of desiring the Clerk to read the resolution of the 17th of February, 1769;" which having been complied with, he then moved that the entry of the resolution of the 17th of February, 1769, "that John Wilkes, Esq., having been in this session of Parliament expelled this House, was, and is, incapable of being elected a member to serve in the present Parliament, might be expunged from their journals, it being subversive of the rights of the whole body of the electors of this kingdom." This motion was, after some opposition from the late Mr. Fox, then Secretary of State, and from the late Lord Melville, then Lord Advocate for Scotland, the former of whom had strenuously supported the whole of the resolutions passed by the House of Commons, in respect to the Middlesex election, carried, on a division, 185 to 47. Mr. Wilkes, as soon as the question was disposed of, moved "that the declarations, orders, and resolutions of the House, respecting his election for the county of Middlesex, as a void election, the due and legal election of Mr. Luttrell into Parliament, for the said county, and his own incapacity to be elected a member to serve in the said Parliament, be expunged;" which motion was, for the reason above given, "carried, without a division."

Thus terminated, said Mr. B., one of the most extraordinary transactions of modern date. Not only the condemnatory resolution of Mr. Wilkes, but every "declaration, order, and resolution," respecting it, were effaced from the journals of the House of Commons, by a vote without a division. Yes, sir, this is the true history of the proceedings of a legislative body that had refused to hear a subject of Great Britain, in defence of their rights, at which the spirit of Englishmen revolted; and how can we expect it to be tolerated in free America? It was against such arbitrary acts that the whole nation of Great Britain was aroused as one man, and never slept nor abated until the foul stain upon the records of her history was wiped clean.

For the act which we are now about to commit, then, in derogation of the rights of one of our citizens, we have no precedent, either in Great Britain or America; and let no man, who, by his vote, sanctions this act, speak in future in disapprobation of that highhanded measure that has so recently taken place in another body, to the disgrace of this nation, and in derogation of the most sacred rights of this House. He most sincerely believed the act that the House was about to commit was equally repugnant to the rights of the citizens, and incompatible with the spirit and genius of the constitution of our country, as that recently committed by another body. He could not perceive how any man could reconcile it to himself to advocate the one and oppose the other.

The precedents that he had referred to, both in England and America, were in favor of the greatest latitude being given to the hearing of the prayers of petitioners, without objections to hearing counsel, with but two exceptions, which occurred in the British Parliament, and which afterwards met, as he had shown, with the signal disapprobation of the English nation. As to the practice, then, of this body, the Senate, the English Parliament, and the different Legislatures of the States, the whole weight of precedents was in favor of granting counsel to the petitioner, as he had asked.

Mr. B. said, having gotten through with the references to the long-standing practices of almost every legislative body on the subject, he would then call the attention of the House to some of the grounds taken, and arguments assumed, by different gentlemen who had stepped forward to oppose the right which the petitioner had to be heard at the bar of the House by counsel, and could but confess that he had not been a little astonished at the opposition that had been made to what he conceived to be so reasonable an application, coming, as part of it had, from a quarter that it did. He was not at all surprised at the opposition that had been made to it by the two honorable members from Massachusetts, the one on his left [Mr. REED] and the other on the right [Mr. GREENELL.] From what he had seen, and heard of elsewhere, the freedom of speech and the rights of the citizen had but little to expect from that quarter; it was not a source from which he had been taught to expect much favor of the rights and privileges of the commonality of the freemen of this country. He had not, therefore, been at all surprised, he repeated it, at the opposition from that quarter, to the extension or security of the rights and privileges of the hardy yeomanry of this country.

The first gentleman from Massachusetts, who had addressed the House in opposition to the amendment, [Mr. REED,] had stated that it would be an unnecessary consumption of the time of the House to hear counsel. Mr. B. doubted very much if the time of the House would not be greatly saved by the hearing of the counsel of the parties and then acting on it, without the House mingling in the debate itself. The members, by becoming advocates of the different parties, might imbibe, imperceptibly, he thought, feelings and interests that arose by the excitement of the discussion, which rendered them often, in his judgment, incompetent judges of the matters and facts submitted to their consideration. The same gentleman had said that there were lawyers enough in the House to do the parties justice. So he thought; but did that gentleman think that, amidst the multiplicity of business in that House, each lawyer was going to take the pains to con over the various statute laws of the State from which the election was contested, to prepare himself, not only to decide for himself, according to the requisitions of the several statutes, but to enable himself to convince others, and to bring the House to a just decision on the same subject? Such a presumption he thought fallacious in the extreme; the fact, however possible, to him appeared most improbable, that each member should so inform himself.

Another gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENELL] had said that if it had been a case in which the interest of a private individual alone was concerned, it might, under certain circumstances, be proper to grant counsel. In this the honorable member from Pennsylvania had also concurred; and much, too, to his astonishment, as that gentleman came from a quarter of the country where the highest regard was professed for the sacred rights of an American citizen. The sternness of the democracy of that State was proverbial, and their devotion to the untrammelled rights of freemen. Sir, upon that position, I take issue with both the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GREENELL,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ANTHONY.] I contend that, where the applicant has charge, not only of his own interest, but of the interest of many thousands, the increased magnitude of the subject justifies the granting the privilege to be heard by counsel by reasons far more cogent than it would in a case of a private claim, as contended for by the two honorable gentlemen. It, he said, arose out of the very nature of things.

The petitioner might feel perfectly disposed to hazard his own claims, on his own private efforts; but he should certainly be more diffident in perilling the claims and interests of forty-seven thousand four hundred souls upon efforts in which he was himself conscious of his own deficiency. It did appear to him, therefore, that the reasons were infinitely more forcible in favor of granting the privilege to be heard by counsel in the latter than in the former case, and that it was due from the House to grant it: he could by no process of reason that he was master of bring himself otherwise to believe. He had listened, with some patience, to hear what could possibly be advanced in opposition to a practice that had existed so long, and that had never before been denied to any free citizen of the republic; but he had listened in vain; for not an argument had been advanced that could possibly have the least weight with the most superficial understanding. The difference that gentlemen had attempted to make between a private grievance and a public one was only the difference between "tweedle dee and tweedle dum;" and was only calculated to quiet their own minds for the commission of an act of injustice hitherto unprecedented in the annals of this body.

But what, to him, appeared still more extraordinary, if any thing could possibly be so, was the unofficial, disinterested declaration, no doubt, of the honorable gentleman from New York who represented the minority of the committee who were opposed to the petioner, and who had, on every occasion, shown an uncompromising hostility to his claims. That gentleman had been kind enough to offer the petitioner his aid on that floor, and, with the honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] thought the petitioner would be safe in committing his interest in their hands. He believed the two gentlemen from Massachusetts [Messrs. REED and GREENELL] had, in substance, said the same; all of whom most violently opposed the claims of the petitioner; but they would see that his rights should be protected; that he should not want for the aid of counsel. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) is not this monstrous? Would it not be such care as the lion would extend to the lamb? They take into their hands the protection of the rights of a political adversary; they are to see that justice is to be done the petitioner. Do they believe that the petitioner is so much of a child as to place his reliance on such support and protection? Surely these gentlemen underrate much the good sense not only of the petitioner, but of others, when they thus speak.

Mr. B. said that he most cordially agreed with the sentiments expressed the other day by his honorable colleague, [Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD,] that he felt deeply mortified that it was a citizen of North Carolina that was to be made the first victim of the arbitrary act of this House; he could say that he was not only mortified to witness the illiberality and injustice done to one of the citizens of a State which he had the honor to represent in part on that floor, but that he felt indignant at it, and thought every member from that State should resent it in the most prompt and determined manner. He viewed it as an insult to the State, and as a violation of one of the most sacred rights of her citizens, against which every man of spirit and resentment should protest in the most solemn manner.

Mr. B. said it was not so much the violation of the right of the petitioner alone, against which he had contended, and which he thought of such magnitude to the country at large, but it was against the principle, and the adoption of such a precedent in that House, that might be quoted in future time to justify the most crying injustice towards an American citizen; but for that, he would not turn on his heels for the adoption of the amendment that he had had the honor to propose; but he did believe that it involved a great principle, directly at war with the spirit and genius of constitutional liberty. The right of being heard freely was coeval with the right of trial under the law and the constitution, and this House should be the last place to abridge that right. The freedom of speech was a right that he believed was secured and held sacred under our constitutional Government, and the denial to hear by counsel was, to him, an unquestionable abridgement of that freedom, as a case might occur where one could not speak for himself.

He was sorry that so much time had been consumed in the discussion of a mere preliminary question. Had it not involved considerations which, to his mind, appeared of the greatest importance, he would have contented himself by giving a mere silent vote. He was in hopes, however, that the House would see the injustice about to be inflicted on the petitioner, not only by the refusal of counsel to him, but by the procrastination of a decision of this subject. The citizens of that district were anxiously looking to the termination of this contest; and he thought it due to them, from the House, to put as speedy an end to it as practicable.*

* The act of George III, that regulates the mode of settling elections in the British House of Commons, to which allusions had been made in the discussion of this question, and which guarantees the right of the British subject to be heard by counsel, is in the following words, as contained in the 13th section, cap. 52:

Mr. HARD commenced some remarks on the subject; but before he concluded, the hour having expired,

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the orders of the day.

Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the question; which motion was rejected by a vote of 104 to 53; not two thirds.

The House next proceeded to the consideration of private bills, as the order of the day for Friday.

Several bills from the Senate were then read and referred.

NATHANIEL P. TATUM.

The motion to reconsider the vote by which the House passed the bill for the relief of Nathaniel P. Tatum was taken up, and, after some remarks from Messrs. UNDERWOOD, WHITTLESEY, and MANN of New York, was rejected, and the bill was passed.

[It was urged, in favor of this motion to reconsider, that the person named had failed to fulfil a contract for the delivery of timber in a given time, and that the ten per cent. reserved to ensure compliance, as it had not been granted by the Government agents, ought not to be granted by bill; because this was a case of neglect, and not of accident or providential prevention; and because, if the bill passed, every negligent contractor would come to Congress in the same way.

It was replied, that the contract had been nearly fulfilled within the prescribed time; but that thirteen sticks of the timber had been rejected by the navy agent, as of insufficient size. Upon application, the Navy Commis-

"And be it also enacted, That if, within one hour after the time fixed, in pursuance of the above-recited acts and of this act, for calling in the respective parties, their counsels or agents, for the purpose of proceeding to the appointment of a select committee, the petitioner or petitioners, or some one or more of them, who shall have signed any such petition, shall not appear by himself or themselves, or by his or their counsel or agent, the order for taking such petition into consideration shall thereupon be discharged, and such petition shall not be any further proceeded upon, in the manner directed in the above-recited act and in this act."

As late as the year 1818, January 28th, may be found the entry on the journals of the House of Commons of Great Britain, John Luthill, Esq., of the county and city of Limerick, vs. John Pendergrass:

"Memorandum in pursuance of the several acts made for the regulating the trials of controverted elections, or returns of members to serve in Parliament. The like notices, as in former cases, were sent to the parties, with orders for their attendance by themselves, their counsels, or agents, at the time on which the said petition was ordered to be taken into consideration."

The same practice has prevailed uniformly in relation to other petitions of a private nature. In the House of Commons, on the 19th of February, 1818, in the same Parliament, is to be found the following entry: "A petition of several persons, owners and occupiers of land in the parish of Moltram Longdendale, in the county of Chester:

"Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee on the bill, and that the petitioners be heard by themselves, their counsels, or agents, upon their petition, if they think fit."

On the 28th of February, 1818, "Two petitions of the right honorable Nathaniel Curzon, Lord Searsdale, and of several persons whose names are thereunto subscribed, were presented and read; and said petitions were ordered to be referred to the committee on the bill, and the petitioners are to be heard by their counsel or agents, upon their petitions, if they think fit."

sioners authorized the agent to purchase at a reduced price, and subsequently the deficiency was made up without any loss to the Government. It was further remarked, that if this contractor had fulfilled within twenty per cent., he stood in an extraordinarily favorable position for the Government often lost sixty per cent. upon contracts; and, in an average of contracts, forty per cent. ought willingly to be allowed for cheatage.]

ALFORD AND BRUSH.

The joint resolution for the relief of Benedict Alford was next taken up. The question pending was a motion to amend, by adding a provision for the benefit of Robert Brush.

[It appeared that this bill passed Congress at its last session, and was approved by the President; but subsequently the Secretary of War discovered that the bill had not received the action of the Senate. The President, upon being informed of this fact, returned the bill to the Senate, by a special message, which, with the bill, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who made no report upon the subject. It appeared that the bill had duly passed the Senate, and that the signature and authentication of the presiding officer were duly affixed; but the journal contained no record showing that the action of the Senate had passed the bill. It was contended, on one side, that the law was complete and fully attested, by all the forms required by the constitution; that it was a law which the President and all others were bound to obey and execute, and that it was wrong to go behind the proper evidence to examine the record.

On the other-hand, it was urged, that the record of the Senate was the only evidence that the constitutional forms of passing the bill had been observed by that body; and that, when the President ascertained that such evidence was wanting, he acted rightly in refusing to execute the law. In short, it was said by some that the bill had become a law at the last session, and it ought not to be passed again, but ought to be executed; and by others, that there was no true constitutional evidence that the action of the Senate had made it a law, and, therefore, it could not properly be executed as such.]

Mr. WARDWELL moved to commit the resolution to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BROWN suggested the propriety of referring the resolution to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

A debate ensued, in which Messrs. WARDWELL, BROWN, LAY, J. Y. MASON, and WHITTLESEY, took part.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that the case presented for consideration by the resolutions was one novel in its character, and concerning which he was desirous to submit a few remarks. It seems that the Speaker of this House, and the presiding officer of the Senate, had regularly affixed their signatures to an enrolled bill or act; that the same was presented to the President of the United States, who, on the 30th day of June, 1834, approved and signed it; and that the bill or act thus authenticated was filed and recorded in the office of the Secretary of State. This act provides for the payment of pensions to Benedict Alford and Robert Brush, and has been duly published among the acts of the first session of the 23d Congress. But the Secretary of War has refused to execute it, upon the ground that the Senate of the United States did not pass the bill. The journal of the Senate states that the bill was indefinitely postponed.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it was the duty of the Secretary to execute the act. I think he was bound to regard it as a part of the laws of the land, and, as such, to respect and obey it. He, no doubt, equally conscientious, (for certainly there is here no cause for imputing to him a bad motive,) believes that he has authority to look beyond the act as enrolled, signed, approved, filed, and recorded in the office of State, into the journals of the two Houses, and to decide, upon what he may there find, that the act in question is null and void; because those journals, or one of them, satisfies his mind that the act was never passed according to the requirements of the constitution.

I ask, sir, where does the Secretary of War, a mere executive officer, find his authority for overhauling the journals of the two Houses, the enrolled bill as signed by the presiding officers, as approved by the President, and as recorded in the State Department, and, upon his examination, in effect to declare void a statute, published to the nation, and sanctioned by all the solemnities prescribed for manifesting to the people the laws they are to obey? Such authority has not been conferred by any express provision of the constitution, or by any statute; and, if it exists, it is the creature of inference, a deduction merely from the known and admitted principles and provisions of the constitution and laws. From what part of the constitution, from what statute, will you deduce such authority for an executive officer?

The 5th section of the 1st article of the constitution requires "each House to keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time to publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy." I admit the obligation on the part of Congress to comply with this mandate; but suppose it is not done, will it follow as a consequence from such omission, that executive officers are thereby justified in refusing to obey the statutes which are promulgated? Can they legitimately refuse obedience, because they do not see all the steps taken by each House in the passage of the bill set out at length in a published journal? If it had been the intention of the convention to make the obligatory force of a statute depend upon the publication of the journal, and upon exhibiting on the face of the journal, as published, a fulfilment of every constitutional requisite or injunction, such intention, most certainly, would have been expressed in clear and explicit language. The convention would not have left a matter of such importance to rest entirely upon inference. The fact that there is no express constitutional provision making the validity of an act of Congress depend upon the journals of the two Houses and their contents, is to my mind conclusive, and proves that the journals and statutes are not so connected as to make an examination of the journals necessary, in order to decide upon the obligatory force of the statute. This truth is also manifest from the express language of the constitution. The journals are to be published "from time to time." How often, at what intervals? Here is discretion granted. Congress may publish them annually, biennially, or monthly. If the obligation of a statute depended upon the contents of the journals, their publication should precede, or at least accompany, the promulgation of the statute, so that the citizens and officers of Government might be furnished with means of determining whether the statute imposed any obligation. Congress may suppress the publication of the journals. The constitution expressly confers authority to do so, in regard to so much as may, in the judgment of Congress, "require secrecy." In the exercise of their judgment, Congress might think all their proceedings in reference to this or that subject required secrecy. They might give to the nation the result of their deliberations in the form of a statute, and withhold a knowledge of every previous step. In such a case, it would be preposterous to resist the obligation of the statute, because the public could not see that the steps taken by Congress in its passage were regular and constitutional.

I have submitted these remarks for the purpose of maintaining the position, that the nation is not to determine what is or is not law, by an examination of the journals of the two Houses. I will endeavor to show, in the sequel, that the validity of a statute cannot be overturned and nullified by arraying the contents of the journals against it.

All civilized nations must necessarily provide some mode of making known the laws which are to be enforced. They must also provide some mode by which their officers and their citizens can produce the law, and justify their conduct under it, whenever and wherever their conduct may be questioned before the judicial tribunals of the country. This may be done in various ways. In Governments like ours, based upon written constitutions, paramount to ordinary legislation, the mode may be prescribed in the constitution itself; and, if so, then it is placed beyond the control of the Legislature. The constitution of the United States does not purport to regulate and fix the precise mode by which the laws are to be made known and authenticated, and yet it is not altogether silent on the subject. So far as it does speak, it is to be regarded; but where it makes no provision, the subject is left under the control of ordinary legislation. It may be safely affirmed, that the constitution nowhere provides that an extract from the journal, or the production of the original, shall be evidence of what the law is. It is very clear that, unless the journals contain the provisions of a statute, their production would give no light on the question of what is or is not law. The journals purport, and do give a history of the action of Congress upon certain bills, by their titles, and are legitimate but not conclusive evidence to show these bills were passed, or rejected, or postponed by Congress. But such a history affords no information as to the contents of the bill passed or rejected; and when you desire to know what the law is, for example: if you wish to know how much tax has been imposed, and upon what articles levied, you must look elsewhere than in the journal to find it. The constitution might have required that every statute should be registered at large upon the journals, and that copies therefrom, certified by the Clerk of either House, should be evidence of what the law is. But it has made no such provision, and, in the absence of all constitutional regulation, it was competent for Congress to take up the subject, and to fix the mode of making known and authenticating the laws of the country. Congress has done this, and it becomes important to consider, for a moment, how it has been done. It was done by one of the earliest acts of Congress, under the constitution. The act was approved on the 15th of September, 1780, and may be regarded as the cotemporaneous exposition of the constitution, so far as to show that that instrument did not prohibit Congress from acting upon the subject, and that the constitution, as then understood, did not contain such provisions as rendered legislation unnecessary.

The act of 1789, in substance, provides that the Secretary of State shall preserve the original bills, resolutions, &c., and cause the same to be recorded in his office. The Secretary of State is required, "as soon as conveniently may be" after he receives the bills and resolutions, to cause the same to be published in newspapers, and to cause one printed copy to be delivered to each Senator and Representative, "and two printed copies, duly authenticated, to be sent to the Executive authority of each State." Here is the mode prescribed for publishing your laws; and here, sir, is the place where you are to find what the law is. The act provides for making up a record of the laws in the Secretary's office, and then it provides for a seal, and then declares "that all copies of records and papers in the said office, authenticated under the said seal, shall be evidence equally as the original record or paper." Now, the true question is, when the record is made up in the State Department, in pursuance of the act of 1789, can you impeach its absolute verity, by opposing to it the journals of either or both Houses of Congress? and, if this can be done, what tribunal is authorized to do it? Is the Secretary of War authorized to sit in judgment?

I contend that the judicial tribunals of the nation (and it is their province to settle what is and is not law) ought not, and would not, permit an authentic transcript, under the seal of the Secretary of State, to be impeached, by bringing it in conflict with the journals. How are you to make up the issue? Is it one of fact, to be tried by a jury; or is it purely a question of law, to be settled by the court? Certainly it is a question of law, to be tried by the court. And how tried? I have never heard of any other way in which to try such a question, but upon the face of the record. I know, sir, that the laws of a foreign State may be proved as matters of fact. But the laws of this nation are not to be proved in that manner. Our judges are judicially bound to notice them; and when, and how, are they to be informed? Must they not take the record, as certified under the seal of State, as conclusive? Or shall they reject it, because they may find in the journals of Congress something to induce a suspicion or conviction that the record in the office of State was erroneously made up? They could not regard the journal, because neither the constitution nor any act of Congress provides how it shall be authenticated. The Clerks who keep the journals have no seals of office under which to verify transcripts from them, and there is no act of Congress making such transcripts evidence. In this state of things, the Judiciary would be bound to decide the law upon the evidence furnished in pursuance of the act of 1789. Can the Secretary of War go beyond the Judiciary? Can he, in conjunction with the Clerk of either House, or alone, bring the journal in conflict with the record of the State Department? To ask the question is enough.

The constitution provides that all revenue bills shall originate in this House. Suppose a revenue bill is duly signed by the Speaker and President of the Senate, approved by the President of the United States, and recorded in the State Department, will the marshal, or collector of the tax, be justified in refusing to obey it, if he can find an entry on the journal of the Senate, that the bill originated there? Or if he should see such an entry, ought he not rather to say, the Clerk has made it through mistake; Senators are presumed to be acquainted with their constitutional powers, and it cannot be believed that any Senator, or committee of the Senate, would have introduced such a bill, or that the Senate would have entertained or considered it? In such a case the presumption is much stronger that the Clerk has, through mistake, made the journal speak an improper language, than that the Senate has violated the constitution, by originating a bill they had no power to originate.

Again: The treaty-making power is vested by the constitution in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Suppose a treaty is made with a foreign nation, and published by proclamation for the information of the people, in the usual and legal form, may every one refuse to obey, because they do not find in the journal of the Senate some evidence of the advice and consent of that body? Suppose it should be found, from the published journal of this House, that we, instead of the Senate, had advised and consented to the treaty; and from the journal of the Senate, that a bill to raise a certain revenue, made necessary by the provisions of the treaty, originated there, instead of here, would both treaty and law be void, because of the ridiculous appearance of these things upon the journals? No, sir. Both the treaty and law should be enforced, and you should attribute the ridiculous appearance of the journals to a mistake of the printer, or Clerk, rather than indulge the idea that each House had transcended its constitutional powers, and that the President had been deluded by their presiding officers.

It may be said that the contents of the published journal ought not to be relied on, without calling on the Clerks of the two Houses to state whether they correspond with the original manuscript. Who has authority to call the Clerks of either House before him to testify, or to produce the original manuscript journal for comparison. Who is to administer an oath to the Clerk, so that his statements shall be made under the usual solemnities imposed on witnesses? Could you convict him of perjury, if he produced as the original journal, and stated it to be such, that which was not the journal? Could you punish him for failing to attend before the Secretary of War, or any other executive officer, with the journal? Can the Secretary issue a subpoena duces tecum, and inflict the penalties for a contempt, in case it is disobeyed? I ask these questions, sir, for the purpose of exciting the minds of members to investigation. If they will endeavor to answer them, I am satisfied each one will convince himself that it is impracticable to ascertain from the journals what is or is not law.

I will briefly state the contents of the act of 1789, in connexion with the constitution and rules of the two Houses of Congress, for the purpose of exhibiting the mode adopted for the promulgation of our laws, and the guards which have been provided to prevent mistakes. The constitution requires that "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and Senate, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States." The constitution does not say by whom or what officer it shall be presented. It does not precisely declare how the President shall be informed of the passage of bills. It does not refer the President, for the information necessary to enable him how to act, to the journals. How shall he be informed? The constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." Here is an express grant of authority. It would result from the power to legislate, if the constitution had been silent on the subject. The power to determine the rules of proceeding includes in it the whole of those regulations necessary to make known the action of the respective Houses of Congress to each other and to the President. Accordingly, by a system of joint rules adopted by both Houses, Congress has regulated the manner of communication from the one to the other, and likewise to the President. By these rules the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate are to sign each bill which is passed, and they are to do it "in their respective Houses," not at their lodgings, but publicly, in the presence of those who enact the laws. When all this is done, the Committee of Enrolments are directed to present the bill to the President for his approbation. How is he to dispose of it? The constitution says, "if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated." The President did approve and sign the bill for the benefit of Alford and Brush, and, having done so, he performed all the constitution required of him, except taking care to have it faithfully executed. The constitution does not direct what the President shall do with the enrolled bill after he has signed it. It does direct him to send it back, with his objections, to the House in which it originated, if he will not approve and sign; and, by joint rules, he is to be informed in which House the bill originated, by a certificate of the Clerk endorsed on the bill. But where he approves and signs, how is the bill to be preserved, and how is the law to be made known? The constitution furnishes no answer, but the act of 1789 gives one. That act requires the Secretary of State to receive it from the President, and to proceed with it by recording and publishing in the manner I have mentioned. This act also provides, in substance, that if a bill shall be passed by two thirds of both Houses of Congress, notwithstanding the objections of the President to the contrary, the Secretary of State shall receive such bill "from the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in whichever House it shall last have been approved," and proceed to record and publish the same, as he would if the President had approved and signed it. Thus, sir, you perceive that it requires the union of the provisions of the constitution, an act of Congress, and the rules of the two Houses, to complete and carry out the work of legislation in all its parts, and to make it known to the people. You also perceive the safeguards which the system furnishes to detect error and prevent mistakes. I contend, when a bill passes through the ordeal provided by this system, and is recorded in the office of the Secretary of State, it there becomes a record of what the law is, and, as such, is to be verified under the seal, and cannot be controverted by opposing to it the manuscript or printed journal, or the oral testimony of the Clerks of the two Houses, or of any man.

I do not mean to assert that the guards are so numerous that there is no possibility of mistake, and that a bill, which never passed both Houses, could not possibly meet with the approval of the President, and find its way to the record in the State Department. I mean no such thing; for I well know that all human transactions proceed from imperfect beings, prone to err and liable to mistake, and therefore I admit the possibility, or, if you choose, the probability, in the present case, of the existence of a mistake. It may be that the bill for the benefit of Alford and Brush never did pass both Houses; and unless it did, it is not law. But the fact of its having been signed by the presiding officers, approved and signed by the President, examined by the Committee of Enrolments, and by them presented to the President, and recorded in the Secretary's office, are evidence that the bill did pass both Houses; and all that can be urged against it, to the contrary, is the statement in the journal of the Senate, that it was indefinitely postponed. If there be conflicting evidence, which shall prevail? Certainly that which is recognised by law, and made evidence by express provision. Such is the evidence to be derived from the records in the State Department, whereas the evidence derived from the journal has no validity imparted to it, either by the constitution or by any statute, nor is there any mode provided for obtaining the evidence the journal may furnish, when wanted.

In the nature of things, there is no more reason for confiding in the statements of the journal, than in the acts of the presiding officers of the two Houses, and the Committee of Enrolments. Their acts declare that the bill did pass. The signing of bills by the presiding officers is a very solemn act: all other business is suspended; the title of the bill or act, about to be signed, is distinctly read aloud in the presence of each House, and if it never had passed, any member might rise and make the question. Here is opportunity to correct and detect mistakes. Who can say that the agents engaged in this work are more liable to blunder and mistake than the Clerk who makes up the journal? Has it come to this, that we are to ascertain whether an act published in the statute book is or is not law, by entering into the inquiry, or rather by allowing an executive officer to go into the inquiry, whether the presiding officers of the two Houses, or their Clerks, are most liable to make mistakes? In postponing bills indefinitely, the Clerk may mistake the title of a bill which was passed for that which was postponed, and make his entry accordingly on the journal. The mistake may escape detection; and if it should, according to the practical doctrine of the Secretary of War, then the mistake of the Clerk would actually nullity an act of Congress. Suppose the manuscript or printed journal should state that a certain bill was indefinitely postponed, when a member of Congress, paying particular attention to the subject of that bill, remembered distinctly, and was willing to swear, that the bill was duly passed and approved, and regularly signed by the Speaker: would not the affidavit of the member be as satisfactory evidence in favor of the law as the journal would be against it? I state this case, to show the absurdity of departing from the record evidence of what the law is, as furnished in the Department of State, and adopting other tests heretofore unknown.

The journal of the last day of the session is not read by the Clerk in the presence of the members of Congress, and they have no opportunity to correct any mistake which, in the hurry of business, may be committed by the Clerk.

It may be said that the constitution gives force and effect to the journals, and makes them equivalent to records, and imparts to them the intrinsic verity of records. That the constitution intended the journals of each House to be evidences for some purposes, no one can deny; but that the constitution designed to make the journals the highest and best evidence, and the fountain whence you must draw your information to decide questions like this before us, I deny. The act of 1789 is unconstitutional, if the journals alone are to be consulted in order to ascertain what the law is; for that act provides a different mode, which could not be done if the constitution prescribed the mode. Why, then, did the constitution require journals to be kept and published? I answer, that the leading object, if not the only one, was, to lay before the people the conduct of their representatives, and to exhibit their legislative history. The great value of the journals consists in the yeas and nays. The people in a representative Government have a right—a right of all others the most valuable—to control their representatives, to dismiss them whenever their course is disapproved, and to select others to manage their affairs. The people cannot bring their representatives to a settlement without keeping an account against them. The journal contains the account; the yeas and nays exhibit the items for and against each representative; and the publication of the journal enables the citizen voter, who is the judge for the occasion, to sum up the items, and balance the account. The representative is accountable to his constituents. The requirements of the constitution, in regard to the journal, were intended to secure and enforce a practical responsibility on the part of the representative. In this view, the yeas and nays on propositions which never become laws are as important as on those which pass.

If the President objects to the passage of a bill, and refuses to sign it, he is required to return it, with his objections, to that House in which it originated. In such case the constitution directs that his objections (not the contents of the bill) shall be entered at large on the journal, and that the vote on reconsideration shall be taken by yeas and nays. In such a case, it may be contended that the constitution designed to make the journal evidence of the law. Not so. The contents of the bill should appear on the journal, if we are to look in it to find the law. The constitution does not require that. But as the exercise of the veto power places the President and the two Houses of Congress in conflict before the nation, and as the principles involved in such cases will generally be of the first importance, the constitution requires that the political issue between the President and Congress should be fairly made up and presented, so that the triers, the voters of the country, may have the case fully stated when they come to sit in judgment. Such was the great object of the convention, in those constitutional provisions which relate to the objections of the President and the yeas and nays on reconsideration. The question before us derives additional importance at the present time, from the doctrines started on the subject of expunging. What will be the consequences of establishing the right to expunge, and justifying the conduct of the Secretary of War in this case? The most fearful and corrupt results may ensue. A servile Senate, forgetful of the motives and reasons which induced the fathers of the constitution to institute their body, lost to every sense of personal dignity and self-respect, either individually or in the aggregate, and fitted by degradation to offer the incense of flattery to the nostrils of power, so that "thrift may follow fawning," can, by uniting the doctrines of expunging with the practice of the Secretary, construct an engine of executive despotism strong enough to crush the liberties of this country. When a President wants a pretext upon which to refuse the execution of a law or a treaty, he has nothing to do but to set his minions to work, and have the journal showing the vote on the passage, or the advice and consent of the Senate in treaty cases, expunged; and then, sir, he may say there is no law, there is no treaty, and set up for himself.

It may be asked whether there is no remedy in case a bill through mistake should be signed by the presiding officers of each House, approved by the President, and find its way to the records in the State Department? There is a remedy. It is, to repeal the act. Congress must apply the remedy, and, in deciding upon the propriety of a repeal, it is a legitimate inquiry whether or not any mistake was committed in the passage of the bill. Upon such inquiry, the journals may be received as evidence, and may have such weight as each member chooses to give to them, and they might be repelled by parol testimony. Of all this Congress has the exclusive right to judge. If the Secretary of War has the right, he may always refuse to execute an act of Congress. Pass a second, a third, and a fourth bill for the relief of Alford and Brush, and the Secretary may refuse to execute any of them, alleging the existence of mistake. It is no answer to say that you would impeach him for repeated refusals, that such conduct would manifest corruption. He may honestly refuse obedience in every case, if you allow him to judge; and I am one of those who think there can be no conviction upon impeachment, unless corruption is established and fixed upon the accused. My argument is intended to show that the executive officer has no discretion, no right to look behind the law, as published by the proper authority.

As a judicial question, there is not an intelligent tribunal in the United States which would hesitate a moment in pronouncing the act for the benefit of Alford and Brush the law of the land. No lawyer could frame a special plea to get behind the record in the State Department. A law obligatory on the Judiciary ought certainly to be obeyed by executive officers.

I have thus, sir, presented my views of this singular and novel case. I believe the Secretary has erred, but through no bad motive.

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARDWELL then withdrew his motion.

After some further discussion, in which Messrs. VINTON, JONES, ADAMS, BOND, GARLAND of Virginia, STORER, GRENELL, HOLSEY, GLASCOCK, BEARDSLEY, and HOAR, participated, and without taking any question,

The House adjourned.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion made by Mr. SPANGLER, to reconsider the vote rejecting the proposition to allow Mr. Newland leave to appear by counsel, in the prosecution of his claim to the seat in the House at present occupied by Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. HARD remarked that he would not have added one word to protract this debate, if he did not deem himself measurably responsible for its introduction, and the interruption thereby of the action of this House upon the question of further time; a question which, in justice to both the parties interested, ought to have been decided some days ago. At the time he made the motion, he had risen to address the House on the question of postponement, and to urge the propriety of granting further time to the sitting member to collect his defensive evidence. But as he had intimated to the petitioner that he would move his admission on the floor of this House before any further discussion should be had in relation to his petition, he had therefore submitted his motion at that particular time: he had done so, too, with a reasonable expectation that the motion would have been received by the unanimous vote of the House.

When the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRYAN] addressed the House on this question a few days since, he (Mr. H.) was so situated that he did not distinctly hear his remarks; but on reading them as he found them published in the Globe on the next morning, he perceived that that gentleman had charged him with improper motives in bringing forward this motion.

If he (Mr. H.) recollected the substance of those remarks, they charged him with having introduced it with a view to forestall the opinion of this House on the question of admitting counsel, and with the intention of defeating the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections. In answer to such a charge, he would barely remark, that come from what source it might, it was unkind, unparliamentary, and without a shadow of foundation. He was aware it did not become any gentleman to indulge in personal contests on this floor; he would, therefore, only add, so far as he had been concerned, he had entertained the kindest personal feelings towards the petitioner, and in this matter had acted in accordance with his expressed desire, and at the advice and request of his warmest and most discreet political friends. What, said Mr. H., was the origin of the motion which had given rise to so much debate? How did it acquire its present form? When he submitted it, if he rightly recollected its form, it simply asked that the petitioner be admitted to a seat upon this floor during the discussion of the question of further time; at all events, this was the character he intended to have given it. It was the amendment proposed by his honorable colleague, [Mr. MANN], whose political orthodoxy none will question, that had thrown the original motion into its present shape, by modifying it in such a manner as to permit the petitioner to be heard in his own defence on the final question. He would ask gentlemen, then, who was the author of that portion of the proposition which supersedes the resolution reported by the gentlemen composing the majority of the committee? Was he the political enemy or friend of the petitioner? Why has the gentleman from North Carolina had so much to say about asking nothing from his (the petitioner's) enemies? Mr. H. thought he could see, in his course, a desire to give this question a political turn, with a view to prejudice the rights of the sitting member. He [Mr. B.] had charged all those who had expressed an opinion against the expediency of admitting counsel on this floor, of entertaining feelings unfriendly to the petitioner; and in answering the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED], and his colleague, [Mr. GREENELL], he protested against submitting the case to such hands, as the petitioner had nothing to expect from such a quarter. If he (Mr. H.) had kept the run of the debate, as many of the political friends as the enemies had opposed the amendment. He hoped the House would never consent to treat this as a party question; as nothing could be more destructive to the rights of the parties concerned, and the freedom and safety of the elective franchise, than to turn our legislation on such subjects into mere partisan squabbles. If he were to follow the dictates of his own private feelings and inclination, without consulting the permanency of long-established parliamentary usage, he should most cheerfully accord his assent to the proposed amendment. This he would do, however, as a matter of grace—not of any right which the petitioner might claim. But he considered the amendment, if it should be adopted, as doing something more than extending an individual courtesy. It would be setting a precedent, prospective in its tendency, and as durable as your records, and as permanent as that instrument which holds this body in existence. He was unwilling to lend his vote, out of mere courtesy to any individual, to introduce an innovation so mischievous in its tendency.

The application to be heard by counsel at the bar of this House must, as Mr. H. conceived, be either addressed to its courtesy, or founded upon some legal or constitutional right. If they were to credit the concurring testimony of a number of the friends and colleagues of the petitioner, he did not desire counsel on the main question. It could not, therefore, be addressed to the courtesy of the House, as it certainly would not extend its courtesy to a case where it was not desired. But it had been said that the claim was a matter of imprescriptible right, sanctioned by precedent and universal practice. This he denied, as what had been the former practice of this body was, by the showing of the journals, long since discontinued.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRYAN] had discovered great research into the practices and precedents of not only this House and the Senate, but of those of the Commons of Great Britain, and from thence had adduced cases to which he had referred us as authority binding upon this House; but he begged to remind the gentleman, if he would but examine those cases carefully, and inquire into the history of the parliamentary proceedings of both Governments in cases of contested elections, and mark the change that had been introduced into this House since the year 1804, he must be satisfied he had not furnished us with a solitary parallel case. In the House of Commons the petition of the claimant is referred in the first instance to a select committee, who are authorized to summon before them witnesses to testify, viva voce, of the matters relating to the petition. This committee are empowered to hear and determine the whole case, and their decision is conclusive upon both parties as to the right to the seat; before this committee counsel is always admitted, to draw out and sift the evidence. Similar to this had been the early practice of this House; and in the first case referred to by the gentleman, the case of the New Jersey member, in 1797, the petition of a number of citizens of that State, complaining of the illegality of the election, was referred to the standing committee, without any evidence accompanying it. That committee, finding that the extent of territory embraced in the United States would, in some instances, render it impossible to obtain viva voce testimony before a committee, in order to establish some convenient rule by which in future the House might be directed in collecting this kind of evidence, asked leave of the House, by resolution, to send out a commission to the State of New Jersey to take depositions to be read before the House. This course, although warmly resisted in the House by some members, was finally adopted; and, from that time until 1804, the practice had uniformly been to take the depositions of witnesses at their residence, and to commit those depositions to a Committee of the Whole House, for their consideration. This was a partial change in the mode of conducting contested elections, though not such a one as wholly dispensed with the necessity or propriety of permitting the parties to appear by counsel at the bar of the House; and hence it was that, prior to 1805, the gentleman had found three cases where counsel had been applied for and granted, though there were but two cases where counsel actually appeared. But, said Mr. H., it was worthy of remark, that in the first case cited, the New Jersey case, the jurisdiction of Congress was questioned to send out a commission to inquire into the proceedings of the State election, and the parties asked that counsel might be heard on that point; and Mr. Madison very properly remarked that, where its jurisdiction was questioned, it would be indelicate for the House to deny counsel. Counsel, however, did not appear even in this case. But since the year 1804, Mr. H. said, another material change had been introduced into this branch of parliamentary practice. From that time to this, it had been the practice for the parties, on regular notices served, to take all their evidence before the case was presented to the House; in which case, all the papers, evidence, and other documents, were, by rules of the House, referred to the standing Committee of Elections, whose duty it was to admit the parties to a hearing, either by themselves or by counsel, and to hear, examine, and sift the evidence, and report their proceedings to the House, accompanied by the arguments, brief, and points, presented by the parties. Here it would be perceived that, by the present practice, the parties have the full benefit of counsel in that stage of the proceedings where it is most needed. From the consideration of these facts, Mr. H. contended that it was but fair to infer that from the change of the mode of conducting contested elections resulted that change in the practice of admitting counsel at the bar of the House. But it was not necessary to rely upon deductive evidence to satisfy this House that the practice had been discontinued. He had a case in his mind which would establish it affirmatively. He alluded to the very first case which arose after this change of practice: the case of Philip B. Key, of Maryland. All the evidence in his case was sent to the standing committee, where he was permitted to be heard by counsel; and we hear no more, although twelve cases had since been reported, of counsel being heard at the bar of the House in cases of contested elections.

From these considerations, he had been irresistibly brought to the conclusion that it had been the settled intention of the House, from its earliest history, to admit counsel where the evidence was to be collected and sifted. And this rule he considered could not, as had been urged, operate oppressively to either party concerned, as they had always been permitted to furnish, by themselves or counsel, their written arguments, which were appended to and formed a part of the committee's report, for the information of every member. This privilege had been extended to the petitioner in the case before the House, of which he had availed himself; this he (Mr. H.) thought was all that any person could reasonably ask, and with this the petitioner seemed himself to be contented. He should, therefore, vote against the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he felt called upon to say a word or two in reply to his colleague [Mr. HARRIS] who had just taken his seat. His colleague had seen proper to sustain his argument by reference to him, (Mr. M.) in holding him up to the view of the House as a standard of political and party orthodoxy on all party questions. He makes the remark in reply to the argument of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] which he had not the pleasure to hear. He had never aspired to the distinction which his colleague, he must say, so gratuitously conferred upon him; and in offering the substitute the other day for the motion of his colleague, he was influenced singly by a desire to aid him in his momentary embarrassment, in reducing his motion to clear and distinct terms. It was no part of his purpose to assert a principle, though he confessed he could not distinguish so satisfactorily as some gentlemen had done, between the admission of counsel in this and similar cases, and other questions of mere private right. On questions of public right they never heard counsel, except such as was here in the representative capacity. He had voted against the admission of counsel in this case the other day, because the petitioner, after authorizing an honorable member to ask leave to appear by counsel, had changed his mind, and authorized another, his worthy friend, [Colonel CONNOR,] to say in his place that he did not wish counsel.

On this ground, Mr. M. presumed, many gentlemen voted on that occasion. The right of counsel Mr. M. regarded in most cases as a great constitutional right; not to be abridged for light or transient causes; and if the petitioner had adopted the usual course of asking seriously by petition, Mr. M. could not doubt that the House would have granted it by favor, if not as of right. The petitioner, however, had fallen into some inconsistency in respect to these preliminary matters, no doubt in consequence of his want of experience in controversies before this House; and these preliminary questions, in consequence, had occupied much more time than had been anticipated. Mr. M. had regretted to see his friend from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] spend so much of his ammunition upon the small game of the outposts, instead of reserving it for use upon the main question presented by the committee. Mr. M. had not discovered a disposition to make this a party question in any respect, and certainly, for himself, he had in no way indulged such a disposition; but Mr. M. would say to the friends of the sitting member, that if they continued a great while longer to resist the coming to a decision, it might ere long be deemed, in this House and in the country, a party question, even against the dispositions which now exist here. He therefore hoped that the House would come to a decision upon these preliminary questions without further delay, and set an early day for the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections in favor of the petitioner. Justice to him and to the State of North Carolina required this. He had leaned over the bar of this House, asking their decision every day since the meeting of Congress. As to the remark of his colleague, [Mr. HARRIS], to prove that this was not with him a party question—that he (Mr. M.) had suggested the terms of a resolution, and that it was well understood that he (Mr. M.) was the very essence of orthodoxy on political questions—he must be permitted to say that he did not feel himself complimented, (however intended,) for it came in a shape too questionable, too “ghost-like,” to be so understood. Moreover, the judgment of his colleague on questions of party orthodoxy had been so long “infected,” that in his State his conclusions might not pass as hard coin; and he would consider himself obliged if his worthy friend would spare his certificates in these matters.

Mr. PEYTON was sorry to hear a threat thrown out of making this contested election a party question. He did hope this never would be the case, though he himself did not see how it was possible. He understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] to intimate pretty plainly that, unless gentlemen took a particular direction, they could and would have this a party question. But how was that possible? Did the gentleman from New York mean to be understood as intimating that these gentlemen [Messrs. GRAHAM and NEWLAND] were not both of the same politics? Did the gentleman intend to be understood as charging that there had been any change in their politics since their canvass before the people? How then was it possible for the gentleman from New York to intimate and hold up a threat to that body, that unless a certain course be taken by certain gentlemen on that floor, it would result in making this a party question? Why, he did the gentleman whose cause he advocated great injustice; for the two gentlemen before the people declared themselves to be of the same party. Mr. P. denied, then, that a party question could arise out of this case, under any circumstances, and he hoped this was the last they should hear on that subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider; which were ordered.

Mr. MANN, of New York, rose and remarked, he merely wished to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PEXTON,] which was that he (Mr. M.) considered himself lectured.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 91, nays 96, as follows:

So the House refused to reconsider their vote.

The question then recurred upon the motion made by Mr. HARD, that the petitioner have leave to appear at the bar of the House, in his own behalf, upon the subject of his petition.

The hour for proceeding to the orders of the day having arrived,

Mr. GALBRAITH moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of this subject, but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. WHITTLESEY, who expressed a hope that the House was prepared to take the question without further discussion.

Mr. MORGAN asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and the motion of Mr. HARD was agreed to, without a count.

Mr. MAURY then moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the other motions relating to the report of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the motion would be agreed to, so that some disposition might be made of the subject that day, for it had already precluded reports from the standing committees for about three weeks.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend that motion by striking out "the purpose therein mentioned," and inserting "that the rules be suspended for the purpose of calling for reports of committees," but subsequently withdrew the motion.

Mr. HAMER asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. MAURY's motion, which were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 143, nays 54.

So the rules of the House were suspended for the purpose indicated.

The CHAIR then explained the pending questions. The first recurred upon the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BORN,] from the Committee of Elections, viz: that the report of that committee be postponed until Wednesday, the 2d of March, and be made the special order of that day. A motion to amend was then made by a member from North Carolina, proposing a more distant day, but that motion was subsequently withdrawn. A motion was then made by a gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] to amend the original motion by striking out Wednesday, the 2d of March, and inserting Tuesday, the 8th of March. There was also a motion to recommit the whole report to the Committee of Elections, with instructions, by another gentleman from New York, [Mr. HARD.] The question pending at this time before the House was the amendment of Mr. MANN, of New York, to strike out Wednesday, the 2d of March, and insert Tuesday, the 8th of March.

Mr. MANN then withdrew his motion, and remarked that he had intended, when the House had decided the other preliminary question, to move a postponement to some day not far distant, when it would be convenient for the House to take up and act upon it. If the present was the proper time, he would now move to postpone the subject till next Wednesday week.

Mr. MAURY said he hoped the House would not make this subject the order of the day for any particular and proximate day, but that it would reject every motion of that nature, for the purpose of entertaining the resolution proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HARD,] to recommit the reports and documents to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to grant further time to the sitting member to take depositions. He respectfully asked the attention of the House for a few moments, while he proceeded to state, as succinctly as he might, the reasons in favor of such a disposition.

The Committee of Elections met for the first time on the second Monday of the present session. The chairman was instructed to inform the sitting member and the petitioner that on the following day their presence was desired, for the purpose of ascertaining if they were ready, and of entertaining any propositions which they might think proper to make. They appeared accordingly; the sitting member in person, and the petitioner in person and by counsel. In the course of the session, the sitting member submitted a protest, in which he objected to the reception, as evidence, of all the depositions referred to the committee, on account of the vagueness, and generality of the notices for taking them, which had been served on him by the petitioner. The counsel for the petitioner combated, with much earnestness and at great length, the objections contained in the protest; and the committee adjourned without coming to any decision on the subject. This protest, if sustained, would decide the question in limine, and render any further proceedings, at least till other testimony not liable to its exception should be produced, unnecessary.

In consequence, however, of the absence, from indisposition or other sufficient cause, of several members of the committee, a decision on the protest was deferred from day to day, until a full session of all the members could be had. This did not take place till the 15th of January, when the objections of the protest were overruled by a majority of the committee. The sitting member, on being apprized of this decision, promptly applied for further time to take depositions. He stated the persons whose testimony he desired to procure, the voters whose qualifications he impeached, and the particular disqualifications under which they labored. That this application was not earlier made, is ascribable to causes over which the sitting member had no control. At the earliest possible period he had offered a protest, in the nature of a plea in abatement, to all the testimony before the committee. If a decision had been made promptly and adversely to the views of the sitting member, there is every reason to believe that the application for further time would have been as promptly made. But the committee did not so decide. The investigation dragged its slow length along till the middle of January. If, then, this application would have been deemed reasonable at the commencement of the session, it is contended that the sitting member did not lose any right, ought not to be deprived of any privilege, in consequence of a delay which he not only did not occasion, but of which he deprecated the continuance. By every consideration of justice and fair dealing, he stood on the 15th of January, when the preliminary objections raised by him to the receivability of the testimony were overruled, precisely where he would have stood if those objections had not been made, or, when made, been promptly acted on, at the threshold of the investigation.

Placing, then, the sitting member on this ground, a ground from which he cannot rightfully be removed, let us examine whether the merits of the application are such as, if made at the outset, would have entitled him to the delay asked for.

The election was held early in August last. The sitting member was not apprized by the petitioner of his intention to contest the seat till the 2d of October following, a period of nearly two months. The first notice to take depositions was served on the sitting member on the 19th of October, and the 29th of that month designated as the time when the actual taking of them was to commence. In all this long interval, from early in August till the 19th of October, the petitioner, it is fair to presume, was assailing the district for the purpose of ferreting out testimony to sustain his pretensions; while the sitting member, perhaps unapprized of these searching investigations, or resting secure in the returns of sworn officers, and in his certificate of election, did not make corresponding exertions.

When, therefore, the notices were served on him, he had difficulties to encounter which were peculiar to his position. He had a district of great extent to traverse, 200 miles in length by about 90 in breadth, comprising within its limits six sparsely populated counties, and presenting, in its broken and mountainous surface, physical obstacles to travelling of the most formidable nature.

He had to encounter an opponent forearmed, who had already surveyed the ground, selected his positions, and marshalled his array of witnesses. He had to act upon the inadequate information of vague and general notices to appear, in rapid succession, at points remote from each other, alike uninformed of the witnesses to be examined, the voters alleged to be unqualified, and the particular disqualifications charged against them. It resulted, then, from the very necessities of his position, that he was taken by surprise. It was utterly impossible that he should prepare himself, beforehand, with explanatory or rebutting testimony. Every thing was withheld from him but the single privilege of cross-examination, and of that he could not avail himself, in one instance, at least, even by attorney.

The depositions, as before stated, were commenced to be taken on the 29th of October. In thirty days from that time, the sitting member was called to this place to enter upon the discharge of his public duties. Of these thirty days, the greater portion were monopolized by the petitioner, leaving him inadequate time to travel intermediate distances, much less to take depositions in his own behalf.

Such being the facts of the case, can it be pretended, with any approach to plausibility, that the sitting member was placed on a level of equality with his competitor? that he had an equal opportunity afforded him of procuring and marshalling his testimony?

At an early stage of this debate, the case of Letcher and Moore was cited as a precedent in point against the pending application. But, so far as it was analogous to the present, he (Mr. M.) drew from it a directly contrary conclusion. That election, like the one in question, took place early in August; the district was much smaller, the country more level and traversable, and not only the names of the voters, but the person for whom they voted, placed on record. The latter advantage, resulting from the viva voce mode of voting, must have greatly abridged the labor of the parties to that controversy. Yet, on reaching this place, they both applied for further time, and further time, till the 1st of January, was granted them. In point of fact, they did not return till the middle of that month, and they were allowed till some time in March to prepare briefs, and arrange the testimony. If time was granted to both in that case, why not to one in this?

On the 31st of November and 1st of December, depositions were taken on behalf of the petitioner at Morgantown, in Burke county, about six hundred miles from this place. The sitting member was notified of the fact; but alleges that, inasmuch as it was physically impossible for him to attend there, and reach the seat of Government, where paramount public duties called him, by the 7th of December, he wrote to one friend, and on the suggestion afterwards of his absence, to another friend, to attend and act in his behalf. Neither of them did attend; and the sitting member was, in fact, unrepresented. The depositions taken under these circumstances are, therefore, ex parte, and ought not to be received as evidence.

He (Mr. M.) was no lawyer; but he had always understood that the object of notice was to give the adverse party an opportunity to attend either in person or by attorney, for the purpose of cross-examining witnesses. If he cannot attend in person, the option, which can alone give validity to the notice, is taken from him. The obstacles to personal attendance may be either physical or moral. Physical, as if, for example, sufficient time be not allowed him to reach the place designated in the notice, on the day appointed. Moral, if paramount public duties of which the party serving the notice was cognizant, called him in another direction. Either of these causes would alike vitiate a notice. If the sitting member had been represented at Morgantown, on the occasion alluded to, this objection might not be insisted on. But as he was not, the argument addresses itself forcibly to the equitable consideration of this House. On the necessity of cross-examination to the full and correct evolution of facts, Mr. M. said he would not enlarge; it need only be suggested to produce a proper impression on every mind at all conversant with judicial investigations. A state of things might possibly arise, resulting from the decision of the House on other points involved in this controversy, which would make the admissibility of this testimony the hinge on which the election would turn; and the question is propounded, whether gentlemen could reconcile it to their sense of justice to oust the sitting member upon the evidence which may justly be characterized as ex parte, and under circumstances which would render them obnoxious, whether deservedly or not, to the imputation of partiality, or at least precipitance?

There is another view of this case, (Mr. M. said,) which he wished to present. This is not so much a contest between the sitting member and the petitioner, as between the majority and minority of the people of the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina. The point of difficulty is to ascertain which is the rightful majority of legal voters. By all the sanctions of our free institutions, the voice of that majority, from whichever side it may issue, has a right to be heard on this floor. Every avenue should be opened which may let in additional light upon the subject. Let the facts on each side be fully and fairly presented, and then we may arrive at a decision which will abide the test of public scrutiny. Even if the imputation of laches, or negligence in procuring testimony, could justly attach, as it cannot, to the sitting member, this should not affect, injuriously, the interests of those whom he claims to represent. The petitioner, if indeed he be the rightful representative, cannot be injured by delay, but, on the contrary, benefited. Time has ever proved itself not the enemy, but the friend, of truth.

Another argument in favor of delay is deducible from the fact that there is no law of Congress regulating the mode of proceeding in cases of contested election. The sitting member was suddenly launched into this ocean of investigation, without chart or compass to direct his course. It cannot be said that he has not conformed to law, when there is no law. He knew not what evidence was admissible, and what inadmissible. The statute book did, indeed, once speak upon the subject; but its voice has long since ceased. The law expired by its own limitation, and Congress applied no Promethean fire to prolong its existence. If precedents be appealed to, they are vague, loose, and contradictory; sometimes adapted to subserve the ends of temporary political interests, sometimes conforming to the laws of the particular State in which the contest arose, just as the caprice or wisdom, the policy or passion, of majorities in this body, or its committees, might suggest. Under these circumstances, to adopt a rigorous rule, and give it a retrospective operation, would be virtually to enact an ex post facto law—a mode of proceeding which is the resort of despotism, and therefore not to be tolerated in a free country.

It may be said that the sitting member should have looked to the laws of North Carolina regulating the mode of proceeding in contested elections for the State Legislature. The proper reply to this is, in the first place, that those laws have no binding force either upon him or upon Congress; and in the second place, that regulations which may be very appropriate to cases of which the theatre of operations is circumscribed within the limits of one county, may be very unjust and oppressive in their practical bearings, when extended over a congressional district of six times the extent. The laws of North Carolina, for example, provide that notice of an intention to contest the seat of a member returned for the Legislature shall be given within thirty days of the meeting of that body. This time may be amply sufficient where the sphere of investigation is confined to one county. But where, as in the present case, six counties are embraced, the number of days, by the rule of proportion, would be multiplied sixfold.

Allusions have been made in the course of this debate to the political preferences and connexions of the parties to this controversy. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] in reference to the motion, dictated by a sense of justice, of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] to allow the petitioner a seat within the bar of this House, and the privilege of speaking in his own behalf, remarked the other day that he would hesitate to receive favors from political or personal enemies. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] threw out this morning an intimation, or threat, that, unless a certain course, indicated by himself, was pursued by those whom he was pleased to denominate the political friends of the sitting member, this would be made a party question. Political or personal enemies! Party questions! Sir, how came these gentlemen to know that the political connexions of the sitting member and the petitioner were different and adverse? Rumor has informed us that, in their canvass before the people, both those gentlemen avowed the same political preferences in regard to men. If the rumor be unfounded, they both have seats upon this floor, and can disabuse our minds of the false impression. But if it be true, what propriety is there in giving utterance to such sarcasms and minatory admonitions? Granting, however, that those gentlemen have held, or do hold, antagonist sentiments and preferences, in regard to the great questions, whether relating to men or measures, which divide and agitate the country, is the principle to be acted on, and not only acted on but openly avowed in this hall, that on questions of a judicial resort, on questions which affect the purity of the elective franchise, the discipline of party is to prevail over the dictates of justice, and right to be trampled under foot at the nod of power? Sir, this is a judicial question. Our functions are those of judges, not of legislators; of jurors to try facts, and not of political partisans to stifle or distort them. Let us examine and decide upon the question in a spirit of candor and impartiality. Let us place it where alone it should stand, on its naked abstract merits, separated from every extraneous attribute of party, and purified from the discolorations of passion or of prejudice. Let us grant the application for further time.

Mr. BOYD did not rise to make a speech, but being of the majority of the Committee of Elections, it would be necessary for him to state some of the grounds which induced the committee to refuse the sitting member further time to take testimony. It appeared by the documents which the committee had examined, that the petitioner had given written notice to the sitting member on the second day of October last, that he would contest his election. That notice was given in compliance with the laws of North Carolina, and the very words of the law were embraced in the notice. No gentleman would doubt the legality of the notice, or that it was not given in good time to take all the depositions which might be needed. The simple question, then, before the House was, shall the sitting member have more time to take testimony to lay before the House? From the time notice was given the sitting member, to the meeting of Congress, there were sixty-six full days to take testimony; and he seriously asked that House whether sixty-six days were not sufficient time for taking all the testimony which could possibly be necessary? But it had been remarked that there were only twenty-nine days allowed for taking testimony, and that nearly all of that time had been occupied by the petitioner. He had only to remark, in reply to that, that the sitting member had the same opportunities that the petitioner had, if he had chosen to avail himself of them. He had stated on a former occasion that the sitting member had given as many notices of places where he intended to take depositions as the petitioner; that he had given the petitioner notice of his intention to take depositions at places one hundred and fifty miles apart, on the same day, and this had occurred in more than one instance. If gentlemen would turn to the printed documents, they would see that sufficient notice had been given to take all the testimony necessary. But if it should be shown that the sitting member had not employed himself in the collection of testimony, could he, in justice, ask further time? If it should appear that he had not diligently searched for testimony, could he come there, and, in justice, ask more time? It seemed to Mr. B. unreasonable. He had shown that the petitioner gave the sitting member notice on the 2d of October, and from that time he might have been taking testimony, if he had thought of it; but it appeared that, from the 2d of October until the 30th of that month, the sitting member never moved in the subject at all. Let gentlemen turn to the testimony, and examine the facts, and not trust to his arguments, as he did not expect to convince gentlemen by arguments, but by the facts of the case. The first notice that was given by the sitting member was on the 13th of October. Now, what was he doing in those twenty-eight days? If he was not taking testimony, he might have been doing so. But gentlemen had told them that the sitting member ought not to consider his election as contested, until the petitioner acted in the matter. Did not the sitting member believe the petitioner, when he gave him notice in writing of his intention to contest his election? Such being the case, Mr. B. asked if the sitting member should not at once have applied himself to the taking of testimony? or, if he failed to do so, why should he come to the House now to ask further time? He hoped he had been understood. It was a fact, and he repeated it, that twenty-eight days out of the sixty-six allowed the sitting member for taking testimony, had not been employed by him at all in that business. If the sitting member had come there and showed that he had been employed all his time, and that was not sufficient, then they might allow him further time; but the facts were otherwise, and the notices would show them to be otherwise. He would not enter into an argument with the gentleman from Tennessee in relation to the protest of the sitting member. His recollection was simply this: that, at the earliest stage of the question, the committee did virtually, and in fact, decide against the sitting member's protest, and in favor of the sufficiency of all the notices. He meant precisely what he said; so that no gentleman could be deceived. He stated further, that if any application had been made to the committee for further time, before the middle of January, he never had heard of it, and he was regular in attendance at the meetings of the committee. This was a simple history of the question. When the subject was before the committee, the chairman had gone in favor of the validity of the notices; he had stated, that notwithstanding it was required in Virginia that the names of all voters charged as illegal should appear in the notices for taking depositions, notwithstanding that was the express law, it had never been observed by former committees, and the House had never thought it necessary to require it. At that time a majority of the committee decided against the gentleman's protest, and in favor of the sufficiency of the notices. The committee went on and examined the testimony clear through, and took notes of such parts as were necessary. His recollection went further; that about the 14th January the parties were admitted before the committee, and that the sitting member was asked whether further time was needed; but he would not determine, and never did determine, until he had examined the evidence entirely through; and on the 16th day of January he came forward and asked further time. He believed that this subject ought to take precedence of all others. Every consideration prompted them to settle it as soon as the facts could be ascertained; and a very strong case should be made out, before they should grant further time for taking testimony. Well, when the application was made for further time, what were the grounds, the written grounds? Turn to them, and you will discover that the most important one was the evidence of the sheriff of Haywood county, which evidence was to prove that some six or eight illegal votes had been given to the petitioner; and, by two other gentlemen's evidence, six other illegal votes were to be proved. But, upon examination of the documents, it would be discovered that the testimony of the sheriff of Haywood county had already been taken, and the agents of both the parties had attended the examination; and as to the remainder of the testimony alluded to, it could not affect the final result. He considered that sixty-six days were sufficient time for the parties to take all the depositions necessary; or, having failed to do so, they could not in justice come forward now and ask for further time. His own judgment was, that there was sufficient time for taking testimony before the meeting of Congress, and he waived all other objections. He could not perceive in what stage of the proceeding the committee had done injustice to either of the parties. If gentlemen would look at the documents, they would see that the asking further time would have been in the first place an unreasonable request; but it was made doubly so by the fact that it was not asked until the middle of January, yet still more so to be asked at this time. Why did the sitting member not appeal in the first place to the House for further time? He had looked into the ex parte testimony which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAURY] had complained of. The facts were these: the sitting member objected to the testimony taken at Morgantown, because he had no agent there to cross-examine the witnesses. Mr. B. asked gentlemen to turn to the records, and they would discover that the sitting member had twenty-seven days' notice of the intention to take depositions at that place; and if he failed to attend, whose fault was it? This was a strange sort of argument.

Mr. MAURY said the gentleman had misunderstood him. He did not object to the notice which had been given, but he had stated that the sitting member had a moral obligation of a paramount nature which called him to Washington, and that he could not be in Washington at the meeting of Congress, and in Morgantown at the time specified.

Mr. BOYD resumed. The petitioner had given the sitting member sufficient notice, and he might have attended either by himself or by counsel. The sitting member, too, had made it impossible for the petitioner to attend at the times and places at which he had notified him to attend. If he recollected right, the sitting member might have attended at Morgantown, and then come on to Washington; but certain it was that twenty-seven days was sufficient notice, so that he might either have attended himself, or had an agent to attend for him. But he believed, in some of the written communications of the sitting member, it would be found that he had himself stated that he had an agent in every county in his district. In Mr. B's judgment, the committee had done right, and he believed the House would do wrong if it granted further time. As to party feelings, which had been spoken of, he had only to say that he had turned back and examined himself thoroughly to see if party had any influence in the course he had taken, because he should be sorry, extremely sorry, to ascertain hereafter that he had been swayed in his decision by party feelings.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, followed in reply, and contended that the sitting member had not been allowed sufficient time, and that the time that had been allowed was almost entirely engrossed by the petitioner, for the former could not proceed to take testimony until the latter had closed, who occupied the time till the sitting member was compelled to set out for Washington. He was in favor of both parties having all the time they would say, upon their honors, was necessary.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, contended that it was indispensible for the House to go into the merits of the report before they could possibly come to a conclusion whether further time ought to be allowed or not; and he was consequently opposed to the discussion of this preliminary question at that time.

Mr. GRAHAM (the sitting member) replied at length to Mr. BORD, and disapproved of the course taken by the committee in not allowing him more time to take testimony.

Mr. NEWLAND (the petitioner) then rose and returned his acknowledgments to the House for the unanimous vote by which he was permitted to appear on the floor in his own behalf. It had been truly said of him, remarked Mr. N., that he was a plain farmer, and unaccustomed to public speaking, which must be evident from the visible embarrassment he felt on the present occasion. He trusted, however, if the House would condescend to hear him on Monday or Tuesday next, he should be able not only to overcome that, but to hurl back much that had been said to him. It was due to his own character, and to the rights of those who sent him there, that he should seek the earliest opportunity to do this, at the same time he begged leave to assure the House that he had no hostile motive or intent to accomplish, and no latent ambition to gratify. He presented himself there, sent, as he solemnly averred, and hoped to be able to convince that body, by a majority of his constituents, to contend for and maintain, to the best of his humble ability, their rights, and not his own. He again expressed his deep and unfeigned obligations to the House, and a hope that Monday or Tuesday would be assigned him to address them at length.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD,
The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 14.

REORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

The House took up the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, on the subject of the reorganization of the militia system by Congress, presented on Monday last by Mr. GILLET, viz:

"Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to use their exertions to procure such amendments to the acts of Congress, organizing the militia, as shall relieve the people, as far as practicable, from the burdens of the system, without impairing its efficiency."

Mr. GILLET said that he desired that this resolution should go for consideration to the standing Committee on the Militia; and, with the view of presenting distinct propositions for their action, he moved the following instructions:

That the committee inquire into the expediency of so altering the laws relating to the militia as to provide—

First. That all free white able-bodied male citizens of the United States, between twenty-one and forty-five years of age, shall be enrolled in the militia.

Second. That, of the persons so enrolled, all who are under twenty-seven years of age shall, once in each year, be called out for a period not less than six days, and remain under arms during that period, with a view of improvement in military discipline and martial exercise; and such persons to be minutemen, and to be first called upon in case of insurrection or invasion.

Third. That the persons who are so called out, and remain under arms, shall receive a reasonable compensation for their time.

Fourth. That the Government of the United States shall furnish, at proper depositions, for the use of the persons thus called out, all needful tents, arms, and accoutrements.

Fifth. That there shall be deposited, at the proper points on the frontiers and seaboard, all necessary and proper arms, including brass cannon, and accoutrements, and ammunition, to supply the enrolled militia, when called into actual service in defence of the country.

The constitution of the United States has vested in Congress the power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

This provision had emanated from those who had pledged their lives, their property, and sacred honor, in the cause of liberty; those who had justly appreciated the evils of a standing army, and had referred to them as one just cause for resisting British sovereignty. The wisdom of this provision has seldom been questioned; and there are few known to the public, who would hazard a reputation, by advocating the abandonment of militia, and the substitution of a standing army. The potency of the latter, in controlling and directing events, not connected with their legitimate employment, has been too frequently and forcibly illustrated to be soon forgotten; while the former has, on all occasions, been found a safe, cheap, and efficient power, when properly directed, in aiding the civil authority in the due exercise of its power, in the execution of process, the suppression of domestic violence, and in repelling invasion. When the citizen soldier has accomplished the objects which called him to arms, and fulfilled the requirements of duty to his country, he joyously bids adieu to the tented field and the horror and havoc of war, resumes his station in society, and enjoys the blessings of peace and tranquility in the bosom of his family. The whole aim of his military life is to protect and preserve his country, and secure to himself and his fellow-citizens the enjoyment of freedom at their own fireside. While the hired mercenary of Europe is impelled by his appetite for bounty, the American citizen soldier has no motive but the glory of his country and the peace and happiness of its citizens.

In order, however, to secure to the country this efficient, safe, and available force, it is necessary to secure a proper organization of the militia. The present organization does not produce the desired result. Soon after the adoption of the constitution, when the whole number of free white inhabitants in the Union amounted to only about three millions, a law was passed organizing the militia. It bears date May 8, 1792. This law requires all free white able-bodied persons, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, to equip themselves and perform military duty. With slight modifications, this law remains without alteration. This act was passed when our population was limited in number, and at a time when the Indians were hanging upon our extensive frontier with hostile feelings. The country has undergone a change; but no corresponding change has been made in our law regulating this subject, although it has long been desired, and without it the system must sink. It now receives, for the want of proper legislative attention, much of public contempt.

The constitution of the United States, in prescribing the duties of the President, says:

"He shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient."

Under the direction given in this clause of the constitution, the subject of the more efficient and proper organization of the militia has been recommended by the different Presidents, in all, thirty-two different times, commencing with General Washington's inaugural address.

Mr. Jefferson is now allowed by all to have possessed clear and correct views in every thing that relates to the good of his country. His opinions are at this day taken as the true standard on all such subjects. In his message to Congress in 1805, he said:

"Whether it will be necessary to augment our land forces will be decided by occurrences, probably, in the course of your session. In the mean time, you will consider whether it would not be expedient for a state of peace, as well as of war, so to organize or class the militia as would enable us, on a sudden emergency, to call for the service of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old and those having families. Upwards of three hundred thousand able-bodied men, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-six years, which the last census shows we may now count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offence or defence, in any point where they may be wanted, and will give time for raising regular forces, after the necessity of them shall become certain; and the reducing to the early period of life all its active services cannot but be desirable to our younger citizens of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them in more advanced age a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I cannot, then, but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system as, by a separation of the more active part from that which is less so, we may draw from it, when necessary, an efficient corps, fit for real and active service, and to be called in regular rotation."

These suggestions, so pertinent and valuable, have been amplified and adopted by General Jackson, in his message to Congress at the opening of its present session. His opinions on this subject are entitled to great respect and consideration, as there are few who will deny to him high consideration as a military man and a defender of his country.

In his message he says:

"Occurrences to which we as well as all other nations are liable, both in our internal and external relations, point to the necessity of an efficient organization of the militia. I am again induced, by the importance of the subject, to bring it to your attention. To suppress domestic violence, and to repel foreign invasion, should these calamities overtake us, we must rely, in the first instance, upon the great body of the community, whose will has instituted and whose power must support the Government. A large standing military force is not consonant to the spirit of our institutions, nor to the feelings of our countrymen; and the lessons of former days, and those also of our own times, show the danger as well as the enormous expense of these permanent and extensive military organizations. That just medium which avoids an inadequate preparation on one hand, and the danger and expense of a large force on the other, is what our constituents have a right to expect from their Government. This object can be attained only by the maintenance of a small military force, and by such an organization of the physical strength of the country as may bring this power into operation, whenever its services are required. A classification of the population offers the most obvious means of effecting this organization. Such a division may be made as will be just to all, by transferring each, at a proper period of life, from one class to another, and by calling first for the services of that class, whether for instruction or action, which, from age, is qualified for duty, and may be called to perform it with least injury to themselves or to the public. Should the danger ever become so imminent as to require additional force, the other classes, in succession, would be ready for the call. And if, in addition to this organization, voluntary associations were encouraged, and inducements held out for their formation, our militia would be in a state of efficient service. Now, when we are at peace, is the proper time to adjust and establish a practicable system. The object is certainly worth the experiment, and worth the expense. No one appreciating the blessings of a republican Government can object to his share of the burden which such a plan may impose. Indeed, a moderate portion of the national funds could scarcely be better applied than in carrying into effect and continuing such an arrangement, and in giving the necessary elementary instruction. We are happily at peace with all the world. A sincere desire to continue so, and a fixed determination to give no just cause of offence to other nations, furnish, unfortunately, no certain grounds of expectation that this relation will be uninterrupted. With this determination to give no offence is associated a resolution, equally decided, tamely to submit to none. The armor and the attitude of defence afford the best security against those collisions which the ambition, or interest, or some other passion of nations not more justifiable, is liable to produce. In many countries it is considered unsafe to put arms into the hands of the people, and to instruct them in the elements of military knowledge. That fear can have no place here, when it is recollected that the people are the sovereign power. Our Government was instituted and is supported by the ballot-box, not by the musket. Whatever changes await it, still greater changes must be made in our social institutions, before our political system can yield to physical force. In every aspect, therefore, in which I can view the subject, I am impressed with the importance of a prompt and efficient organization of the militia."

Mr. G. said the conclusions of his judgment accorded very nearly with the President's, as would be observed by reference to the propositions he had submitted.

It is objected to the present system, first, that the number required to perform militia duty is unnecessarily large.

This is a true and a valid objection. The present organization was adapted to the times at which it was produced. The number of persons liable to perform duty under it at that time cannot now be ascertained; but, judging from the amount of population then and now, it may be fairly estimated at about two hundred and fifty thousand. This militia force was then considered amply sufficient to protect our extended and varied frontiers under the most adverse circumstances. The country has changed, but there is no modification of the system. The law that then secured the services of two hundred and fifty thousand, now imposes duty upon about a million and a half of persons. These men are called out, upon an average, at least three days in each year. If their time and expenses are valued at one dollar per day, it forms an aggregate of four millions five hundred thousand dollars per annum. The welfare of this country does not require such an annual tax, which falls almost exclusively upon that class which is least able to bear it.

H. OF R.]

Reorganization of the Militia.

To obviate this objection, he had proposed merely to enrol a large force, but not to require any duty of a very large portion of the persons composing it, except when called into actual service.

The second objection is, that the present law requires the service of minors who are eighteen or upwards, while their time and services belong to the parent, and that the parent is compelled to equip his sons. This objection is not without its force. There is little justice in requiring of one who is paying, or has paid, on his own account, the militia tax, to give up the time of his sons for this purpose, and much less justice in requiring him to purchase arms for them. This period with very many young men is spent at school, and in other employments, which render it inconvenient for them to meet the requirements of such a law. Moralists have long objected to minors entering upon those duties at such an age.

He had provided that the earliest period of enrolment should be at the age of twenty-one years. This is the period when young men have finished their education and become masters of their own actions, when they become entitled to the privileges of freemen, and should share in the honor and responsibility of protecting and defending the country from all foreign or domestic aggressions.

A third objection is, that those whose character and standing in society qualify them to sustain the credit and respectability of the militia are exempt from duty. The weight of this objection rests upon the extent and character of the exemptions. In some of the States it will be found that those who participate in the honors of certain public employments, and those engaged in certain professions and callings, are exempt from duty.

Mr. G. said he knew of no one whose station in society, or whose calling, exalted him above the obligation of defending his country. He hoped no man was considered above defending it. He who administers justice in the forum, and he who performs the sacred rites of our religion at the altar, might well aid in giving dignity and sanctity to the glorious employment of protecting and defending our altars, our wives, our children, and our homes. While the most distinguished classes are exempt from duty, the service sinks into disrepute, and it becomes the scorn and contempt of those who ought to be its chief supporters, if not of the whole community.

He had made no provision to allow any exemptions; and he confidently expected that the effect of enrolling all would be to place the protecting our country on elevated ground. Should he ever meet a man who looked upon defending it as beneath him, he should place him on the catalogue of the enemies of the country.

The fourth objection is, that the arms and accoutrements, now in the hands of the militia, are not generally fit for actual immediate service.

Mr. G. said he was well aware of the validity of this objection. Not an inconsiderable portion of the arms now met with in the ranks of the militia were such as would not be tolerated in the army.

Mr. G. said we have two national armories, one at Springfield, and the other at Harper's Ferry, at which arms are fabricated for the use of the regular army. At these the musket now costs $12 25, and the accoutrements complete cost $3 01, making $15 26. Hall's rifle costs $17 50, and the accoutrements for it $4 05, making $21 55. The carbine costs $18. Since the Revolution, great improvements have been made in the manufacture of powder, and it now has nearly double the strength it then had. It follows, of course, that a corresponding change is required in the strength of the musket. The change is now introduced in our armories, and hereafter they will not only possess the requisite strength, but will be so constructed that each part of a musket will fit any other one of a like construction.

In addition to the two national armories, there are six private ones, at which such arms are made as are designed to be distributed under the law of 1808, providing for the arming of the militia. At each of these armories all arms are inspected and proved by agents of the ordnance department, before they are received by the Government. At these trials many are condemned. Others, that have been in the use of the Government, are condemned as unfit for the army. All these condemned arms are now sold, and a vast number of them are found in the hands of the militia. That very many of them are worse than useless all must admit; and he hoped, hereafter, measures would be adopted to prevent the increase of this evil.

Mr. G. said he would add, that some of these refuse and condemned muskets were sold as low as four dollars and fifty cents. Another portion, now in the hands of the militia, were the relics of our former wars, of different magnitudes and constructions, and covered with the rust of the last century, and many in the worst possible order. He thought many a regiment, if faced about to meet an enemy, would find a very large portion of their arms quite incompetent for defence. Many, also, would prove far more fatal to their possessors than to the enemy. Their faultiness would prove fruitful in disasters, produce confusion and dismay, which would be likely to end in defeat and disgrace.

To guard against the evils calculated to flow from this source, he had proposed that the Government should furnish all the arms and accoutrements. Then all the articles used would be of the best quality, and fit for instant use.

The soldier requires the same guarantee from the Government of the goodness of his arms with which he defends the country, as he does of the genuineness of the coins in which his wages should be paid. Why should the militiaman, the efficacy of whose first aim may so materially affect the question of success, be supplied with an inferior article? It may be said he should buy the genuine article; in reply to which it may be asked, where can it be purchased? The valuable products of the national armories are not thrown into market for sale; and, if they were, self-interest or necessity would induce a large majority to purchase the inferior article, on account of its cheapness. The poor article, which is one of mercantile speculation, is almost the only one within his reach. Hence the militia are compelled to purchase the refuse article thrown from your armories, the like article from abroad, or such as are manufactured by individuals on speculation, where there is no guarantee of quality beyond the external appearance. It is useless to require the militia to furnish their own arms, when they are so seldom fit for actual service. The Government should furnish them, and keep them at such places as will enable the minutemen at all times to be supplied with a first-rate safe article, to be returned when no longer needed.

A fifth objection is, that no military knowledge is derived from the ordinary trainings.

Mr. G. said he could not admit the truth of this objection to the full extent. In many sections of the Union there are those who profit largely by their efforts at improvement. Whole companies, and even whole regiments, had arrived at a state of discipline worthy an American militia, and even a regular army. His own personal knowledge enabled him to say that military talent had been frequently developed at militia trainings that would not suffer by comparison with much in the regular service. Still it must be admitted that less military knowledge had been generally acquired than a due regard to our welfare required. The average time that persons now train, in each year, is about three days; making an aggregate, during the twenty-seven years of service required by law, of eighty-one days. It had not been customary to call out the privates more than one day at a time; and the consequence had been, that between the trainings they usually forgot much of what they had previously learned. By the time the words of command became intelligible to them, the exercise was ended. He proposed to require the trainings to continue at least a week. During this continuous period, much instruction might be imparted, which would not be soon forgotten. The aggregate of service would be lessened more than one half, while the improvement would be quadrupled. Instead of requiring eighty-one days' service during the whole term, only thirty-six would be exacted, making a saving of forty-five days.

Mr. G. thought it impossible to keep up a military spirit in the country, without trainings and martial exhibition. He would ask when it was that gentlemen felt the beating of the high military pulse? The answer must be, at the time they saw a brilliant military array, conducted in an orderly manner. He well recollected it was these exhibitions that induced him, at an early age, to leave the quiet enjoyments of home for the camp of war, and regret still lingered in his bosom that parental authority had defeated his purpose of doing so. The periodical and protracted trainings which he had proposed would develop the military talent required in case of actual service, and would foster a spirit that would never yield to any opposing force. It would prepare a corps of active young men, ready for any emergency, the very existence of which would preserve domestic quiet and prevent all invasions. It would restrain the turbulent spirit of the Indians in the West, and cause them to respect our authority, which they would otherwise contemn. It would also restrain the outbreaks of that spirit which had been attempted to be excited at the South by the mischievousness or wickedness of fanaticism.

The sixth objection urged against the present law is, that it requires every person to equip himself at his own expense.

Mr. G. said he had, when discussing the quality of equipments in the hands of the militia, partially examined this point. He was of the opinion the true basis of all taxation is property. The tax should be laid, not upon the individuals, but upon the wealth of the country. No one would pretend that it would be just, or consistent with the spirit of our institutions, to tax the man who was not worth a dollar the same that you would one worth ten thousand dollars. Such a proposition would find favor in no quarter. If it should ever become necessary to lay a direct tax, is there a single member in this House who would propose to tax every individual, let him have much or little property, the same sum? Would any one expect the concurrence of the people in a proposition to tax all the free white able-bodied citizens between eighteen and forty-five years of age, the sum of fifteen dollars, leaving all others untaxed? The ordinary expense of a good musket, bayonet, and accoutrements, is about fifteen dollars, while the same quality of rifles and appendages cost about twenty. The law, which requires certain of our citizens to provide themselves with equipments, rests in equity upon the same foundation as the tax just mentioned. It is equally unjust, and as much at variance with the principles of free Government. He had provided in his propositions that arms should be furnished by the Government at its own expense.

Mr. G. said that the principle of the law which exacts a service in time of one citizen, not required of another without compensation, rests upon the foundation just mentioned. To individuals it was of little consequence whether you require of them a day's labor, or their earnings for a day. It is alike a tax. With the militia it is a tax, not imposed upon the community generally, but it falls usually upon that class of persons least able to bear it. What reason can be assigned why a man under forty-five, of the same wealth, should pay a tax from which his neighbor, who is a year older, is exempt? Why should we make a man who is able-bodied pay a tax from which a neighbor is exempt, because he has some slight personal defect, which may not prevent him from constant labor? Mr. G. said he could see no reason why those who were fortunate enough to hold official stations, and those who devoted themselves to particular elevated callings, should be exempt from taxes imposed on others in humble walks in life. They needed the protection of the Government as much as others, and should equally participate in the hardships and expenses of defending it. There should be no privileged orders. The laws should protect all, and all should be required to aid in their support in the preservation of freedom.

The same rule which you apply to others serving the public ought to be applied to those who serve it as militiamen. Not an officer, from the President to the least important town officer, goes unrewarded for his services. Every one is paid in proportion to the estimated value of his services. May you not as well call upon those public officers, who serve but a few days in a year in civil duties, to do so for nothing, as to ask it indiscriminately from those who are enrolled in the militia? The injustice of this tax had been distinctly admitted by legislation, in the State he had the honor in part to represent. A small number of militia, (non-commissioned officers,) had been exempted from a certain portion of the State tax, in consequence of the conceded and glaring inequality of the tax imposed upon them. The only reason why they are exempted from the State tax, (highway labor,) is that they bear the militia tax in a greater degree than others.

The object designed to be obtained by the establishment of our Federal Government is stated in the constitution to be, "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, to provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty." To accomplish these purposes, the constitution had given the General Government certain powers, and he had not heard a doubt expressed but what it extended as far as was necessary to sustain his propositions. Every President and every Congress, since Washington's time, had sanctioned laws which could stand upon no broader foundation than the principle he contended for. Under a power in these words, "to raise and support armies," during General Washington's administration, a school was established at West Point, where young men were educated at the expense of the Government, so as to develop and secure in the country military knowledge, a small portion of whom find their way into the army. There is certainly more reason for disciplining and improving those whose services are certain to be at the command of Government, than in educating those who may or may not form a part of the defence of the country. Under the power "to provide and maintain a navy," teachers were employed and young men taught; and he believed a school of instruction had often been proposed by the Navy Department, if not by Presidents. He was not, however, aware of any being instructed who were not already in the service of the country, and, in this respect, they were on a footing with the militia. Every Congress since its establishment, he believed, had voted appropriations for West Point. While that institution was sustained, he could not conceive how the expense of "organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," could be objected to. If these words do not authorize the Government to expend money, then he would inquire by what authority does Congress purchase and distribute books of instructions for militia officers; and upon what authority rests the act of the 23d of April, 1808, appropriating two hundred thousand dollars annually for the purpose of "providing arms and military equipments for the whole body of the militia?" He thought this law was an emphatic admission on the part of Congress that at least the burden of purchasing arms ought not to be borne by the militia who performed duty. The right to relieve from one part of the tax must be as great as it is in the other; and the duty of Congress to exercise that right, at a proper period, seemed to him to be equally imperative.

Mr. G. said he sincerely hoped that Congress, before the close of this session, would suspend a portion of those discussions which seemed to have little effect, except to exhibit ebullitions of political or personal feeling, and do an act of justice to the militia. Questions of order were of far less consequence to the country than a well-regulated and efficient system of public defence. He wished to see the efforts of the militia at improvement as elevated as their deeds had been glorious at Plattsburg and New Orleans. He hoped to see the time when this important arm of the public defence should no longer be spoken of with contempt and ridicule.

The law of 1808 was designed to be the means of placing arms in the hands, or within the reach, of "the whole body of the militia of the United States." Two purposes were had in view: to aid in the public defence, and to relieve the people from the burdens of providing themselves with arms. The manner of the distribution was left to be provided for by the State Legislatures. This had been different in different States. In Ohio, he had understood the arms were kept in depositories within certain districts—were used at trainings, and returned. This accords with the evident intention of the law of 1808, and met his hearty approval.

But why should we stop at this annual appropriation of $200,000? We are daily told of dire calamities that are to fall upon and overwhelm us, because we have so many millions in our Treasury. May not this money very rightfully and patriotically be used in furnishing the arms and the other means of defence for the country? Was there a more noble object than preparing to preserve and perpetuate our liberties? There are about 1,500,000 militia enrolled in the United States; and among all these, the latest returns show but about 400,000 muskets and rifles, including many fowling-pieces. It may be safely said that not more than one-half of these are fit for actual service. The number of brass cannon is two hundred and ninety-nine; iron cannon, three hundred and forty-six. The latest returns to the adjutant general's office show, in Michigan, ninety-eight muskets, and seven hundred and thirty-two rifles; Missouri, seventy muskets, and one hundred and fifty-seven rifles; the District of Columbia, one hundred and forty-four muskets, and sixty-six rifles; not a cannon in either, except four in the latter. Illinois, Florida, and Arkansas, do not return any arms. If these returns are correct, (and he had no reason to doubt them,) it showed most clearly the necessity of a speedy application of the energies of the Government, to put the country in a better state of defence. He had referred to these States and Territories in no spirit of unkindness; on the contrary, he wished to see the necessary steps taken to put them in a better condition. His attention had been turned toward those on the frontiers, to ascertain their condition, and their ability to repress Indian hostilities. There were men there, noble and brave men; but he looked in vain for the weapons of defence. He had looked in vain for that exhibition of strength and power which were likely to deter and repress savage vindictiveness. The weakness of these border States invite the tomahawk and scalping-knife. It sufficiently accounted for the Black Hawk war, and the present struggle in Florida. These two wars alone will cost millions. Half of their expense, properly used in arming and disciplining the militia on those frontiers, would have prevented the effusion of blood, would have secured the persons and property of our fellow-citizens, and kept in awe those savage hordes, whose friendships so often changed to hatred when the fear of chastisement no longer restrains them.

Is it consistent with the honor and dignity of this Government, is it compatible with the lessons of experience, to continue the present state of things? From these returns, it appears that only about one fourth of the whole militia have arms. It is true that there may be arms in several States not returned; but whether that is so or not, he could not ascertain. He could only look at what had been returned by the officers whose duty it was to make returns. The fault was not with him, if he was in error. The Government is now able, and let it move with spirit in this matter.

To provide muskets and accoutrements for the present number of militia will cost over twenty-two millions of dollars; it will cost those required to perform duty that sum. The expenditure from the public Treasury for the object and in the manner he had proposed could not excite local jealousies, nor prove a weapon in the hands of politicians, with which to fight their battles for power or place. Other propositions to use the public revenue have been met with various, and some of them by constitutional, objections. Some of them are calculated to increase local wealth, and build up the fortunes of individuals. History proves that, in practice, this increase generally occurs in favor of those whose fortunes are previously large, as they are the principal actors in controlling events. All cannot, in that way, share equally in the benefits conferred; but by carrying out his proposition, the benefits will be equally diffused to all parts of the Union, and will reach that class who are the pillars of our prosperity and protection, in peace and war—those who resist the encroachments of power, in whatever guise it may appear, and those who in person defend our country and her cherished institutions. His plan did not propose to increase the wealth of any, but to relieve all from burdens. It held forth no rewards to avarice or cupidity, but simply to prepare manfully to defend and protect our common country and her institutions, in a constitutional and equitable manner.

Let the means of defence be as ample, and the burdens on the people be as light, as possible. Fortify where necessary; make the naval preparations demanded by our position in the world; place all needful arms at proper points on the frontiers and seaboard; give your young men the proposed instructions, and insurrections will cease to desolate our cities; savage barbarity will cease to disturb the slumbers of our citizens, and spread desolation and ruin among them; and foreign foes will never venture on our soil, or trample upon our rights. While we have power, and exhibit it to the world, we shall command respect, and our rights will not be invaded. If, from our misjudged economy or parsimony, other nations shall think lightly of our means of defence, and our ability to command respect, we shall fail in having our rights properly appreciated and respected.

He hoped his propositions would find favor with the House, and, at all events, he trusted that this discussion would arouse its attention to the subject, so as to ensure speedy action in some form. If any good should result from the agitation of this question, he should feel amply compensated for the little time he had been able to devote to it. To his mind it was too important a subject to remain unattended to, and would not permit himself to doubt that the House would give it a full share of attention.

Mr. HAMER understood that this whole subject was already before the Committee on the Militia; and before he was called upon to vote instructions for that committee to report, he desired an opportunity of examining them.

Mr. GILLET explained that the instructions extended no further than to direct the committee to inquire.

Mr. HAMER was about to move to have them laid on the table and printed; but as they did not instruct the committee to report, he would not press the motion.

Mr. GLASCOCK, as chairman of the Committee on the Militia, stated that all the facts sought to be inquired into and embraced in the instructions intended to be given to that committee were already before that committee. He had, however, no objection himself to the adoption of the resolution. All the bills hitherto reported to that House at former sessions, and which, unfortunately, had never been acted on, were also then in possession of the committee.

Mr. G. further stated that he himself considered this a very important question, and believed that some measure should be enacted for the purpose of organizing the militia throughout the country. Knowing and feeling the importance of this question, he informed the House that a bill would be prepared before the adjournment of the present session, and presented to the consideration of the House. The bill would be presented after great deliberation, and important matters, taken from the bills heretofore introduced, would be incorporated in it. He believed such a bill would be reported as would meet the views of the majority. Whether it would be reported in time to be acted on during the present session of Congress was somewhat doubtful, from the press of business before the House; but it would, at all events, be reported in eight or ten days, and might be acted on during the coming session. He would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILLET] that any amendment he might think proper to offer might be offered when the bill came up for action. It had become somewhat fashionable to instruct committees as to what they were to do. This Mr. G. thought unnecessary. If gentlemen had any suggestions to make with regard to any plans they might wish to incorporate in any bill, they would always be listened to with attention by the chairman or any member of the committee. But, independent of this, let him ask, if the fact was not well known, that every individual had it in his power to offer any amendment, or any additional clause he might think proper, at certain stages? Bearing this fact in mind, it did seem to him that it was altogether unnecessary to instruct the committee on the present occasion. He conceived it wholly unnecessary, particularly as the very object of the inquiry embraced in the instructions was before the committee, and, at the same time, he begged it to be distinctly understood that he had no objection to their adoption.

Mr. HALEY moved the following amendment, to come in as an additional instruction to the instructions of Mr. GILLET:

"And that the Committee on the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying the militia of the United States, when called out for military exercise, inspection, and review, as now organized."

Mr. H. explained that he introduced the amendment at this time in order that the committee, before reporting the bill, might be in possession of the views of others in relation to the subject. He was of opinion that the militia ought to be paid. The Government found ways and means to pay every body else who performed any duty, with the single exception of the militia. They compelled the militia to perform services for three or four days in the year, subjected them to fine and imprisonment for neglect of duty, and all for nothing.

Mr. LINCOLN opposed the amendment at some length, and was in favor of the instructions of the gentleman from New York. He was entirely opposed to any provision for paying the militia, as it would tend to degrade the character of the freeborn citizen of this country, and assimilate him to the mercenary tools of despotic tyrants. He designated the proposition as in effect nothing more nor less than one to get rid of the surplus revenue. Mr. L. bestowed a high eulogium upon the character of the militia, citing various instances of their conduct, and hoped a measure would be introduced for its better organization.

At one o'clock the SPEAKER announced the special order, being the consideration of the appropriation bills; but, on motion of Mr. EVANS, the House suspended the rules, for the purpose of proceeding with the call for petitions and memorials: Ayes 112, noes not counted.

Mr. HAMER did not rise for the purpose of discussing the subject at present, although to him it was one of as much interest as perhaps to any other gentleman. He trusted, however, an opportunity would be afforded at the present session of Congress, for a full discussion of the question; he would then embrace the opportunity of giving his views to the House. He would say, further, that he admired the high grounds the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] had taken, although he could not agree with him in regard to details. He would say that there was no better material in any country for public defence, than a well-organized militia; and no country ever was free, or ever could be free, which depended upon a standing army for defence. But that was not the time for discussion, the rules having been suspended for the purpose of presenting petitions. He moved that the whole subject be laid on the table for the present, and the instructions printed; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. GLASCOCK, who stated that, when he was up before, he had only remarked that he was apprehensive that the bill would not have an opportunity of being brought up for consideration at the present session, as there were so many other subjects of importance before the House which would take precedence over it. It would, however, be reported in eight or ten days, and it would then be for the House to determine whether it should be considered at the present session or not. He would go with gentlemen in their efforts to get it up and dispose of it at the present session.

Mr. G. then renewed the motion to lay on the table and print; which was agreed to.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The bill making a further appropriation for suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida was read the third time.

Mr. STORER said he did not rise to oppose the bill, but merely to ask for some light on the subject. If it were necessary, he would vote for ten times the amount asked for, but he could not do so unless it was actually necessary. He said they had already voted half a million of dollars for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida, and to feed all the suffering inhabitants thereof; and he asked the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if he could show any reasons why they should vote more money. He said it was the practice with the committee of which Mr. S. was a member to give the reasons, when they reported a bill, for so doing; but there the committee which had the whole management of the appropriations of the House introduced bills without a solitary reason to sustain them. He wished to know what were the grounds for the appropriation at present asked for.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the reading of a letter from the Secretary of War, which, he remarked, would probably be satisfactory to the gentleman from Ohio.

The letter of the Secretary of War was then read, and the bill passed.

DAUPHIN COUNTY (PA.) MEMORIAL.

The House took up the memorial, heretofore presented by Mr. CLARK, of certain citizens of Dauphin county, Pennsylvania, asking an appropriation of money for the purpose of removing to the coast of Africa free persons of color and manumitted slaves.

Mr. CLARK having moved to refer the memorial to a select committee, and that it be printed, the question pending was the motion of Mr. PATTON to lay the memorial and the motion to refer and print on the table.

Mr. CLARK asked for the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. PATTON; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Booke, Boon, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, French, Fry, William K. Fuller, James Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Graham, Grantland, Grayson, Griffin, Haley, J. Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Hardin, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Jarvis, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, J. W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lansing, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Luke Lea, Logan, Loyall, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, John Y. Mason, William Mason, Moses Mason, Maury, May, McComas, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Montgomery, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parks, Franklin Pierce, Peyton, Phelps, Pickens, Rencher, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Roane, Robertson, Rogers, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sickles, Smith, Standefer, Steele, Taliaferro, Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Toucey, Towns, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Ward, Washington, Webster, Weeks, White, Sherrod Williams—129.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Bailey, Banks, Barton, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Carr, Casey, George Chambers, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Darlington, Denny, Evans, Everett, Philo C. Fuller, Granger, Graves, Grennell, Hiland Hall, Hard, Harlan, Harper, Samuel S. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Schenck, Shinn, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Storer, John Thomson, Underwood, Vinton—69.

So the memorial was laid on the table.

The remainder of the day was spent in the reception of memorials, &c.

Then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BELL asked the unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That, hereafter, the daily hour to which this House shall stand adjourned shall be 11 o'clock A. M., until otherwise ordered.

Objections being made,

Mr. BELL moved the suspension of the rules; and upon this motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend the motion so as to add the following: "And that the rules be also suspended for the purpose of enabling the committees to make reports."

The CHAIR stated that the motion was not now in order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BELL, it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 144, nays 43.

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the resolution by striking out "hereafter," and inserting "after the 1st day of April."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said we had no time to spare, and the sooner we began to meet at 11 o'clock the better. He should oppose the motion, and he demanded the yeas and nays upon it; which were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 82, nays 112.

Mr. HAWES moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till Monday.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he had turned back to the journals of several sessions, and found that it was usual about the 12th or 15th of March to commence the sittings at 11 o'clock.

The motion to postpone was rejected, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling the committees to make reports. Lost.

Mr. JENIFER rose, and said he would suggest to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. JARVIS] not to press his motion to reconsider the resolution submitted by him (Mr. J.) in relation to the General Post Office, as he had received, since the adjournment of the House on yesterday, a communication from the General Post Office Department, which was satisfactory, and precluded the necessity for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of executing the special order of the day.

Mr. BOYD moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of proceeding, this day, in the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the subject of the North Carolina contested election; and thereupon the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 121, nays 77; not two thirds.

The question recurring upon the motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of executing the special order of the 27th of January, it was agreed to.

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

The bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the year 1836 was then taken up in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MILLER in the chair.)

The question being on the motion of Mr. BELL, to reduce the proposed appropriation for the navy yard at Portsmouth from $67,000 to $33,500,

Mr. EVANS said he was aware that the immediate question under discussion was that which had just been propounded by the Chair; and if that had been the only question spoken to in this debate he should not have troubled the committee with any remarks upon it. Occasion, however, had been taken to go somewhat at large into the general subject of disbursements of public money for national objects; and opinions had been expressed as to the operation and tendency of the revenue laws of the country, which, though stated with great force and ability, and entertained, he doubted not, with perfect sincerity, were, nevertheless, in his judgment, entirely erroneous, and which, therefore, he thought deserving some reply. I do not (said Mr. E.) complain of the latitude of debate which has been indulged in, because, upon great and interesting topics of public policy, freedom of discussion ought by no means to be restrained. I may, however, be allowed to remark, that I do not regard the present occasion the most suitable, under all circumstances, which was likely to occur for so wide and general a debate, however important the subjects which have been drawn into it; inasmuch as bills of appropriation for larger sums and much greater objects are soon to be brought to our notice. This is a bill of indispensable necessity and urgency. It provides for the payment of the officers and seamen of the navy, of superintendents, naval constructors, and laborers at the several yards; for supplying provisions, medical and hospital stores, clothing, fuel, &c., to those employed in the public service, and to whom we are under the obligations of contract to make payment and to furnish supplies in the manner proposed by the bill. It further provides "for improvement and necessary repairs" at the various navy yards, for the security, protection, and preservation, of the valuable property which is there deposited. It contains, also, appropriations for other objects connected with the naval service, deemed of essential importance, and to which I do not know that objections exist in the mind of any one. It is, therefore, as I think, one of the last bills which ought to be delayed by an extended discussion upon general subjects of revenue and expenditure, of military and maritime defence, and of other topics incidentally connected with them. Each particular item, undoubtedly, ought to be well considered and scrutinized; and so far, certainly, free and full discussion ought to be allowed and encouraged. Nevertheless, as I have said, I do not complain of the latitude which has been taken, and shall be obliged myself to go somewhat wide of the immediate question which has been stated. Before, however, proceeding to the main purpose for which I have risen, I will submit a brief remark or two in reference to some of the items of the bill upon which gentlemen have spoken. In the main, unless I derive new information upon the subject, I shall give my support to the proposed appropriations. I do not, however, fall in at all with sentiments, rather thrown out than seriously advanced, in the earlier stages of the discussion, that estimates from the Executive Departments are to be taken and adopted, and appropriations made in accordance with them, unless their fallacy can be shown by those who object to the expenditure.

Estimates from competent sources are guides, and valuable guides, in forming our opinions, and sometimes may be the only guides we possess; but we have committees, to whose careful and rigid scrutiny these estimates are submitted, and who ought to satisfy themselves, and generally do, from all the sources of information within their reach, of the accuracy of the estimate, as well as of the expediency of the measure proposed. Every member will give to the estimates submitted to us just so much credit, and no more, as he thinks they respectively deserve; it is, nevertheless, his unquestionable right; nay, his imperious duty, to be fully satisfied of the wisdom and expediency of the measure recommended, before he assents to the appropriation of the money for its execution. It was, therefore, I hold, no unreasonable call upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, some time ago, for minute information of the specific improvements and repairs, and the necessity for them, designed to be accomplished at the navy yard at Portsmouth.

How far that call has been satisfactorily answered, by reference to the estimates of the Navy Commissioners, gentlemen will, of course, determine for themselves. My honorable colleague, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. JARVIS,] I doubt not, is prepared with the minutest information that may be desired. For myself, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I repose as much confidence, nay, more, in the recommendations and estimates from that source, than from any other branch of the public service. The navy furnishes as much of liberal, disinterested, and patriotic devotion to the interests of the country, unswayed by other and selfish considerations, as any class of the community whatever. The nature of the profession itself tends to expand the mind to an enlarged view of national policy, as affected by a naval establishment; and its distinguished and accomplished officers, I am sure, are above all local or selfish considerations. They are not apt to swerve from their own conceptions of public duty, to gratify any controlling power; nor are they seeking preferment and emolument in civil life, fawning round the doors of executive patronage, and adopting such opinions as may suit the interest of others to impose upon them. Recommendations and estimates from this source come to me, therefore, with strong claims to my confidence; and I can perceive nothing in the present instance to shake that confidence.

Something was said by an honorable friend over the way, [Mr. EVERETT,] of the expediency of abandoning altogether the navy yard now existing at Portsmouth; and, therefore, of withholding any appropriation for its improvement and repair. Others have spoken of the propriety of reducing the number of navy yards, by abandoning not only this, but several others. Upon this question I have hardly formed an opinion. Many considerations pertain to it; and its deep importance forbids a hasty determination. Much will be due to the results of experience; to the judgment of naval and scientific men, and of those most skilled in matters of this description. Some gentlemen have supposed that two yards of construction would be sufficient for all our wants. Evidently there ought not to be so few that, in case of war, any naval force that the ocean bears up could effectually blockade the whole, and that the destruction of a single one would be attended with great and disastrous consequences. But, sir, we are to take things as we find them. The navy yards are now in existence, established by law, and holding large amounts of public property. If there be too many, or if any of them be located at an improper place, abolish those which are unnecessary, by all means; but do it by a law for that particular purpose. So long as they are in existence, must we not preserve them, improve them, repair them? Shall the timber and other materials on hand be suffered to decay, and the works fall in ruins, for the want of adequate protection, because doubts may exist in some minds whether we have not more yards than are necessary? If it were so in truth, the remedy is not to break down or wear them out, by the indirect mode of withholding appropriations, but by a law, duly considered, having the concurrence of all branches of Government, to reduce the number, and at the same time to provide for the security and preservation of the property placed within them. Inasmuch as the existing yards were established upon mature deliberation, by those competent to judge, and who had been invested with the power, they ought not, in my judgment, to be abandoned but upon mature deliberation also, and a clear conviction that they are not essential to the interests of the country. I would not, however, make large and permanent improvements at any one, so long as a serious and well-founded intention existed of attempting its abandonment, and while it might be regarded an unsettled question whether it should be continued or not. These are some of the general principles which seem to me proper to be regarded in coming to a conclusion upon the various items of the bill under consideration.

An objection was made in some quarter of the House, a few days ago, to the continuance of the navy yard at Portsmouth, founded on its vicinity to that established at Charlestown, it being supposed that both are not necessary within the short space of sixty miles. If it were so, the question would then arise, which of them ought to be abandoned? My honorable colleague [Mr. SMITH] repelled this objection by referring to the long extent of coast eastward of Portsmouth which was almost wholly without defence, and which he thought ought to be taken into account in computing the proper distances for naval stations. This proceeds upon the idea that a navy yard is a work of defence and protection; which, most clearly, it is not. It is rather a means of weakness; in other words, it invites attack; it requires to be defended, instead of furnishing defence; and I imagine it will be found that appropriations for fortifications have been much greater at points where navy yards exist, from that very circumstance, than would otherwise have been made. A member from New Hampshire [Mr. CUSHMAN] spoke the other day upon the importance of retaining the present establishment at Portsmouth, because it was a safe harbor, free from ice in the coldest seasons, and always accessible; and he supposed a case of a national ship, returning from abroad in midwinter, chased by a superior force, which might be captured or destroyed unless it could enter a port accessible at that inclement period. In the case put, I see no particular reason why the vessel might not as well seek shelter in Portsmouth harbor, were no navy yard there, as if there was one. No absolute necessity requires a ship of war to enter a port where a navy yard is located, particularly if the purpose be to seek protection. It may be of convenience to do so; but the argument, carried out, would go the length of maintaining that there should be many more navy yards than now exist, if we are to provide for every supposable case of contingency or convenience. The waters of Portsmouth harbor will be as deep and unobstructed in winter, without the yard, as with it, and will furnish as safe a retreat. I notice these arguments, which I deem untenable, not because I am opposed to the continuance of the navy yard at Portsmouth, but for the reason that I shall hereafter have occasion to submit some observations upon what I consider the true and only principle which ought to prevail in determining the location of public works designed for the benefit and protection of the whole country; and because, also, arguments similar to these have been used in regard to other places, which I may also notice before I close. A navy yard of construction, where ships of war of various classes are built and repaired, is one thing; and a naval depot, where they may be fitted out, and perhaps slightly repaired also, where they may enter for protection or other purposes, is another thing. Probably more establishments of the latter and fewer of the former kind may be found expedient; but upon these topics I hold myself uncommitted until some definite proposition is offered, when it will become my duty, as well as that of others, to be possessed of all the information essential to a just decision of it.

Mr. Chairman, dismissing, with these remarks, the particular subjects presented in the bill under consideration, I come to the chief purpose for which I have risen; and that is, to notice some of the arguments used by my honorable and eloquent friend from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] against the system of disbursements generally, and which, in his judgment, justifies the withholding further appropriations until a radical change be effected in the policy hitherto observed. I shall speak of the general scope and spirit of his argument, rather than follow the minute details upon which it is founded; because, even if his calculations of past and proposed expenditures be correct, they do not, in my opinion, furnish just ground for the course he indicates, nor a firm basis for our future policy. The honorable gentleman contends, if I do not entirely misconceive him, that the whole past policy of the Government, in regard to its disbursements, has been unequal, unjust, and oppressive; drawing almost its entire revenue from one section of the Union, thereby impoverishing and exhausting it, and pouring down its fertilizing showers upon another, which is daily growing richer and more verdant under its benign influences. The Government, he says, visits one region only as a tax-gatherer, levying reluctant contributions with unrelaxing severity; while to another it goes as a beneficent dispenser of benefits and favors. This is an injustice which, he contends, no free people ought to submit to, and which, when the facts are understood as they will be understood, he says, they will not submit to. It is no Government for them; slaves to such oppression they will not be; liberty is the greatest object of their desire; and liberty they will have, even at the hazard of the Union. Sir, I had indulged the hope that the period for discussion and sentiments like these had passed away, never to return; that the clouds which once lowered upon us had been dispersed, and in the "bosom of the ocean buried." Nothing, surely, is more to be deprecated than discussions of a geographical and local character. They lead to no good; they engender much of evil feeling; and I cannot but think we should better serve the cause of our country by efforts to allay popular excitement, than by fanning up the flames of discord; by striving to increase the confidence and the affection of the people towards our institutions of Government, and pointing them to the blessings it confers, than by furnishing motives and incentives to disunion and disaffection, and weakening the hold which they have upon the perpetuity of the Union. I presume not, however, to judge for others. My honorable friend, I have not the slightest doubt, entertains the opinions he has expressed, with the most undoubting conviction of their truth, and in all sincerity; certainly, he has stated them with great fairness and ability. But the more sincerely they are cherished, and the more ably vindicated, so much the more dangerous do they become, and the more important it is to examine them, and to refute them, if it may be done, in the same spirit of candor and sincerity.

The first position which has been taken is, that the South pays a very large proportion of all the revenues of the country. This is founded on the assumed fact that it produces almost the entire amount of the exports which go in exchange for the imported articles upon which customs are levied. The doctrine is not new upon this floor, although it is somewhat new to the world. It is the discovery of our times, called out by peculiar emergencies for a particular crisis of affairs, and, having answered its end, had passed away, I supposed not to be again revived. I have heard it maintained with transcendent ability in this hall, but never without being refuted. Practical statesmen, financiers, writers on political economy, of any reputation, nowhere within my knowledge adopt the theory which forms the basis of the assumption. The doctrine I had thought to be well established, that the consumer pays the duty; that it incorporates itself with, and forms a part of, the cost of the articles upon which it is levied. The argument upon the other side is, that the producer—the grower of that which goes abroad to purchase a foreign commodity—whether he send it or not, or whether he receives its return or not, in reality pays the duty upon importations. It is said that he receives for his productions just so much less by the amount of duty than he would receive if no duty were imposed upon the foreign importation. It is very true, sir, that all we receive from abroad we must pay for in productions of our own, the fruits of our own labor upon the land or the ocean, in the forest or the field. If my honorable friend is the grower of a hundred dollars' worth of cotton, which he exports to procure his supplies, and I am the grower, so to speak, of a hundred dollars' worth of money, which I send for the same purpose, or which I pay him for an equal amount of cotton, are we both not taxed alike upon the return of our adventure? Has he paid the duties upon my goods as well as upon his own? When Government has levied its contributions, have I more left than he has? But it has been said his cotton would be worth more abroad, would bring him larger returns, but for the duty. Would not my money also? We both want articles of foreign growth, which we import, and both must pay Government for the privilege of importation. In what way we pay the foreigners who raised or manufactured them is not material to the question, unless it can be shown that his productions, and not mine, are depreciated in value abroad, by reason of the duty payable here. Now, sir, the value abroad of the productions of the South is not, as it seems clear to me, affected by the revenue laws of this country. Value depends upon demand and supply; upon the state of the market at home and abroad; upon foreign competition. Is the cotton in the warehouse at Charleston worth any less because it is destined for Europe, than it would be if destined for the factories of New England? Is it worth any less in Liverpool or Havre, because we impose duties upon English and French fabrics, than similar cotton from Egypt or South America, where no duties, or much less duties, may be required?

Naval Service Bill.

I do not design, sir, to go into the argument of this complicated question, which is large enough, and broad enough, of itself, for more time than I intend to occupy. The honorable gentleman did not himself argue it, although he reiterated it many times, and in various forms of expression. All I wish to be understood to say is, that just so often, and with just so much of sincerity and confidence as he repeated it, and in just so many forms and modes, I deny it. It is a doctrine which has not been, and, in my judgment, which cannot be, maintained. As to the argument that, even if the Northern sections, as consumers, do pay their just proportion of the revenue derived from customs, it is compensated and made up to them in the profits derived from the protection given to their manufactures, and that the unjust and unequal operation is thus continued, I have to say that this opens the whole question of the effect and operation of protective laws, which is another and a distinct question, and depends upon other considerations. I do not understand that the gentleman, or any body else, proposes to modify the law regulating the tariff of duties. Should that become a matter of discussion, I think it may be demonstrated, as it has been before, that the operation is not such as is supposed, nor to the extent that has been attributed to it; and that the South has no just grounds of complaint that especial favor has been shown to the North. But I forbear also to tread upon that ground. The occasion does not require it. The honorable gentleman has spoken of the public lands as a source of revenue; and he declares that this is "a revenue derived exclusively from the South and West;" that it is a perpetual drain upon their resources, exhausting and impoverishing in its effects; that they cannot endure this "eternal depletion," and do not deserve to be free if they do. Sir, I confess myself not a little surprised at this statement, and no less so at the argument which is founded upon it, and the remedy proposed for evils imagined to exist. Is it true, sir, that the South and West are thus drained and exhausted? Do they furnish all the money which goes into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands? Where do they get it? The domain, I am aware, is situated in the West and South; but do the purchasers therefore belong to these regions? Are not the land offices open to all the citizens of the United States? The truth undoubtedly is, that active emigration is, and for a long time has been, going on from the old and settled States to the new. They furnish not only the money to buy the land, but the men to cultivate it, and are themselves drained, so far as this goes, in both ways. So far from its being the fact that the West is drained of its money, it is constantly receiving large, very large, accessions of capital and wealth from the older regions. Property is continually going in search of new investments; is transferred every day from the cities, from the Middle and Northern States, to the West, to be there used and employed. Of the extensive purchases, too, made by speculators, a share—and I believe a considerable share—of the means is furnished by other sections of the country. Undoubtedly, emigration takes place from the older planting States of the South to newer and more fertile lands in that section, and probably carries away both men and money; but what then? Is Government thereby draining and exhausting the State? Individuals, seeking to improve their condition do and will go, and ought to go, where their interest dictates; where they can better promote their happiness. Large fortunes have been accumulated in the productive lands of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida; and probably by emigrants from the Carolinas and Georgia. They have purchased at a very low rate, and far below its real value, some of the richest land the sun shines upon. Has Government, by thus parting with its domain, impoverished any body? has it been unjust or oppressive? has it inflicted any evil for which it ought to make restitution? And what is the remedy contemplated for the supposed injury? Nothing less, indeed, than that Government shall restore the money to the regions from which it has been drawn, by disbursements and expenditures, to counteract the exhaustion said to be experienced by this process of acquiring valuable domain for an inadequate price. The proposition seems to be to give to the States, in some shape, where the territory lies, all which they have paid in procuring a property worth much more than they pay for it. Indeed, sir, that is a mode of distribution I shall hardly be willing to agree to. Emigration is going on, and will go on; capital and property are constantly passing and repassing; and we have not the means, and ought not to have the desire, to restrain its freedom.

The people ought to be left free to seek their own comforts and welfare. If they purchase and settle our lands, they receive a liberal sum for the money they pay; their condition is improved, and their wealth increased. It is a strange doctrine, that while individuals are enriched, towns are growing up, rivers and channels of communication are being opened, and population out-running all calculation, the country itself is drained and impoverished. No, sir, the tide of wealth is setting the other way. The aspiring, enterprising, and ambitious, are bending their steps westward, carrying with them property, and skill, and industry, and the means of accumulating wealth. But if it were true, as the gentleman contends, that the chief, almost the total amount of the receipts into the Treasury is derived from the South, or the South and West together, what then? Whose is it? Is it not a common Treasury? Is it not the money of the whole country? Must it not be disbursed for the common defence, the general welfare, the public interests? The mode of raising it may be wrong; and, if so, correct it; but, having been raised, is it not the money of the whole nation? Surely it is. How is it to be expended? how used? The honorable gentleman has laid down a principle, to which he seems to attach great value, and which would obviate, in a considerable degree, the oppression now experienced. It is, that the disbursements of the public money should be equal in the various sections of the Union. The Middle and Northern States he regards as a "favoured region," wherein by far the largest disbursements are made; while the South has had, comparatively, few returns from the vast amount it has contributed. How is this idea of equality of disbursements to be carried out? By what rule? According to geographical extent of country, which at one time seemed to be uppermost in the mind of my eloquent friend, or according to population, to federal numbers, or to the amount paid by each into the Treasury? Sir, there is but a single rule to be adopted upon this subject. It is to make the expenditures precisely there, and no where else, where the public exigencies, the public interests, the public security, require them to be made. If a fortification is wanted, it must be built where it is wanted, where the national defence requires it to be; and not where the rule of equality of distribution would locate it. So of a navy yard, a harbor, or any other work of national importance. As to the precise point where they should be, even upon these principles, undoubtedly opinions would vary; but, like all other subjects of legislation, it must be decided by those to whom the decision is intrusted. The duty imposed upon us by the constitution is to provide for the defence of the whole country; and it can only be discharged by securing those points where defence is required. Are we quite sure this can be done, if we are trammelled by the rule of equal distribution? The gentleman seems to me to reverse the relative order of means and objects. He regards the disbursement of the money as the object to be gained, and the construction of works of defence as only the means of its accomplishment; whereas the true and sole object is to provide for the defence and welfare of the country, the expenditure of the money being merely incidental and auxiliary. To what extent is this rule of equality of distribution to be carried? Will you refuse to erect a fort or to establish a navy yard in one section, however loudly demanded by the public interests, unless you also make a corresponding disbursement in another, where no public exigency requires it? No one will contend for this. Equality or inequality of disbursements has, in my mind, exceedingly little weight; and, indeed, I doubt whether it ought to be considered at all. Show me in what spot the public interests, the national welfare, require an expenditure, and I stop not to add up how much has already been expended in that section. If enough has not been expended to accomplish the permanent objects of national security and welfare, more must be granted. On the other hand, although you can demonstrate that another section has received little or nothing, yet, unless you also demonstrate that a work of public importance is demanded by a regard to public interest, I move not an inch to accomplish it.

Naval Service Bill.

I desire, sir, as much as any body, a system of equal defences, of general and common protection; but that by no means involves equality of expenditure. Some portions of the country, larger, and it may be more valuable also, may possibly be protected with much smaller disbursements than others of far less consequence. Shall not the less important be secured, because they would thereby receive a disproportionate expenditure? It is by all means desirable to provide a general and comprehensive system of defence, as well on the seaboard as on the frontier; but the only consideration fit to be weighed is that of public exigency. Equality of disbursements will form no part of the motive with me. I look upon the country as one, as a whole; and I wish to preserve and protect it as a whole, leaving no part exposed, and making no unnecessary defences merely to preserve a relative proportion in expenditures of public money. With these principles in view, I will proceed to examine some other sentiments of the honorable member, to ascertain how far his grounds of complaint are tenable. He has prepared, with great industry, (and I doubt not its correctness,) a schedule of the expenditures now proposed to be made in different sections of the country; and he objects to them, and will retain his hold upon the Treasury with a miser's grasp because the contemplated disbursements do not conform to the standard of equality of disbursements. Much the larger proportion, he says, is to be expended North. It may be so; I have not taken the trouble to go over the various estimates and bills, to ascertain whether it be so or not, for the plain reason that, in my view, it is wholly immaterial. Will the honorable gentleman point me to any one object proposed to be accomplished at the North, which is unnecessary—which is not demanded by a just regard to the public interest? If so, I go with him against it. Will he show me one object not provided for at the South, justly deserving attention? I will bear him company in support of it. But the honorable member does not attempt this. I have heard no objections to the works proposed in "the favored region," other than the inequality of disbursements. If, then, they be unobjectionable in themselves, why not make them? As to the objects which he enumerates as fit to be accomplished at the South, I must remark that the leading inducement seems still to be equality of expenditure. Let me examine this principle a little farther. A navy yard at Pensacola is an object which the gentleman urged with more zeal than any other; he said it would require about three millions of dollars to place it upon the same footing with that of Massachusetts. Ought it, therefore, to be done? Ought the three millions to be expended? Such seemed to be the conclusion. Well, sir, we have had, and may have again, vessels of war on the lakes, and probably navy yards also, to some extent. Will the honorable member vote to expend three millions for a dry dock and a navy yard on the shores of Lake Erie? It will equalise disbursements. Will he vote for it? Surely not. I ask him, why not? His answer I can very readily anticipate; because we shall never have occasion for such an establishment there; no public exigency requires it. The answer would be perfectly satisfactory. But, sir, if we must expend money at Pensacola because we have done so at Charlestown, why not on Lake Erie because we have done so at Pensacola?

[Mr. THOMPSON said he regretted to see the gentleman spending his powers upon arguments he had not used. He argued upon the utility of the establishment at Pensacola. He contended for an equality of disbursements only where it was practicable.]

I am aware, sir, the gentleman urged the utility of the establishment at Pensacola, and, if that had been his only argument, I should not have noticed it. I yield to it. My own impressions are strongly in favor of Pensacola navy yard, to some extent, but I am not entirely satisfied as to what extent. The subject is one of deep importance, and ought to be well considered. But the honorable gentleman certainly laid great stress on the other consideration; and, I must say, I thought it the leading and preponderating idea in his whole speech. He says now, he contends for equality of distribution, "as far as practicable!" I think, sir, that surrenders the whole question. The limitation, if I comprehend it, destroys the rule. How is it practicable to regard it in any case? If all the honorable member means is, that we ought to erect a work here, which the public exigency demands, because we have erected one there, which is equally demanded, I agree with him, but not for the reason assigned. I would erect it because the public exigency demands it, and not because we had disbursed money for a similar object elsewhere. If he simply means that he would provide a general, liberal, equal system of defence, according to the public wants, and upon the principles I have stated, and, in doing so, would equalise disbursements as far as practicable, I am very much inclined to believe his rule would have no effect whatever. The system would regulate itself, and the disbursements would, of necessity, I apprehend, be unequal.

The honorable member spoke of the various works already existing at the North, for which no corresponding establishments had been placed at the South. Did he show, or attempt to show, that the public exigency requires them there? But, sir, I do not think the distribution quite so unequal as he seemed to suppose. There are two armories—one in Massachusetts, and the other in Virginia—one North, and the other South. Are they improperly located? Do they subserve the interests of the country? Nothing is said upon these topics. They are not objected to at all; but the gentleman says, three more ought to be established: one in the West, one on the line between North and South Carolina, and one in Georgia. I ask, why three more should be established? Are not the arms wanted for public service supplied rapidly enough? Are the present establishments insufficient to meet the wants of the country? If so, may it not be better to enlarge them than to erect new ones? These questions have not been considered at all, and no answer has been given to them. Again: is it not worth an inquiry whether the Southern points, which have been designated, are favorable for such a manufacture? Do private establishments exist there already? I hear nothing on these topics. Favorable positions for any particular manufacture are generally first sought out by private enterprise. Government can hardly be expected to carry on a manufacture, either of ships or arms, or any thing else, economically and conveniently, where private efforts have either failed, or found no inducement to make the experiment. Is it quite clear, then, that the interests of the country—I lay out of view sectional and local interests—would be promoted, in any degree, by an attempt to establish manufactories, either of ships or munitions of war, where the sharp-sighted sagacity of individual interest has never yet discovered the means of prosecuting them successfully?

The honorable member further complains of favoritism shown to the Northern section, in the distribution of the existing arsenals throughout the country. He has, however, fallen into error in supposing there are twelve upon the North Atlantic, and but one upon the South. Arsenals have been established at various places, which I will name: one in each of the States of Maine, Vermont, and Massachusetts; two in New York, and two in Pennsylvania; and these are all that can be justly chargeable to the North. Indeed, one of those in Pennsylvania, at Pittsburg, is a Western location, and for the benefit of the West. Only six, therefore, are located on the north Atlantic. There is also an arsenal in each of the States of Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, Alabama, and Louisiana, in the District of Columbia, and in Florida; and a depot of arms at Charleston, South Carolina. The remaining arsenals are in Kentucky, Missouri, and Michigan. In running the eye over the map of the country, and considering the purposes for which arsenals are established, as mere places of deposit of arms, can it be said that the public interests have been injuriously neglected, or that sectional preferences have been shown? Arms, when wanted, will of course be wanted at or near the frontiers, where an invasion will be most likely to occur. An interior State, scarcely approachable by an enemy from any quarter, can, in the nature of the case, have very little occasion for a large military depot. But, without pursuing the subject further, can it be shown that any unnecessary establishments exist, or that important ones have been omitted? Until this be done, the charges of favoritism towards the North seem to me to have very little foundation to rest upon. The gentleman has referred to various other objects on which the public money has been expended; and has exhibited schedules, showing how large a proportion goes to the same section. Among others, he sets down a half million or more of dollars for provisions; a considerable sum for medicines, for ordnance stores, and $295,000 for "miscellaneous items." Why are these, and various similar expenditures, called Northern expenditures? Provisions, for instance, how are they procured? By contract. Bids are received from all persons disposed to offer. The South is not excluded from competition; and, if it will supply the demand upon equally favorable terms, it will receive its just proportion. If it be found that articles of this description are generally procured at the North, undoubtedly it is because they can be much more advantageously supplied from that quarter. The South, to some extent, is a purchaser for its own consumption, instead of having the means of supplying others. It does, however, furnish a portion of the provisions used in the navy; and the West supplies much more. Every thing wanted in the navy, or in the public service, will, of course, and must be, procured where it is to be had. North Carolina furnishes, of its own productions, no small amount; other Southern States and Territories supply most of the timber. An effort was made some time ago, and by none more strenuously than by Northern men, to introduce cotton canvass into use in our ships of war, and, to some extent, I believe, successfully. This is a Southern production, and the North certainly never resisted it because of its local origin. It is obviously impossible to adopt any rule of equalising expenditures of this description. There is but one safe and proper mode of proceeding; and that is, to procure the supplies of every description just where they can most advantageously be had. Sir, I could follow the gentleman through many other items which he sets down as Northern disbursements; and could show the fallacy of regarding them in that light. But, unless the objects to be accomplished are shown to be wrong, or that they can be better promoted elsewhere, unless the thing to be done ought not to be done, shall we omit it because it would involve expenditures at the North? If the country requires it at our hands, shall we fail to do it? Shall we neglect public interests because we find it impracticable to gratify local desires?

Among the objects to be accomplished at the South, before the honorable gentleman will consent to any further disbursements from the Treasury, he has named a navy yard at Charleston, South Carolina; and it may be proper to say a word or two, in this connexion, upon that subject. Is a navy yard required there? I do not say that it is not; but what are the proofs of it? What necessity appears to demand it? A report favorable to the object was made by the Naval Committee two years ago; and a petition has lately been presented from that city, soliciting its accomplishment. In both I find valuable information, but scarcely any thing of that very consideration which alone has weight in my mind—the public exigency. Does the country need another navy yard; and one at that port? That is the question. It has been shown in the papers I refer to, that there is a good harbor; a channel, if not quite deep enough now, capable of being made so; laborers and manufacturers of all sorts, and seamen always to be had. So far, so good. With these opportunities and facilities for spending money, comes in the argument of equalising disbursements.

It strikes me as not a little remarkable that we are called on by petition to construct a navy yard. Were it

H. OF R.]

Naval Service Bill.

a work of defence, like a fortification, it would be obviously right for a people or community to represent their defenceless condition, and solicit protection. But a petition to those intrusted with the administration of the Government, and who are supposed to know what is required by a just regard to the interests of the country, from a single city, for such an object, is somewhat of a novelty. It is founded, and proceeds altogether, on the idea of the local advantage to accrue from it; and, indeed, that object is pretty plainly avowed in the present instance. An argument very similar to this attracted my notice, some days ago, in favor of the continuance of the yard at Portsmouth. It appeared in the Globe, introductory to an article copied from a New Hampshire paper, at the request of some one who felt an interest in the subject, and was doubtless intended to have its effect with Congress in deciding that question. The argument was this: The navy yard at Portsmouth ought not to be abandoned, because—why? Because that town had given a democratic majority ever since 1828, and had stood firm during the period of the alarm which so extensively prevailed two years since, growing out of the removal of the depositories. That is the argument; and one hardly knows what emotion to feel—indignation at the profligacy of the sentiment, or pity for the miserable fatuity of intellect which conceived it. Sir, if not only the offices, the stations of influence and emolument, are to be bartered away for party support, and as rewards and spoils to servile followers, but the great measures of policy, the leading interests of the country, are to be swayed and influenced by such considerations, I am almost ready to say, with the gentleman, “this is no Government for us.” I admit, sir, that the argument in favor of Charleston rises one grade higher, but still is founded on sectional, local, personal interests. It is for the accommodation of Charleston, and the people of Charleston. I beg not to be understood as expressing opposition to the establishment of a navy yard in South Carolina, for I feel none. I am only combating some of the reasons which have been urged in its behalf, and which, I think, should have no influence whatever on the question. As to the necessity of another dry dock at the South, or elsewhere, I am not sufficiently informed; but if it is wanted only to equalise disbursements, even that object would hardly be accomplished. Much would still be furnished by the North; the very materials of which it would be constructed, if not much of the labor and scientific skill employed upon it, would be drawn from the same region, as was the case in relation to that at Gosport; and this single fact shows how impossible it is to make equal disbursements. Whenever attempted, it must fail.

I pass now, Mr. Chairman, to another object whereon large amounts have already been expended, and the estimates for which are said to be monstrously unequal. I mean fortifications. Where ought they to be established? What consideration ought to prevail in determining their location? Will any body pretend that equality of disbursements ought to have any weight in settling this question? I imagine not. The prominent considerations to be regarded are: 1st. The exposure; the liability to invasion; and the consequences, more or less general, of a successful invasion. 2d. The practicability of defence, within any just adaption of means to objects fit to be accomplished. Other considerations might be stated. Will it be pretended that, upon these principles, any of the fortifications already erected, or which are proposed to be erected, are useless and unnecessary? If it be true that the North has received a larger proportion of disbursements, (and I shall presently show that it is not,) has it been from any spirit of favoritism to that region, or from the absolute necessity of the case? What is the general character of the whole Northern coast? Is it not peculiarly liable to invasion—easy of access? Its deep waters, bold navigation, numerous bays, harbors, inlets, estuaries, afford ample opportunity for fleets to ride in security, and penetrate the country at innumerable points. It is, therefore, a coast particularly exposed to invasion by a maritime Power. Why, sir, in the State of Maine alone, there are more harbors, more accessible points, exposed to the incursions of a naval force, than in the whole thousand miles from here to Florida Point. What would be the consequences of successful invasions upon a coast studded with rich cities, prosperous villages, manufacturing establishments, and a numerous and dense population; whose waters are covered with innumerable vessels bearing the fruits of labor and industry? Is it not to be expected, is it not an imperative duty of Government to fortify and protect such a coast? Has it been done extravagantly or wastefully? Now, sir, as to the Southern Atlantic coast, its geographical character furnishes, in a great degree, protection against invasion. With shallow waters, difficult and dangerous navigation, few accessible harbors or rivers, can it be necessary to erect fortifications upon the same scale as a different coast requires? Has it not been sufficiently defended? These are the true points to be considered. Regard is to be had also to the consequences of the occupation of any particular post by an enemy.

If I were disposed to complain—indeed, I am disposed, and mean to do so, if something for the defence of Maine, the most exposed and the least fortified of any State in the Union, is not done—I might institute a comparison, showing how much has been done elsewhere, and how little there. The reason for its neglect so long has probably been an apprehension that an invasion, however harassing to Maine itself, would not be seriously annoying to the country at large. Many ports and places, of greater consequence in themselves than others which have been much more fortified elsewhere, exist in Maine; and yet I can well conceive their capture would be attended with less serious consequences to the country generally. Newport, for instance, from its central position in relation to other important places, is a most important station; and its occupation by an enemy in time of war would be the means of great annoyance and distress. Key West, of little consequence alone, yet from its commanding position, is of indispensable importance.

Considerations of this sort are all to be weighed in determining this general system of defence; and, in this view, can it be pretended that an undue proportion of works of this description has been located on the Northern coast? Let us consider, sir, what has in fact been done, and I apprehend gentlemen will find the results not precisely what they anticipate. Let us see whether it be true that the South has received nothing; whether it be indeed the vast ocean from which this great central sun draws up all the vapors that descend, in fertilizing showers, exclusively upon the barren fields of the North? Very little, sir, as we all know, was done prior to the last war, in erecting fortifications upon the seaboard. The system now in process of being executed was commenced and has grown up since that period.

In order to show the disparity in the amounts already expended, and proposed to be expended, in the two sections of the country, the honorable gentleman has made such a division of the coast as to throw Virginia into the North Atlantic region, instead of the Southern, where it appropriately belongs; appropriately, so far as the unequal and exhausting operation of Government is concerned. Virginia has always been one of the complaining States. It resisted the tariff. It is one of the producing States, and in all respects situated like South Carolina, so far as the principles in issue are concerned, except that it has received very large disbursements.

MARCH 15, 1836.]

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

In my view of the subject, I shall regard it as a Southern State; and, in truth, Maryland ought also to be so considered.

At the first session of the 21st Congress, a statement of all the expenditures upon fortifications since 1815 was submitted to Congress, and is among our documents. Up to 1820, the expenditures were very near three million of dollars, the larger portion of which, by far, was made at the South. From 1820 to 1830, beyond which the tables do not extend, the expenditure, South, for fortifications, was $4,175,958; and, in the same period, North, but 1,112,568 dollars. But, sir, I have a more full and satisfactory statement than this, coming down to the present period, obtained from authentic sources, and entitled to credit. It is "a statement showing the amount expended on the fortifications of the United States from the year 1812 to the year 1835, inclusive, including the unexpended balances of appropriations for works not finished." It shows all that has been done—and what is the result? Upon works North, including Maryland, the expenditure has been $3,447,772 44; upon the South Atlantic, it has been $4,547,951 55; and on the Gulf coast, $3,495,639 91. The North Atlantic, therefore, has actually received the least of either section. Have no fertilizing drops fallen upon the South? Other statements have been prepared and laid before us, showing the number of works completed, and of those in process of being completed; and, by reference to them, it will be seen that, of these two classes, by far the larger portion is at the South. When the works now being constructed are finished, the whole expenditure South, embracing the Gulf, will be $9,887,165; and at the North, but $4,027,364.

The fortifications of the Northern section have been postponed until those at the South should be completed. The gentleman says he will do no more until we have a general system projected upon principles of equality. The present system was adopted many years ago, (in 1818, I believe,) upon a full survey by a board of competent engineers and military men.

The fortifications deemed necessary were divided into three classes: those to be completed immediately; those at a later period; and the third class at a remoter period still. The first have been finished, and are chiefly at the South; those in my own State fell into the third class; and now, when this general system has been carried into execution, so far as the South was concerned, and we are approaching the period when our defences are to be commenced, the gentleman calls out for a new plan—a new survey—a new distribution. We have postponed our claims for defences in submission to yours; and are we to be thrown out of them altogether? This explains, sir, why the estimates are now so much larger for the Northern section than for the Southern. Until their works were completed, we heard of no new plan.

If more defences are required at the South; where, at what point? All admit the importance of defending the Gulf of Mexico and the mouth of the Mississippi. If it has not already been done, do it, by all means, and you shall have my humble aid at any moment. So of the South, or of the Western frontiers.

It is well known, sir, that to a distinguished statesman of South Carolina the nation is chiefly indebted for this very system of defence now proposed to be carried on and completed. New England, however it may have differed with him since on other topics, certainly gave him its support; not, I trust, from sectional motives, but upon liberal principles of public policy. He maintained a high, scarcely a second rank in the estimation of its people; and they have never ceased to approve that policy which he created and fostered by the energy of his lofty powers and patriotic efforts. New England certainly looked to him with high hopes for the future, and has regretted, deeply and profoundly, that these hopes have been blighted. I will not say how. From what quarter did the opposition to his plan of defence and to his general scope of policy come? Who was the chief opponent of his measures? Who were the leaders, and who were the followers, of the great radical party? Whose efforts were unceasing to reduce and retrench the disbursements, and especially those for fortifications? The gentleman must recollect, I think, that it was chiefly Southern opposition; and that the distinguished citizen of South Carolina, who has done much for his country—very much—leaned upon New England for support under the heavy load of responsibility attempted to be thrown upon him. If he has lived to see the measures of his own creation adopted by those who formerly resisted them, if the wreath has been torn from his brow to grace another's, has New England been accessory to it? No, sir; if Southern interests have been neglected, if liberal appropriations have not been made in past times, it has not been owing to Northern hostility.

Mr. Chairman, there are other objects of disbursement in which, I am aware, the South has very little participated; I mean internal improvements. If it has not, however, is it to be charged to an unjust and sectional policy prevailing in other quarters? The true reason is, that the South has uniformly opposed the system; has presented no objects to be accomplished by this beneficent exercise of power; has, indeed, utterly refused to ask or receive any aid for these purposes. Its policy, I admit, was dictated by high and stern convictions of constitutional duty; but are other portions of the confederacy responsible for that? Were they to deprive themselves of the benefits which they regarded not only within the power, but the duty also, of the Government to confer, because different opinions prevailed elsewhere? Are all the leading measures, is the vital policy of the country, to be controlled by constitutional scruples, however honestly entertained, of minorities? I am not questioning, nor intending, in the smallest degree, to impeach the wisdom or the soundness of the principle which the South adopted upon this subject, because that is a matter for themselves alone to consider; but when it is insisted that other and larger sections are to surrender their own opinions, and to be deprived of many of the advantages which they fondly had in view in establishing the Government, doctrines are advanced at war with the very genius of our institutions.

I do not know that it would have been a wiser and better course if the South, yielding its convictions—as all must, at some period or other, yield even their firmest opinions—to the long-continued policy pursued under various administrations, and sanctioned repeatedly by expressions of popular will, had regarded this as a settled question, as some of its ablest statesmen did regard it. It is altogether probable, however, that, in such event, a portion, and possibly a large portion, of the disbursements which have been made for internal improvements would have been distributed within their own borders. If they have shut themselves out from these benefits, is it just to charge a sectional policy upon other States?

I might appeal to the journals, and to every one conversant with the proceedings of Congress, whether the most liberal support of all public measures has not come from that quarter now denominated the favoured region—whether the great objects of improvement and defence, in the West and South, have not been generally carried by the aid of Northern votes—whether the votes of New England, particularly, have not been governed by an enlarged, liberal, comprehensive view of the national interests? I speak of what has been—of the past; and I am sure, so far as appropriations and disbursements are concerned, no ground exists for charging upon that portion of the Union a selfish, local, sectional policy. I claim for it the credit of having been liberal and generous. The disbursements for revolutionary pensions have been also instanced as favors to the North. If it be true that much of the amount thus paid goes to that section, is it an evil? Does it demand a remedy? Are the laws providing this inadequate and tardy justice to the decrepit and tottering soldier, who laid the foundation of our country's independence and happiness, with toils and sufferings, to be meted out and administered according to the narrow limits of State lines? If a large proportion of the money is dispensed at the North, is it not because a larger number of the survivors of that conflict remain there? This was to have been expected. That region, we all know, being the most populous and the most wealthy, furnished a larger proportion of the men and the money which achieved our independence. I make no invidious comparisons. Carolina and Virginia, and the South generally, did what could be done within their means. But, if its gallant soldiers have paid the debt of nature, if fewer remain to share their country's honor and gratitude, is it a reason why their companions, who are yet among us, should be forgotten and neglected—that, because they are not equally distributed, they should not be rewarded? Or is it contended that, because of the inequality, we should seek out some other objects of expenditure at the South, for the purpose of equalising disbursements?

Naval Service Bill.

Sir, there are already objects of expenditure at the South, in which the North does not participate. The Indian war now raging in Florida, and which has been estimated to cost from four to six millions of dollars, is one of them. I do not complain of the amount; it is necessary to be incurred for the defence and protection of the country, and must be expended precisely where the emergency requires. It will be expended in the South.

What would be thought of withholding these appropriations, unless we also contrive to raise a similar occasion for expenditures elsewhere? And yet, how does the principle differ from that which would stop disbursements for defence at the North, where the public security demands them, unless at the same time others are placed at the South, where they are not wanted? Besides this, we are annually paying large sums to the Indian tribes at the South and West. Our Indian relations are kept up at great cost. The money which is thus expended soon gets abroad, and circulates at the South and in the West, and is as truly a fructifying shower there, as is the payment of the officers and men at the Northern navy yards. I might also notice the expenditures for mints, authorized last year, and various other items of Southern expenditure, all showing that our disbursements are, and must of necessity be, made where the public service requires them to be, and not upon any vain attempt to equalise the amount among different sections.

The honorable gentleman seemed to complain that, at the present moment, Northern counsels prevailed in the Government; and I thought he attributed some portion of the neglect of Southern interests to this circumstance. Not one of the three Departments, he said, which are most connected with our fiscal operations, is filled by a Southern man. Sir, a defence of this administration, coming from me, would be a strange and unwonted sound to most ears. It certainly has as little of my confidence or approbation as of the honorable member himself. There is enough, and more than enough, of error to be combated, to use the mildest term, both in principles and practices, to give full exercise to all the powers of resistance we both can bring to the contest.

If the interests of the South have been neglected, under whose auspices has it been done? What counsels have prevailed? Does the gentleman recollect how large a portion of the time our Government has been in operation it has been administered by Southern hands, how very large a share of directing and shaping the measures which have prevailed has fallen to the same quarter? If the present administration has neglected the South, is the North responsible? It came into power by no agency of mine. Can the gentleman say as much? New England had none; but South Carolina had much, very much; no State contributed more effectual aid. If she has been disappointed and deceived—if the promised fruits have been withheld—are those who resisted, or those who favored, the change of administration, responsible?

The South, however, is not alone in its disappointment. The assistance rendered by the North—how has it been compensated? What has Pennsylvania received? Has not every leading measure to which it had been devoted for years, all its most firmly established and warmest cherished policy, been broken down and sacrificed? It has, indeed, had the empty honor of receiving some four or five executive appointments, chiefly bestowed upon leading gentlemen of old federal principles, for the purpose, probably, of keeping up the usages and ascendancy of the democratic party. What leading measure of Pennsylvania interests—I speak not of the measure of sustaining a party—but what single object of national policy and concern to which that State was wedded, has not been trodden in the dust? And even at this moment, is not the contest going on which is to determine whether its State Legislature—its State institutions, its State policy, its State pride, every thing over which State sovereignty spreads its protecting wings—is not to be bound captive to the victorious chariot wheels, to swell the triumphal procession in its unhalting progress? The States which labored most, and accomplished most, in building up the present dynasty, must abide, as best they may, the policy it has pursued; so must the individuals, persecuted and proscribed as they are, to whose vigorous efforts it owes its existence. "Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes."

The first victim, I remind my friend, to the tortures of the brazen bull of Phalaris, was the inventor himself. It was but a just retribution to the folly of inflaming the lust of power and the passion for vengeance in the breast of the cruellest of tyrants. They who have been followed with unsparring severity, as the only reward of faithful services and attachment, should have considered well the perils of the undertaking.

I do not forget, Mr. Chairman, the danger that the money which we appropriate may be used for party objects and purposes. But what then? We cannot change the Government, nor the hands to whom the people have committed power. It is their province to do that; and soon may they do it. But shall we, therefore, abandon the country? Shall we postpone its defence and protection? Shall we neglect our duty, because other agents, we fear, may be unfaithful in theirs? No, sir; I hope with the gentleman that better times and purer principles may once more prevail; that the good of the country, and not the good of a party, will again be the paramount object of every man's ambition; but, until that period shall arrive, the Government must be administered by those to whom the people have confided it, and the requisite means must be put at their disposal, even by those who have little confidence in their fitness.

The honorable gentleman seems to apprehend evil consequences of no small magnitude from liberal disbursements by Government, in its effect of building up and organizing a class of day laborers, who will not suffer disbandment when their labor is no longer wanted, but who will make their power felt in "lawless insurrection, or by the equally terrible process of the ballot-box." Events have recently occurred among the laborers of some of the cities calculated to give weight to this consideration. Combinations have been formed, and the power of the mob has been arrayed to control the price and duration of labor.

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

I perceive, sir, with deep regret, the spirit of disaffection abroad in the land, to which the honorable member refers; a spirit of subversion of our institutions, and of the salutary restraints of law; a spirit of agrarian warfare against the wealth and enterprise of the country, against whole classes of the community, against every thing firm and stable in society. Useful and valuable institutions are broken down, because they are "monopolies;" and property, for whose protection Government was in part instituted, is aristocratic. A spirit of general levelling seems to pervade the land. Sentiments like these, instead of being checked, have been promoted and fostered by those in power. The profligate and the idle, foreign paupers, and malecontents, are gaining in numbers and in power in the cities, and, there is too much reason to fear, exercise a controlling voice in political affairs. From such there is always danger. But with these are not to be included the great mass of the industrious, sober, peaceable, laboring classes of the community, who have a stake in the public improvement and prosperity, and in the just administration of the laws. They will neither by violence nor by the ballot-box impede the good order of society. A rise of wages produced by natural causes is no fearful omen—is not at all to be deprecated. The value of labor, like that of every other commodity, depends upon the demand for it, and the supply to meet that demand; and it is always regarded among the strongest proofs of a prosperous and flourishing condition that wages are high. It denotes energy, enterprise, activity, and a general spirit of exertion and improvement. In a stationary or decaying country there will be little occasion for labor, and wages will consequently be low. It is, therefore, in my judgment, no undesirable thing that wages should be high. I cannot assent, however, to the idea that the addition of some ten or twelve millions of dollars to the business of the country, in disbursements of public money upon public objects, will produce any sensible effect upon the price of labor. It bears too small a proportion to the whole mass of money in circulation, of business transacted, and of labor performed. Double the amount proposed to be disbursed by all the bills of appropriation was struck out of existence lately in New York in a single night; and, however severe has been individual loss and suffering, the business of the country has hardly felt the slightest shock from the blow. But, sir, if some evils are to be apprehended from the cause suggested by the gentleman, they are evils which must be encountered. Shall we stop all public works, hoard up all the money in the Treasury, do nothing for public improvement and public protection, for fear of promoting a spirit of agrarian cupidity and disaffection? If such evils exist, they are beyond our control, and inseparable from the condition of human affairs.

I am aware, sir, of the overflowing condition of the Treasury, and of the difficulty of answering the question, what shall be done with it? Without going into the subject at any length, I will only remark, that the time seems favorable for devising a judicious and liberal scheme of national improvement and defence. Our means are abundant for large appropriations, looking forward to several years. Let ten millions annually be appropriated for ten years for the navy and fortifications; distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States, as proposed in a bill which formerly passed the Senate, and we shall still have enough remaining for all our wants. The Treasury might bear this, I think, until 1842 at least, when duties are to be so largely reduced. The Secretary does not seem to think our means will be so abundant as I have supposed; but estimates from that source, of probable receipts, have recently not proved unerring guides. With the large amount now accumulated, and the constantly increasing receipts into the Treasury, I have little doubt that, after the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, enough will remain to make liberal appropriations every year (perhaps not so large as I have named) for national defence, and to carry on all the operations of Government. Why should it not be done? Why should it be hoarded up to pamper favored institutions, and to reward party adherents? That some liberal plan can be formed, and that it is required by the interests of the country, seems hardly doubtful.

The honorable gentleman, sir, spoke with eloquent fervor of the deep and abiding attachment of the South to the blessed Union of these States. I am not about to call in question the sincerity of his declaration. When the blessings, vast, numberless, unexampled, which, by the providence of God, that Union has conferred upon the people of our country, are for one moment considered, no mind, not utterly blinded to our best and dearest interests—no heart not utterly dead to the happiness of the human race, and the hopes of civil liberty itself—can be indifferent as to its preservation. What has it not done for human happiness and human advancement? From the lowest condition of anarchy, disorder, and weakness, of poverty and national degradation, it has raised us to an eminence of high and enviable prosperity and strength, of respect in the eyes of all nations, of regular government, and has established and built up all the institutions of social and civil life, for which I know not what history of the world furnishes a parallel. When did the light of heaven ever shine down upon more glorious and indubitable proofs of the efficiency and wisdom of human government than the condition of our country now displays? To all these the South cannot be insensible, cannot but indulge patriotic pride, and feel attachments to the Union not to be sundered for light and temporary causes, for imaginary grievances, for doubtful and contested theories of political economy. It will not calmly see this Union rent in twain, to be followed by what no human sagacity can foresee. But, much as the South is attached to the Union, it is attached to liberty more. Liberty is the first object of all its efforts and aspirations. Is the honorable gentleman quite sanguine that liberty, even at the South, will long survive the dissolution of the Union? Does he hold the bond of fate? Can he cast its horoscope? I am not disposed to enter into invidious comparisons, nor to question the resources, the capacity, the ability, of the South to maintain a separate Government, and to occupy a high position among the nations of the world. It is not unbecoming, however, to suggest to those who are most ardent in their faith, to weigh well all the considerations, to calculate all the vicissitudes pertaining to a subject so awfully momentous. If that disastrous event should occur, and an independent Government be established at the South, are all the rivalries, the passions, the ambition, the interests, which agitate the bosoms of men, and shake societies and communities as with an earthquake, to be smothered and annihilated? Are the hidden fires which heave empires from their deep foundations to be extinguished? Will no sources of discord remain—no clouds float in the clear vault over their heads? He has read the annals of our race and studied the human character to little purpose, who indulges in reveries like these. How is it even now? Is there entire unanimity of principle or purpose at the South? Do contiguous States, separated only by a narrow stream, entirely harmonize? In view of these things, what assurance can the gentleman have that, whatever befall the Union, liberty will still fix her chosen abode at the South? Is there any thing so peculiar in its institutions, its principles, its policy, as to induce the fond belief that her last footsteps on earth will be found there? In after ages, if some zealous votary, groping among the fallen ruins and scattered fragments of her temples, to rescue some monument of her existence from the remorseless hand of time, shall explore the vestiges she has left, will he exclaim of the South, exclusively, in the language of the Roman poet, "hic illius arma—hic carrus fuit?"

Sir, what sort of union is it to which the South is so devoted? A union and a Government which, under the impulses of popular caprice, or fancied wrongs, or temporary excitements, a single State may arrest and destroy; whose arm may be paralyzed, and all its powers subverted, whenever it may suit the purposes of a single State to do so; a union so ill-compacted and bound together, that on every occasion of a difference of opinion as to its constitutional powers, or on measures of policy, it may be forthwith severed. Is disunion the only remedy for errors of administration—for arbitrary exercise of power?

In all Governments, except the most absolute despotisms, and in ours more than in any other, questions of power and of constitutional authority will arise; and upon them the minds of men will differ. What then? Shall we have no government—no constitution? Shall we break away from our moorings, to embark again upon the great ocean of untried experiment? What tranquil haven invites us to its shelter? "Better to bear the ills we have," than to seek a remedy in the dark chaos of disunion. All history admonishes us of its deplorable results. Faction, commotion, discord, civil war: how have they not written awful lessons, as inscriptions upon the tombstones of nations! Does it not become us, then, the South as well as the North, the East no less than the West, to start back from this yawning and fathomless abyss of disunion, whose depths no human eye can reach, and from which the groans of buried empires send back fearful warning? God grant that we may not blindly, madly, rashly, plunge in, to explore for ourselves the dark recesses of its dreary caverns!

When Mr. EVANS had concluded,

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor, and expressed a desire to address the committee on the subject; but as the House had, he said, listened for some hours, with great interest, to the very able remarks of the gentleman from Maine, and as the hour of meeting would to-morrow be earlier than heretofore, he moved that the committee now rise.

The motion being agreed to, the committee then rose; and,

On motion, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAVIS moved to suspend the rules for this day, after the hour of one o'clock, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the contested election from North Carolina, (it being the first business in order until that hour.)

On this motion Mr. PATTERSON asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered: Yeas 122, nays 66.

So the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose indicated, was decided in the negative, two thirds being necessary.

AWARDS UNDER TREATY WITH FRANCE.

The rule was suspended, on motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, for the purpose of considering a motion heretofore offered by Mr. MASON, of Virginia, as follows:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies be printed of the report made by the Secretary of State, in answer to a call of this House, on the decrees of the commissioners appointed under the treaty of indemnity with France.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON was compelled reluctantly to oppose the resolution. The awards of the commissioners under the French treaty were for the benefit of individuals, and they might with equal propriety print an extra number of the reports of the commissioners upon private land claims, or the decisions of the Supreme Court. He had not looked into the documents, and had no idea of the expense to which they might be subjected by printing the proposed additional number of copies. It might, for aught they knew, require as great an expenditure as some of the books authorized to be printed heretofore by Clark & Force, or Gales & Seaton. It might possibly cost thousands of dollars; and, under the circumstances, he hoped the resolution would not prevail.

Mr. JOHN Y. MASON said the gentleman from Tennessee had mistaken the character of the document. The document intended to be printed was a list of the names of the individual claimants, with the amount of moneys awarded to each; and he believed the number of individuals did not exceed three hundred and sixty. But there was another and a much more important object to be attained by the publication of the document; which was, that in the negotiation which preceded the adoption of the convention of July, 1831, the principles upon which the indemnification was to be ascertained were considered as unsettled, both throughout France and in this country. That the greatest differences of opinion had existed on the subject; and that, up to the last moment, it had been considered that the French Government had been overreached. The great object of having the present document published was to show in a compendious form, that after cutting down the American claims by striking off every doubtful one, still they exceeded the amount stipulated for in the convention. It appeared to him that the publication of the document would have a most salutary influence, not only in our own country, but abroad. It showed that the claims were just, and to a greater extent than stipulated for in the convention, and therefore ought to be satisfactory. The great object of the resolution was to disseminate a most valuable document in relation to the treaty with France. So far as Mr. M. was concerned, he did not believe he had a constituent interested in the claims; but he thought the document one of great public importance, and in that view had offered the resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL observed that it was the policy of the Government to give important information, like the present, to the people. It was vastly important that their constituents should have all the information on such subjects which could be given them. He did not know the size of the work, but he understood it was in the hands of the printer to the House, and in type; therefore, that was the time to have it printed. The present was a matter of deep national interest. It was highly important that the principles on which the convention was based should be made known. He therefore hoped the motion to print would be agreed to.

Mr. GIDEON LEE said, although he trusted that the argument of the gentleman from Virginia would be conclusive with a majority of the House, in favor of printing 5,000 extra copies of this important document, he would give some minor reasons for the measure, besides the great motive of correcting the errors of Europe, and the errors of America, in relation to the amount of the spoliation, which this document was so well calculated to do. It was due to the claimants that they inform them of the amount of the dividend they might expect. For thirty years these sufferers had been deprived of their property. New generations had grown up; children and grandchildren, and very aged persons, were the recipients of these awards. In many cases, it was their sole dependence; and, small as it might be, they ought to be informed of the amount promptly.

Mr. C. JOHNSON remarked that, if the motion prevailed, they would next be asked to print large numbers of the awards of the commissioners under the Neapolitan, Spanish, and various other treaties, and also the adjudications of the Supreme Court. It would be just as proper to publish them in one case as the other. This would subject them to considerable expense, which he deemed wholly unnecessary. If the document in relation to the awards under the French treaty was of so much importance, it would probably be published in the Globe, which would answer the purpose of gentlemen, and save the expense of printing additional copies by the House. At any rate, he could see no propriety in publishing five thousand extra copies, when they had been informed that only three hundred and sixty persons were personally interested in the decisions.

Mr. RENCHER understood that this document had not been laid on their tables, and consequently they were not able to judge of its importance. He therefore moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution until Monday next.

Mr. MERCER hoped that the motion to postpone would not prevail, and that the resolution would be adopted.

The motion to postpone was then negatived, and the resolution was agreed to.

The hour of one having arrived,

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD again moved to suspend the rule for this day, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the subject of the contested election from North Carolina.

The motion was negatived: Ayes 106, noes 57—two thirds being necessary.

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House, pursuant to the special order of the 26th January, then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1836.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. BELL to reduce the item for the improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, one half, viz: from $67,000 to $33,500.

Mr. CHAMBERS rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The bill now before the committee is one containing not only appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the navy, but for purposes having relation to a proposed improvement and increase of the navy of the United States.

The items in the bill which have been discussed and are still the subject of discussion are those making appropriations for improvements and necessary repairs in the seven navy yards already established. These improvements are permanent ones, having reference to an increase of our naval force; and the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] is to reduce the proposed appropriations one half for these objects; and the case of Portsmouth, to which it is proposed to appropriate $67,000, was selected, as I understood the mover, from its being first named in the bill. The committee will consider the subject not in reference to Portsmouth only, but, to a certain extent, in reference to all.

The considerations that will influence my votes in reference to this class of appropriations, as well as others in this bill, are as to the policy and legislation of the Government in relation to our naval armament. If that armament is to be increased, (as I think it ought,) then that increase and its preservation demand the extension and completion of those navy yards which are necessary to the preservation of materials, and to the building, equipping, repairing, and preserving, our national vessels. If we build and maintain more vessels, we must have, as incidental, the necessary navy yards, docks, sheds, &c.

The great question that presents itself, in relation to many provisions in this bill, is, is it the policy and duty of Congress at this time to provide for an increase of our naval power? I am decidedly for that increase, not as a war measure, but a measure of peace. The war cloud that was suspended for some time over this nation and France is dispelled; there remains of it no longer even "the size of a man's hand" to be seen on our horizon. I had not, sir, any apprehensions of that war, for there was no cause for war; and I could not suppose that the French Government or people were disposed to engage in a war with us, and could not allow myself to think that those who were in possession of the powers of this Government would assume the awful responsibility of involving this nation in all the calamities of war, for causes so frivolous and ridiculous as those which occupied the attention and filled the correspondence of our diplomatic agents for the last year. It has all passed off, and we are called on to legislate now in reference to our existing relations of peace. In that relation, what ought to be our naval armament? It is important that it ought to have a rank and character adapted to the power, resources, and widely extended commerce of this nation, and that would correspond, in some degree, with the naval armaments of other commercial nations. The ships of the United States now whiten every sea, and are to be found in every port or harbor where there are men, money, and trade. In the northern and southern oceans, it may well be said that "its home is on the deep;" where our hardy navigators and seamen dwell for months, on the same ocean, taking from its waters a rich harvest of fish and oil to repay them for their much toil and many dangers.

Great as has been our growth in population and power, as a nation, (and, as such, it is unprecedented in the history of nations,) yet it is exceeded by our increase in commercial prosperity.

After the adoption of the federal constitution, in 1790, our population was 3,929,328; at this time probably about 15,000,000, being not quite fourfold. The whole imports of the country, in 1790, were but $23,000,000; whilst for 1835, according to returns and estimates of the Treasury Department, they are $151,030,368, being nearly sevenfold. The exports for the year 1790 were $20,205,156; for 1835, the exports reported are $118,955,235, being nearly sixfold.

A trade of such magnitude, with its innumerable ships belonging to our citizens, and having connexions and involving interests of value beyond all calculation and estimate, is entitled to the protecting care of the Government; and that protection is to be found in a naval armament that will pervade every sea, and occasionally show itself on foreign stations, and in the ports of our friends and commercial rivals. A few national vessels visiting foreign seas and ports will do more for the protection of our commerce and seamen, and elevate our national character and power in the estimation of a trading community every where, "than ministers or chargés" at every foreign Government, great or small, and commercial agents at every port. Foreign Governments have their intercourse with us through our ministers or commercial agents; but the trading community, which our citizens engaged in commerce and navigation will meet in port, or encounter on the high seas, will know and respect us chiefly by knowing that we have national ships afloat capable of protecting our trade, and that will protect it, and our seafaring citizens, against depredations or capture. It is this extended commerce which we now enjoy that constitutes a great source of national wealth in creating it for individuals. It is that which continually adds to, and gives employment to, American capital, skill, labor, and enterprise; finds a market for, and transports to it, our agricultural products; and brings to us, in return, articles of use and enjoyment from other climates and markets. It is the same navigating interest, along with our coasting trade, that forms the great nursery for American seamen; and it is this extended and increasing commerce that has filled our national Treasury with revenue, more than necessary to discharge a war debt, and provide for the reasonable expenditures of the Government, without being felt by the people.

Without a navy, our commerce and vessels would be continually exposed to piratical cruisers. These robbers and murderers of the ocean regard neither law nor right; they are outlaws on this great highway, who will capture our vessels and destroy life whenever they have the opportunity to do it with impunity. They are only restrained by their fears, and those fears are only excited and operated on by the appearance of armed national vessels in those seas which they infest. We well know that piratical cruisers, under the authority of the Governments of the Barbary Powers of the Mediterranean, were not restrained in times past from depredations on our commerce by treaties or remonstrance; even tribute did not secure from them promised protection, either to our citizens or their property, in that sea. It was not until our national ships were exhibited before their ports, and their guns heard and felt, as evidence of our power and ability to protect our trade and citizens, and of our disposition to do it, that our rights have been respected. It is the maintenance of a naval armament alone, by commercial nations, that even at this day suppresses piracy.

The necessity of a naval power, proportioned to the resources and trade of a nation, is attested by the experience and practice of every foreign Government of any rank in the scale of nations. The naval power of the following Governments is reported for the year 1835, as follows, viz:

	Ships of line.	Frigates.	Sloops & Brigs.	Steam vessels.	Total.
Great Britain,	167	217	324	40	746
France,	39	51	213	10	333
Russia,	22	25	107	4	168
Ottoman Empire,	18	24	90	—	132
Holland,	12	33	56	2	103
Sweden & Norway,	10	13	238	—	261
Austria,	3	8	61	—	72
United States,	7	10	24	—	41

The number of British national ships, of all sizes, in commission in January, 1835, was 182. France has seldom more than 40 of her national ships in commission; (48th vol. Niles's Register, p. 44,) though, as I will hereafter show, she has a large naval power that might very soon be prepared for service.

Whilst the United States are the second commercial nation in the world, yet, as a naval Power, we rank only as the seventh. If all other nations of great or even limited commercial character, though encumbered with a heavy national debt, and crippled in their resources and revenue for the expenditures of their Governments, have, in the course of their experience, found it necessary for their interests and security to maintain such naval armaments, then, sir, we are wanting in duty to our national character, and to our extended and growing commerce, in not adding to the strength and efficiency of our navy.

A navy is the safest, the cheapest, and most efficient means of national defence in war, whenever it shall be our misfortune to be involved in it. It is a calamity which hath happened to us, and may again happen unto us, though we should strive to avoid it. The wrongs to which this nation is and will be exposed, from foreign nations, are maritime wrongs; and they must be prevented and repelled by a maritime force. To the United States this description of force is essential—it is indispensable; inasmuch as our enemies, if they attempt to assail us, or invade our territories, must approach us by the ocean. Without a navy of proportioned numbers and strength, we run the risk of having our ships captured, our commerce annihilated, our harbors blockaded, and our cities pillaged.

With a naval armament, our enemy may be met and discomfited on the ocean, before he reaches our shores; the war may be transferred to his own territory, and his commerce and shipping will be subjected to our capture, or so much exposed as to compel him to withdraw his naval force from our coast for their protection. A naval force can be used for the protection of our cities on our whole maritime frontier; it can be shifted from place to place, according to the exigencies of the war; concentrated or divided, as circumstances may require. A naval armament has an advantage over permanent fortifications in this: that mistakes are and may be made in the selection of suitable sites for fortifications, and in the form of their construction; this occasions not only a positive loss to the nation, in the cost of that construction, but also affords to our enemy an opportunity to annoy and divide our troops; and, if such fortifications are not defended by an adequate force, they are liable to capture, and may become a shelter for the protection of that enemy. In the building and equipment of a ship of war, under the direction of our Navy Commissioners, with the skill and experience of American builders, there is no mistake; she is a model of her kind, and, if not required for service at one place, she can perform her part of defence or attack any where upon the waters that will float her. Another advantage of an efficient naval power in war, over permanent coast or inland fortifications, is, that it will afford such protection to our commerce that, notwithstanding war, we can carry on our imports and exports to an extent that will not only find a market for our agricultural products to a considerable amount, but supply our citizens with those foreign commodities which enter into the consumption of a large portion of our population, and which habit has made almost the necessities of family subsistence. The naval power of England has afforded such protection to her commerce that, in the late war with France, her powerful maritime enemy, the prices of imported articles are said to have been varied but little in her markets during that war; her citizens enjoyed the use of those groceries and other commodities that were foreign to their soil and climate, at a cost little above what they were accustomed to pay in seasons of peace.

Whilst the citizens are thus enabled to pursue their trade and commerce, even with some limits, under this protection, the Government draws from its customs on that commerce its most convenient revenue, so essential for the ways and means of prosecuting that war, and as a resource very desirable.

What were the experience, losses, and suffering of this nation, in its last war with England, in these particulars, for want of a naval armament? No sooner had the enemy blockaded our harbors, than both foreign and domestic commerce were reduced at once to the most deplorable condition, producing, in its consequences, the failure and ruin of thousands of our most enterprising merchants, and many others whose occupations and business were, in any way, connected with or dependent on commerce. The planter and farmer were deprived of a market for their agricultural products, which were allowed to waste on their hands, or be sold at a price reduced in consequence of the limited demand, and the great hazard of any exportation. The supply of foreign articles, which the habits of our citizens had made a part of their family necessities, was either cut off, or their prices so exorbitant as to amount to a denial of their use to all but the affluent.

The coasting trade—that nursery for American seamen, and most important branch of our trade and navigation—was destroyed. The Northern and Southern States could not exchange their agricultural or manufacturing products, except through a land carriage, which enhanced the price of every thing more than twofold.

Our exports, which were in 1811, the year before the war, $61,316,833, were reduced in 1814 to but $6,927,144; and our imports, which, in 1811, were $53,400,000, were reduced also by the war, in 1814, to $12,965,000. The revenue from customs was, from this diminished trade, reduced almost to nothing. Had our commerce been protected by a naval armament proportioned to our resources, trade, and extensive maritime frontier, and that would have raised the blockade of some of our ports, our trade and commerce would have been supported to an extent that would not only have accommodated and enriched our citizens, but afforded to the Government a revenue (arising from the increase of trade) that would have more than supported the expense of the naval armament. The means of national defence of this character provides for its own support, by protecting the commerce of the nation, and advancing the revenue for the support of Government. An efficient navy will be our great security and strong arm of national defence, not only in war, when unavoidable, but it will have a powerful influence to prevent war. Our foreign enemies know that we are to be assailed through our maritime frontier, and by a maritime force. To maintain such a force on our coast will be, to that enemy, hazardous and expensive in the extreme, if this Government should be possessed of a navy of any efficiency to assail it. To annoy this nation, if we maintain an efficient navy, would require an enemy to have on our coast a navy double that of our Government. The cost and equipment of such a navy, and the difficulties in maintaining it on our extended coast, will deter most nations from embarking readily in war with us, or in doing us wrong. But without an efficient navy, our extended maritime frontier and our extended commerce would invite the attacks, depredations, and war, of nations who may be our rivals in trade, or who are jealous of our prosperity, and the success and influence of our republican institutions, and with whom the power will be the right.

The period to which we can refer with the most confidence for lessons from our own experience, in relation to this important national subject, is the last war with England. So small was our navy at that eventful period, that many a cautious statesman questioned the propriety of exposing it, out of our own waters, to be captured by our powerful enemy. It is unnecessary for me to detain the committee with any history of its many gallant victories and efficient service; it is a part of the history of the nation and of the times. It fought itself into national favor, and brought into our ports the captured ships of the enemy, as the trophies of its service and gallantry; and the glory then acquired has never since been tarnished. Our navy entered that war with a force, exclusive of gunboats, that carried less than 450 guns; and for the 141 guns which were captured by the enemy, it captured from the same enemy 455 guns; thus taking from the enemy more than its original amount of guns, and more than three guns for every one it lost. For so limited a navy, here was evidence of efficient service; and by such heroic achievements its officers and crews gained for the American navy imperishable honors.

Had we possessed during the last war a navy adapted to our power, commerce, and exposed frontier, we would have escaped much of the evils and sacrifices of that war. With its protection, we should have enjoyed a considerable portion of our trade—a source of employment and profit to some classes of citizens; of accommodation and comfort to others, and of general benefit to our citizens; whilst the Government would have derived a revenue from its customs that would have more than sustained the whole cost of that naval armament, without inconvenience to our citizens. If we had possessed such a navy, our coasts would not have been ravaged, our harbors blockaded, our towns pillaged, and our citizens harassed by calls to defend our shores and cities, with sacrifices of health and life, and at an immense cost to the nation.

If the navy of this Government had then been of sufficient force, the Chesapeake bay would not have remained during that war so long in the possession of the enemy, or the Capitol of the nation, and the ground on which we now stand, have been defiled by the footsteps and conflagration of the enemy, whose commanding officers, for a season, disregarded the laws of civilized warfare, and, by acts characteristic of Vandal and savage warfare, applied the firebrand to the halls of legislation and justice, and consigned to the flames the library of the nation, as well as the archives of its legislation.

Those who were in the administration of the Government during that war, and after it, testified their regard and high estimation of this branch of the national armament; and so strong were the convictions of the expediency of providing adequately for it, that the attention of Government was repeatedly directed to the improvement and increase of the navy.

A committee of the Senate, on Naval Affairs, November 28, 1814, reported:

"That your committee assume it as a policy now settled, that the United States are to have a permanent naval establishment, which is to be gradually increased, according to circumstances, and as the ability of the Government may permit. Your committee deem it unnecessary to go into a course of reasoning to support the soundness of this policy, and to establish (what is now generally conceded) that a navy is the most appropriate, the most efficient, and the least expensive, defence of this country."

The committee of the House, in their report in relation to a Navy Board, January, 1815, report:

"That the experience of this war has already satisfied the most scrupulous of the ability of this country to create and equip a naval force, competent not only to the defence of our extensive maritime frontier, but also for the great annoyance of a foreign enemy; and that such a force is now equally demanded by every section of our country, as indispensable for its security. The committee have likewise deemed it unnecessary to go into an argument to show the propriety of bestowing upon this branch of our national force that measure of increase and support which its brilliant exploits on the ocean and on the lakes, and its efficiency in annoying the trade of the enemy during this war, under all the abuses to which it has been exposed, has shown should only be limited to our means."

The Secretary of the Navy, February 28, 1815, in his letter to the Committee of Ways and Means, in relation to the reduction of the navy, remarks:

"The destinies of this nation appear to be intimately connected with her maritime power and prosperity; and as the creation of a navy is not a work to be quickly performed, it seems necessary not only to cherish our existing resources, but to augment them gradually and steadily."

"The annual construction of at least one seventy-four and two frigates is recommended upon principles of economy as well as of policy."

The Secretary of the Navy, in his report of December, 1815, states that:

"The importance of a permanent naval establishment appears to be sanctioned by the voice of the nation."

"The commerce of the United States, increasing with the resources and population of the country, will require a commensurate protection, which a navy alone can afford; and the experience derived from the active and vigorous employment of a limited navy during the late war has demonstrated its efficient utility."

President Madison, under whose administration that war had been declared and conducted, in his annual message of December 5, 1815, thus expresses himself in relation to the navy:

"The signal services which have been rendered by our navy, and the capacities it has developed for successful co-operation in the national defence, will give to that portion of the public force its full value in the eyes of Congress, at an epoch which calls for the constant vigilance of all Governments. To preserve the ships now in a sound state, to complete those already contemplated, to provide amply the imperishable materials for prompt augmentations, and to improve the existing arrangements into more advantageous establishments, for the construction, the repairs, and the security of vessels of war, is dictated by the soundest policy."

At this time, when such opinions were expressed, and the attention of Congress directed to the improvement and increase of our navy, its force was more proportioned to our national power and commerce than at present. From the report of the Secretary of the Navy of January 2, 1816, it appears that the naval force of the United States consisted then of twenty-nine ships, twenty brigs, three ketches, seventeen schooners, three sloops, and two steam frigates; making a total of seventy-four. Amongst these ships were five ships of the line, (two of which were on the lakes,) six frigates of the first class, and five of the second class.

At present, we have in commission one ship of the line, three frigates of the first class, one of the second class, eight sloops of war, five schooners; in ordinary, five ships of the line, five frigates of the first class, seven sloops of war, three schooners; and on the stocks, five ships of the line, seven frigates of the first class, and one of the second class.

The American Congress that was called to legislate for the nation after the war, entertained the same opinion as the other branch of the Government in relation to the navy, and, by an act of 29th April, 1816, one million of dollars per annum, for eight years, was appropriated for the gradual increase of the navy; and the President was authorized to cause to be built nine ships of the line of seventy-four guns, (in addition to three previously authorized,) and also twelve frigates of forty-four guns.

This legislation and appropriation was made at a time when the nation was embarrassed with a national debt of upwards of one hundred and twenty millions of dollars; with an empty Treasury; a depreciated paper currency; resources so limited that revenue for the ordinary purposes of the Government and the maintenance of its credit could not be raised without taxes and loans; yet, sir, at this period, and under such circumstances, was the American navy regarded as an object deserving so much of public attention and favor, that liberal provision was made for its improvement and increase, by giving it a force and power it never before had, and which should correspond with the power, wealth, and extended commerce, of the United States.

Public opinion every where responded to the sentiments of the officers of the Government in relation to the navy, and approbated the legislation that provided for its increase. This continued until a radical spirit was exhibited in this hall in 1820-'21, under professions of reform which were not carried out, but which selected for their attack the American navy. Whilst there was occasion for retrenchment in the civil and miscellaneous expenditures of the Government, these were passed by and permitted to increase; and the legislation of Congress, uncalled for, as I believe, by public opinion, was applied to cut off the one half of the annual appropriation for the increase of the navy, which, by an act of Congress of 3d March, 1821, was reduced to five hundred thousand dollars annually.

The economy that withholds an appropriation, necessary to national character and defence, and to the protection of our immense commerce, from a desire to retain a few millions of dollars for the time in the national Treasury, is a mistaken and false economy, and unworthy of the foresight and expanded views of statesmen. To save a comparatively small sum for the time, it exposes the nation to incalculable losses.

The unprecedented period of peace which has been, and is yet, enjoyed between the great Powers of Europe, and in which we have shared, has enabled us to get along in our intercourse and trade with foreign nations without conflict or depredations on our commerce. But there is no knowing how soon such peaceful relations in Europe may be disturbed. Already there are indications of an approaching storm there; and, when it does come, we ought not to be unprepared in those measures of national protection and security, which a state of war between other great commercial nations requires.

Our differences with the French Government have awakened, within the last year, the attention of this Government and the American people to the condition of our defences. Not only has the attention of the Government and the people been directed recently to the condition of our navy, fortifications, and maritime frontier; but this condition, from the interest created by our difficulties and negotiations with the French Government, and the publicity of their discussion, has probably become known to foreign Governments. Such as it is, we may now speak of, without any concealment or disguise. That condition is a defenceless one, and totally unworthy of a vigilant Government, and of the power and resources of the nation: fortifications, on which large sums have been expended in partial construction, and which were, years since, deemed of primary importance, are not yet completed, and, where they are constructed, they are without the necessary armaments to make them available immediately for the public service and defence; and our limited navy would be totally inadequate to afford protection to our commerce, or be efficient in the defences of the country against a foreign enemy. As a war with France was recently a possible event, and, in the apprehension of many, a probable one, it may be well to examine the maritime force of that nation, with which we might have had to contend, if folly and misrule had involved us in a war with it.

"From official documents, it appears that the French navy, kept in commission and actual service, for 1835, was 3 ships of the line, 12 frigates, 14 sloops of war, (ship rigged,) 26 brigs, 31 smaller vessels, 18 armed transports and storeships, and 6 steam vessels; making a total of 110 vessels, manned with 13,148 men.

"In addition to this force, it was proposed to have equipped and partially manned, in different ports, ready for any sudden emergency, 2 ships of the line, 3 frigates, and 3 smaller vessels, manned with 1,135 men; and a further force, ready for immediate equipment, consisting of 2 ships of the line, 3 frigates, and 11 smaller vessels; making a total, ready for service in three months, of 7 ships of the line, 18 frigates, and 119 smaller vessels.

MARCH 16, 1836.]

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Besides this force, their lists show that there are now afloat the further number of 22 ships of the line, 17 frigates, 65 smaller vessels, 10 bomb vessels, and 17 steam vessels. Many of these are undoubtedly unserviceable and unfit for repair; but, from the best information on the subject, one half, at least, and all of some classes, may be considered as fit for service. They have upon the stocks, now building, 24 ships of the line, 26 frigates, 20 sloops of war, smaller vessels, and armed transports, and 7 steam vessels. The grand total of all the vessels which the French nation could prepare for service, within twelve months, according to their statement, is 36 ships of the line, 50 frigates, about 150 sloops, smaller vessels, and armed transports, 10 bomb vessels, and 30 steam vessels."—(4th vol. Mil. and Nav. Magazine, p. 293.)

As I have before stated, the American navy consists of 18 vessels of war in commission, 20 in ordinary, and 13 on the stocks; making a total of 51, manned at present by a total of 7,189 persons, including marines. When we consider the great disparity between the naval power of the United States and of France, we may be well satisfied that they were not, at this time, brought into conflict; and that Congress was restrained, by its discretion, from acts of legislation that might have involved the country in an unnecessary and calamitous war. But, from this view of our condition, we should take a lesson of instruction for the future; and, if we regard national character and security, we must change that condition; and let us make known to the world, that though our policy and institutions are those of peace and amity with all nations, yet that, if war is brought on us by the injustice and wrongs of any Power, we will be found both prepared and formidable.

This time is, in every respect, favorable for putting ourselves in a condition to prevent and repel wrongs. We have an abundant Treasury; are free from national debt or direct taxation, having a large annual surplus in the Treasury, beyond the reasonable and necessary expenditures of the Government. Let a portion of it be applied to improve and extend the navy, so as to adapt it to our increased population, resources, and extended commerce; and let Congress also provide for the completion and armament of those important fortifications necessary to the protection of our great harbors, and which may be a rendezvous, shelter, and protection, for the navy. As connected with the extension and protection of our naval power, is the completion of those fortifications that were commenced years since, on which money has been expended, and which were deemed of primary importance. Beyond this class of fortifications, the repair of others, and the completion of defences for the public works constructed, I am not disposed to go, and cannot consent to support or vote for the batch of new fortifications for which appropriations have been reported in a bill by the Committee on Military Affairs, amounting to $2,503,800 to begin with. A better, cheaper, and more efficient defence for the country than such fortifications will be found in the increase of our naval armament, which has many advantages over permanent coast fortifications, requiring an amount of money to construct and arm, as well as men to maintain them, that will not be approved of or tolerated by the people.

The navy in commission should be increased. What is now in commission is inadequate; and I am inclined to think that the extension recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, of two frigates and three sloops of war, is not enough. Let them visit foreign seas and ports more frequently in squadrons, by which our naval power may be displayed, and our officers will have the opportunity of acquiring experience in the command of squadrons.

We ought not to be deterred by the expense, when the purpose is of such extensive national interest and security. The total expenditures for the naval establishment, from 1816 to 1834, were $63,922,574; something over $3,000,000 a year. This includes expenditures for docks, navy yards, hospitals, and other permanent public works connected with the navy, and also the materials for ship-building on hand.

For the military establishment, during the same time, including pensions, there were expended $124,536,570; and the total expenditures of the Government for that period, including the payment of the national debt, were upwards of $467,000,000.

In the report of the Navy Commissioners it is estimated that the amount of pay necessary for the year 1836, for one ship of the line, five frigates of the first class, one frigate of the second class, fourteen sloops of war of the first class, five schooners, and one steam vessel, will be $1,422,866 41. National vessels on foreign stations at present, (the ship of the line Delaware has returned, and is now at Norfolk.) In the Mediterranean there are two frigates, one sloop of war, and one schooner; in the West Indies, one frigate, four sloops, and one schooner; on the coast of Brazil, two sloops; in the Pacific, one frigate, one sloop, and one schooner; in the East Indies, one sloop and one schooner.

If several more of the vessels in ordinary be put in commission, the increase of expense will subtract but a comparatively small sum of some hundred thousand dollars from our overflowing national Treasury. When we consider the magnitude of our trade that floats on the seas, of a value probably exceeding $400,000,000 annually, an annual expenditure of 3, 4, or $5,000,000 a year for its protection, and to sustain the national character with foreign nations, as well as to form our strong arm of defence in war, when it arises, cannot be deemed unwise or extravagant, but as demanded by public policy and the best interests of the nation.

A naval armament can only be formed to advantage in a season of peace; and should we, in an unexpected war, be found without an efficient navy, we must remain without one, with all the deplorable consequences of our trade destroyed, harbors blockaded, and our coast and towns continually harassed by the enemy. A navy is not to be built at once; it is a work of time, and not to be executed under the privations, exigencies, or perils of war. The crews that are to sail and fight our national ships are not to be taken at once from our fresh waters, or the streets of our cities, to trim the sails and direct the guns of a man of war in the hour of battle.

It is said an army for land service can be made effective in a few months. But that is not the case with a navy; experience and practice are essential to make sailors. In the emergency of war we may get men, but we cannot with money purchase American sailors, that can be depended on for immediate service on board of a national ship, which is to sustain the honor and reputation of the American flag. For the conflict of a naval battle, we must have officers that are trained and experienced on board of our national vessels: they should be exercised and accustomed to the discipline, subordination, and command, which are practised there.

The crews of our vessels of war ought to be American citizens, and a large portion native Americans, who are unsurpassed for their seamanship, courage, and gunnery. But if our naval crews are to be collected under the pressure of war, we must take such as can at the moment be obtained from the merchant service; a large portion of whom are foreigners.

The laws of the United States requiring the employment of American citizens as seamen are evaded; and more vigilance is required in both our national and merchant vessels, to prevent the employment of others. When the character of the American navy is to be supported, it ought not to be committed to a crew made up of men of all nations, many of whom may have hearts as foreign to our cause as the places of their nativity. I hope that the resolution submitted by the honorable member from Maryland, [Mr. McKIM,] requiring merchant vessels of a certain tonnage to receive and employ a certain number of boys, to be trained in the science of navigation, may lead to legislation on the subject.

As a part of the preparation connected with the improvement, increase, and preservation of the navy, additional facilities for building and equipping vessels, and the preservation of materials, are required in navy yards. I am not prepared to say that the public service requires so many navy yards as we now have, there being seven existing; but am inclined to believe that three navy yards of construction would have been sufficient. But as there have been these locations of navy yards, on which considerable expenditures have been made for a series of years, and as there are materials and ships at them for preservation, it will not do to abandon them now. The appropriations to them should be limited to the advantages of the situation and the wants of the public service.

At Portsmouth navy yard there are at present two sloops of war nearly ready for sea; and building, one ship of the line and one frigate; and, I suppose, materials for ship-building; and as we must act on the opinion of others, with respect to these public works, I am willing to take the recommendation of the Department having charge of this branch of the public expenditures.

The estimates for these appropriations came from the Board of Navy Commissioners, who are practical men, of high character and professional experience. There has been some discussion before the committee as to the character of such recommendations. By some it has been likened to "prima facie" evidence—evidence that was to be received and credited until disproved; but it matters little by what name it is called. The opinion of such men I will receive, not to control my judgment, but to influence my opinion and action on a subject to which they have given their attention; which it is their province to understand; and which is recommended on their responsibility. Their high reputation is a security to me that they will not deceive Congress; and in their intimate acquaintance with this description of public works, for which they recommend the proposed appropriation, I have so much confidence as to suppose that I will not be misled. Entertaining such an opinion, I am disposed to vote for the appropriation, and against the amendment to strike out.

The appropriation of public money by the legislation of Congress, under the constitution, must be for national objects, not to subserve the particular districts or sections of the country where they are to be expended, but for the public service and general welfare. The selection of situations for navy yards, fortifications, &c., should be such as were most advantageous, from a regard to the interests of the whole people; national considerations alone should influence the selection of the situations, and all expenditures in relation to them. It is unsound and unjust to consider these appropriations and expenditures only as a mode of distributing the public money through the country; the places ought to be selected for their advantages of situation, in reference to trade or their peculiar natural formation. The works constructed at such places by the Government are not, as we well know, for the district where located, but the nation. The navy yards and other public works connected with the defence of our maritime frontier, constructed at Portsmouth or elsewhere, are not to be considered as erected for such places. They are not to be charged as made for the constituents of the member in whose district they are located, but for the whole country; for the people of my district and every other district represented on this floor. They are the nation's; and as they are for national defence and security, whilst they promote and protect the commerce of the nation, the construction of such works, and the expenditures therefor, are for the advantage of the people of the South and West, as well as those of the East and North.

In our legislation for such purposes, sectional feelings and jealousies ought to be discarded; and when a work proposed is a legitimate one, and of national advantage, though it be at the extremity of these United States, it is not for us, who represent and legislate for the whole United States, to oppose it, or fold our arms and decline moving or acting in it, until an appropriation of some character shall be made for that part of the country which we severally more immediately represent, as our residence and election district.

The district which I have the honor to represent is an interior one, between the Atlantic and the waters and valleys of the West; there has been no expenditure by this Government of public money in it or near it; and though such an expenditure would be very convenient and advantageous to my constituents, yet I am not, I think, justifiable in withholding public money for the public service requiring it, until I can stipulate for an expenditure for some purpose to be devised in my district. Standing on neutral ground between the East and West, I would advise the Representatives on this floor from the Atlantic coast, where public works for defence must be made, to abstain from all strife amongst themselves to obtain appropriations for their respective districts, and let us have their opinion and judgment in a judicious selection of these public works for national advantage, as well as to prevent all extravagant or unnecessary expenditure. The expenditure of the public money in their district or its vicinity is but a small affair, a temporary advantage that will soon cease to be felt or remembered; whilst the public work is to be a permanent one, and a monument of the enlightened judgment and disinterested legislation of Congress, or of its sectional and contracted policy.

I would say to the Representatives of the East and North, that justice must be done to the rights and wants of the West. In that region are objects of national interest, that are entitled not only to the attention of this House, but to a liberal provision for their execution. If it be not extended to them shortly, the time is not far distant when the control of the legislation of this House will be in the hands of the West. The valley of the Mississippi can and will take care of itself; and I am prepared to do for it now, in advance, all that, in justice and liberality, her great interests require. We must provide suitable fortifications on our great Western frontier, not only as a protection and security to our settlements against Indian aggression, but for the purpose of maintaining our authority and control over those numerous tribes of Indians that are located on that frontier. Provision must also be made for suitable lake harbors—not to subserve any particular district, but where the public interests and service will be promoted.

But if there be one object greater than another, and which may be called of national interest, it is the Ohio river; if not the highway of nations, it is that of many sovereign States. It is estimated in the report received from the engineer department, that the amount of heavy merchandise received and transhipped at Pittsburgh, the head of the river, amounts to half a million of tons annually, and is progressively increasing. On this great national highway there now float upwards of two hundred steamboats, many of which measure upwards of four hundred tons, and few below one hundred tons; and, in addition to these, there are also employed several hundred flat and keel boats.* I am willing and desirous of immediately making an appropriation for that river, not merely to take out snags, or to obtain a report of the length, breadth, and depth of its shoals, or the velocity of the current, but to make it permanently navigable at all seasons, to meet the demands of its immense and increasing trade, though millions of dollars may be required for its completion.

The bill now before the committee, Mr. Chairman, has relation to our national defence and foreign trade; and as that trade reaches us principally through our Atlantic coast and its harbors, and as the only formidable enemies that we have to encounter must approach us by the same coast, and by a naval armament, let us then, without delay, give efficiency to our navy, and provide such means of national defence on our seaboard as will be our security in peace and strong arm in war.

But, sir, it is objected to the appropriations for these purposes, by the honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] that the appropriations and expenditures for the public works on our coast have been unequal and unjust; that an undue proportion has been bestowed on the Northern division of these United States; and that this inequality prevails in the bill before the committee.

When an examination is had of the appropriations and expenditures for public works of national defence along the extended coast of the United States, it will be found that there is no foundation for this complaint, and that the Southern division has had the most liberal portion. The charge of partial legislation for Northern defences, to the neglect of Southern, is not supported by the facts, and has been so fully and ably exposed by the honorable member from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] that I will not detain the committee in repeating its details. From the public documents recently laid upon our desks, it appears that the expenditures of the Government on forts finished, and those under construction, north of the Chesapeake bay, are $2,248,949; those south, including the Chesapeake bay, are $8,129,764; exhibiting a difference in favor of the Southern division, in this great class of public works of defence, of nearly four to one.

In the distribution which the honorable member from South Carolina was pleased to make, he excluded Virginia from the Southern division of these United States, in which she has heretofore always been classed. Though it is said that Virginia is to be delivered over to the North, I will not consider her as of the North, or separated from the South, until I know that she has been delivered over by all the form of "livery of seizin," or some other mode of transfer of notoriety, acknowledged as equally valid and obligatory.

If, Mr. Chairman, the amount of appropriations and expenditures should be made in the several States according to extent of territory, federal population, trade, or revenue, Pennsylvania might with more reason complain of the inequality of distribution, and say that she was made tributary, not only to the North and East, but also to the South. In the bill containing appropriations for about $5,000,000, including $630,000 for navy yards, there is appropriated, specifically, $11,750 for the navy yard at Philadelphia, which is the only appropriation required to be expended in Pennsylvania.

The only national forts within her borders, or that guard in any degree the approach of an enemy to her great and flourishing capital, are without repair, in a great measure in ruins, and incapable of any defence or protection. I anticipate that, for the construction and completion of these forts, reasonable appropriations will be made by the present Congress, as due to the great interests, trade, and exposed situation of Philadelphia; the importance and necessity of which no one will, I apprehend, question.

Little has been done for Pennsylvania, in expenditures within her borders, by the General Government; of this we do not complain, but of the positive wrongs that have been done her under this administration, for which she did so much to place and sustain in power. The great interests of her citizens, which she cherished as the life-blood of her system, have been drained to exhaustion by the policy and legislation of Congress. Her manufacturing capital and industry, which for a long time she had fostered with a parent's care and vigilance, are now languishing under the blighting influence of the war that has successfully been waged in this House upon her enterprising population, who had embarked their fortunes in manufacturing establishments, which gave employment to American skill, labor, and capital, under a faith and confidence reposed in the legislation of Congress, which promised a permanent protection, that has since been withdrawn from American citizens, for the benefit of the workshops of Europe, and their ill-paid and ill-fed laborers.

That moneyed institution, which was located in her capital city as the great fiscal agent of this Government, and which had furnished to the citizens of Pennsylvania and the United States a currency and facilities of money exchange better than were enjoyed by any other people, was assailed with an unrelenting hand by the Government, not only to the hour of its dissolution, but even now, when a Pennsylvania Legislature, in the exercise of her legitimate powers as a sovereign State, has chosen to exercise her own energies, and give renewed life, activity, and regulation, under competent State authority, to a solid specie capital that was about to be withdrawn from her jurisdiction, and which her own necessities, the wants of her citizens, and the amount and course of her trade, required she should retain, she is threatened with all the vengeance of the powers of this mighty Federal Government, and the persecutions of all dependent State Governments that can be brought to do its biddings.

Pennsylvania, sir, is now awake to her rights and interests; she has taken her position, and will not be driven from her purpose of self-protection by menaces from Washington, or any where else.

It is not enough to satisfy Pennsylvania, for greater sacrifices of her interests and independence to party subserviency, that she should be told "that she had received from the administration her share of the high offices of this Government." I do know that two of my talented friends were invited from Pennsylvania, (but whether selected, as has been said, for the democratic blood which flowed in their veins, I will not say,) and were rewarded with the honors and emoluments of missions to Russia. Two other of our eminent citizens were, by the Executive, respectively invited to take charge of the national Treasury—a high and responsible trust; and how, and under what circumstances, they were scornfully and ignominiously expelled from their high stations, for exercising the liberty and right of private judgment and conscious integrity, is too well known to the nation to be readily forgotten.

It will not either be sufficient to reconcile us to further sacrifices that "it is glory enough" for Pennsylvania "to serve under such rulers," and to be called "the keystone of the great federal arch." We want something more substantial than such empty honors; we want that which will add to our State treasury, and enable us

*The tolls received on the passage of the canal at Louisville is evidence, to a certain extent, not only of the magnitude of the trade on the river, but of its increase: the tolls received in 1835 being $80,165—an increase of thirty per cent. on those of the preceding year, which were $61,848.—Note by Mr. C.

There is yet another object of interest, of which Pennsylvania has not lost sight, the time for the fruition of which has now arrived, and which she still expects to obtain as her right from the national Legislature; and that is, her fair and equal distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. This she considers as a trust that the Federal Government holds, by a solemn compact, for the common benefit of the United States, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and which, by the Virginia deed of cession, was provided "should be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." Pennsylvania will not consent that this fund, not now wanted for the reasonable expenditures of the Government, shall be either wasted or given away; but she will pursue it with attention, and will watch it with an eye that will not close. Already is her arm outstretched to receive it, and her claims will be pressed by her in a voice that will not falter or be silenced.*

But, Mr. Chairman, Pennsylvania has no war to wage on this bill, and I will not obstruct its progress to stipulate for favor or justice to my State in some other unconnected branch of the public expenditures for the national service. If our interior situation does not expose us as much as other States to the assaults of a public enemy, I am content that the national defences shall be made where they will be most efficient and available, though for that purpose the public moneys should be expended not within our borders.

I know that some of my friends on this floor are honestly opposed to increased appropriations for the navy and public works of defence, as extending further the already overgrown power and patronage of the Executive Department of this Government. That power and patronage I admit to be immense and alarming, and it is one of which the representatives of the people, and the people themselves, cannot exercise too much vigilance, or indulge too much jealousy. That patronage is not attended with any danger to the liberties of this nation, or its free institutions, in filling up our naval armaments, putting in commission the national vessels we have, and giving service to the naval officers, many of whom are loitering about our cities and seaboard, and are desirous of service.

The expenditures for naval improvements and essential fortifications we cannot, with propriety, withhold, from want of confidence in the fidelity and economy of those who now administer the Government. They are the constituted authorities, and we must intrust to them the reasonable and necessary expenditures under the constitution and laws, holding them responsible, as far as is within the power of this House, to a proper application and strict accountability.

Much may be done, and ought to be done, to lessen the power, patronage, and expenditure of this Government, especially so far as it is exercised in rewarding party favorites, or in dividing the public treasure, "as spoils to the victors." There is a wide field for this work of reform and retrenchment in the civil and miscellaneous expenditures of the Government. There was a time in the history of our Government when an army of ten thousand men was a source of much alarm to many of our intelligent and patriotic statesmen, as adverse to our republican institutions, in offering temptations as well as giving strength to the executive arm; and yet we are slumbering over our rights and constitutional Government, with an army of more than fifty thousand officeholders dependent upon executive will and favor. Here is a body of the most dangerous kind, if organized and disciplined for the purposes of party; it is dispersed over the whole country, to its extreme points, and pervades our cities, towns, villages, our highways and byways; and, if brought under the surveillance of the executive power, on whose will it is dependent, as may be apprehended and deplored, it can exert an influence to maintain and perpetuate the power of the party or its leaders, more formidable to constitutional government than an army of soldiers.

* The receipts of money from the sales of the public lands during the year ending 31st of December last, are reported by the Department as amounting to the sum of $14,359,193 71; which, if distributed amongst the States according to their federal proportion, would give Pennsylvania of this sum more than one million and a half of dollars, with the prospect of a larger annual dividend in the coming year. These moneys are now neither used nor wanted by the General Government, but are allowed to remain in possession of their deposit banks, which, at this time, have of the Government money $30,678,879 91, which may be used for their own special advantage, and not for the people of the States, to whom, of right, it belongs.—Note by Mr. C.

The attention of Congress ought to be directed, in sincerity, to the reform and retrenchment of all unnecessary offices, as well as to enforce strict accountability on the public officers. In this there is much work to accomplish, without cutting off any thing from the navy. The expenditures of the navy in 1817 were $3,210,278 27, and in 1834 the expenditures for the same were $4,123,423 82, being an increase of less than thirty per cent. in seventeen years; whereas, the expenditures for the civil list in 1817 were $991,894 11, and in 1834, for the same, were $2,080,601 60, being an increase of more than one hundred per cent.

I am willing to go with the honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] in resisting all unnecessary appropriations, and reducing such as are not demanded by the public service; and with the honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. HARRIS] I will act in the work of retrenchment and reform to any reasonable extent; and, as I believe there is much to be done, with him I will be content not only to use the pruning-knife, but the saw and the hatchet, to cut off the many excrescences and sprouts that have grown up in this Government, at the expense of the public Treasury.

But, sir, I will not take a single spar from the navy; but, as far as in my power, add to its force and numbers. The American navy belongs to no party but the American party. The foul hand of party proscription and intolerance has not yet defiled and corrupted its high character. God forbid that it ever should! Whenever it does, and the high places and commands in the navy are bestowed and received, not for bravery, skill, and gallantry in naval combat or perilous service, but for zeal and officiousness in party election contests, or our naval officers shall so demean themselves as to propitiate and flatter the leaders of a party by devotion and sycophancy, the high character of our navy will have fled; what will remain will not be worth our care and preservation, and we may prepare to hear the knell of the departed glory of the American navy.

When such becomes our national degradation, there will be little left of the purity of our republican institutions for our regard and support. I hope and trust that such a state of things will be averted, and that a merciful Providence, who has so long preserved us as a nation, under our constitutional Government, against foreign enemies and internal dissensions, will still overrule our destinies, and control the actions of our rulers and people, that our Government and its institutions may not only be maintained by us in their original spirit, but transmitted entire and unimpaired to our successors; and that they may be enabled to carry out in reality those salutary reforms which, "in these days and generation," have been often promised, but, as yet, not realized.

When Mr. CHAMBERS had concluded—

Mr. BELL rose and addressed the Chair as follows :

Mr. Chairman : I desire that I should not be understood, from the remarks heretofore submitted by me upon the bill under consideration, to be hostile to the navy, or even to such fortifications as may be known to be necessary to the defence of our most important commercial and naval depots. On the contrary, I am decidedly in favor of a considerable increase of our present naval establishment. Indeed, I do not remember a sentiment delivered by the gentleman who preceded me in this debate, [Mr. CHAMBERS,] upon this point, to which I do not yield a hearty concurrence. What I wish to accomplish by my motion is, that we shall first settle and adopt some system or plan of improvement in this branch of the national defence, which shall promise a greater degree of economy and efficiency than we can hope for under the present system.

I now propose, Mr. Chairman, to extend the range of this debate much beyond the latitude assumed in the preceding part of it. I propose to remark freely upon the general policy of the present administration, as lately developed. The principles and practices of those in power are always subjects of great interest to the country. Those of the party which now control the affairs of this republic are peculiarly so at this time. While it is my intention, in what I shall say on these subjects, to be perfectly respectful to the motives and feelings of the committee, and especially to those who constitute the majority of the House of Representatives, yet, with these limitations, it is my intention to indulge the privilege of debate to the utmost limit of parliamentary license.

I desired some more suitable occasion for the indulgence of the very wide range of remark upon which I am about to enter than the present bill. I would have greatly preferred the bill reported by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JOHNSON,] making appropriations for a great number of new fortifications. The bill proposing an extra appropriation for the improvement and increase of the navy would have been selected in preference to the present one; but, sir, I have lately had my doubts whether it is intended that either of these bills shall be acted upon before the close of the session, when debate will be out of the question. I know the responsibilities to which I may subject myself by making this bill the subject of a tedious debate. I am satisfied that I might expect some better effect from the remarks I intend to offer, if I had been more fortunate in the occasion of them. But, sir, the time and the occasion I have selected may not, after all, be of so much consequence. Greater skill in parliamentary tactics might have enabled me to do greater justice to my subject, by taking a different course from the one I am about to adopt; but I am encouraged by a saying of the gallant Nelson, upon some occasion when the importance of skill in naval tactics was spoken of: "A captain (said he) cannot be far wrong, who, in battle, lays his ship alongside the enemy."

Such a discussion as I propose is always salutary, and ought to be indulged at every session of Congress; in truth, it should never be omitted. If any find fault with the delay that is likely to occur, let them take consolation from the motto of the Government journal, which is, that "The world is governed too much;" a proposition, however, by no means consistent with the principles of the party of which this journal is the organ. But if it shall be inquired, why provoke a party discussion upon the navy bill, or upon any of the appropriation bills? why not bring forward some distinct proposition, in the shape of a resolution? I answer, because I perceive a settled purpose in the House to prevent the introduction of any subject which can fairly give rise to the desired discussion during the present session. I want no other proof of this determination of the majority of the House than the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and adopted on the 26th of January. The reason alleged for this resolution was, the defenceless condition of the country, the fears entertained of a war with France, and, consequently, the great importance of passing the appropriation bills without delay.

This was all plausible enough, if the circumstances accompanying and preceding the resolution had not taken away the ground assumed. The navy bill, than which none was of more importance, had been taken up at the instance of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the 13th of January; and although all the reasons for speedy action upon it existed at that time, which were afterwards alleged, yet it was laid over the very next day, and made to give place from day to day to measures of inferior importance, without explanation or apology. On the 22d of January, the majority of the House agreed to consider the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and all the orders of the House, and, consequently, all the business of the House, was postponed for the purpose of hearing a discussion on the loss of the three million appropriation. This subject was permitted to occupy four or five days, but the experience of that discussion produced a very decided change in the House in regard to the propriety of party discussions in general. It was very evident that, although the majority were highly gratified by the effort of the honorable gentleman who offered the resolution, [Mr. ADAMS,] yet they did not relish the reply quite so well. Some uneasiness began to be felt before the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] concluded his remarks; and many of the party began to think that any indulgence in such discussions was wrong; and to wonder how they had fallen into the error of voting to consider the resolution. The resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] was in good time to repair the error into which the party had fallen. It is deserving of remark, that on the evening of the same day on which this resolution was offered, the messenger arrived in this city, bringing with him an offer of the mediation of Great Britain in settling the difference between this country and France; and I have sufficient evidence to satisfy me that, before that time, information, through some channel or other, had reached this Government, that England would interpose her good offices to prevent a war.

[Mr. MASON explained, and denied that he had received any information whatever of the intention of the English Government to offer her mediation. He also said that the resolution had been under consideration in the Committee on Foreign Relations several days before he offered it, and denied that he had any other motive in offering the resolution than the one he announced at the time.]

Mr. BELL resumed. I must say that I did suppose the gentleman from Virginia possessed some information in relation to the French question which was not in the knowledge of the House. I now dismiss my suspicions, and acquit him; but his ignorance of what must have been known to the Government only shows that the degree of confidence to which his station in this House entitles him is not given to him by those at the head of affairs. Still, sir, the circumstance that the hour of one o'clock each day was the hour the resolution fixed for taking up the appropriation bills, the certainty that by this course the debate on the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would be cut off, and the farther circumstance that other bills besides those for the support of the army and navy, and for fortifications, were embraced in that resolution, are sufficient to justify the opinion that it was designed by some of those who took a part in getting it brought forward and adopted, to have the effect that I have ascribed to it. Besides, I must say to the gentleman from Virginia, that I cannot so readily forgive him for his neglect, after he had seen that the appropriation bills still slept upon the table, and that the only effect of his resolution was to give the majority of the House an undue control over its business, to come forward and move to rescind it. When all prospect of a war with France had ceased, it was his duty to have taken this course. I cannot forget, either, that, instead of urging the execution of the order he had obtained, giving a preference to the appropriation bills, he upon several occasions gave his vote to take up subjects of minor importance. Sir, the effect of that resolution was to give an undue power to the majority of this House over the subjects of debate. It operated to restrain the freedom of discussion; and I have a right, under the circumstances, to consider that it was so intended by the majority. I pronounce the course of proceeding with that resolution as unprecedented, unparliamentary, and oppressive to the minority.

If the spirit of the resolution of the 26th of January shall be carried out by the party in power, it will result in the re-enactment of the sedition law of 1798. It is founded precisely upon the same policy; and we have only to go a step or two further, and the object of the sedition law will be effected, so far as regards the freedom of debate in this House. The object of the sedition law of 1798 was to suppress discussion, and to prevent attacks upon the party in power. Such was the object of this resolution.

There is more than one circumstance in the state of the times, Mr. Chairman, which is calculated to remind us of the era of 1798; and, that I may not be thought to have referred to that period without very sufficient reason, I beg leave briefly to notice the similarity between the two periods of 1798 and 1836. The alien and sedition laws, the proposition of the party then in power to establish a standing army and to create and maintain a great naval armament, were regarded by the republican party in 1798 as hostile to the genius and spirit of our free institutions, and tending decidedly to the introduction of arbitrary power. The party now in power are in favor of both these measures. The sedition law was based upon the idea of the same infallibility of the President and the party then in a majority in Congress, which is now assumed for the present Executive and the party now in power. But there was a war panic in 1798, just such as we have recently had in our time. There was said to be a French party in this country in 1798; and, most strange to relate, it has been proclaimed upon this floor, in the course of this debate, that there is a French party now in this country! To show how the war panic and the proposition for a standing army and a great navy were spoken of and resisted in 1798; and, to illustrate the striking coincidence of the two periods, I will read an extract from one of the thousand remonstrances laid before Congress in 1798-'99. The one from which this extract is taken was adopted and forwarded by a public meeting of the stern republican yeomen of the great State of Pennsylvania:

"Your memorialists would further beg leave to remonstrate against several of the measures which either have been adopted, or which may be still in contemplation, in consequence of our negotiation with the French republic, as productive of an unnecessary increase of the public debt and the introduction of an oppressive system of taxation. These measures appear to be founded on the alarm which has been excited and industriously circulated throughout the United States, about the danger of a French invasion; but your memorialists see no good reason to believe that this alarm can be well-founded; for, admitting to be true, what has been so often asserted of late, that the French people have been so unfortunate as to choose for themselves an executive branch to their Government, which is proud, vain, and ambitious, and disposed to exercise undue influence or arbitrary control over the legislative councils of our country, and inclined to convert the power and resources of that nation to such purposes as will best suit their ambitious projects, yet it does not appear that they have any intention or disposition to invade this country. Your memorialists cannot see in an expedition to Egypt, or against the British settlements in the East Indies, or in the supposed bad conduct of the French armies in Switzerland or in Italy, any evidence of an intention to invade the United States; more especially when it is considered that they are destitute of a force by sea, and at war with a nation so greatly superior to them on the water. Your memorialists therefore conceive that this alarm, which they think must now be considered as altogether ill-founded, ought not to be deemed a motive sufficient to justify the introduction of a standing army into the United States, and the establishment of an expensive navy, which must greatly increase the public debt, introduce an oppressive and burdensome system of taxation, and remove all hopes from the people of being ever relieved from the evils that grow out of a funding system."

I beg leave also to read a paragraph from the report of the Secretary of the Navy in 1798, upon the subject of increasing this arm of the national defence. Taking care to omit the date, this report might very properly have been copied and sent to Congress as a substitute for the doctrines and recommendations of the last special message:

"The protection of our coast, the security of our extensive country from invasion in some of its weaker parts, the safety of our important commerce, and our future peace, when the maritime nations of Europe war with each other, all seem to demand that our naval force should be augmented; so much augmented, indeed, as to make the most powerful nations desire our friendship, the most unprincipled respect our neutrality. The peaceful character of America will afford to the world sufficient security that we shall not be easily provoked to carry the war into the country of an enemy; and it well becomes the wisdom of America to provide a cheap defence to keep it from our own."

I might further corroborate what I have said of the striking resemblance between the doctrines and incidents of the era of 1798 and the present period, by quoting from the report of the Secretary of War, made in 1798; but it is only a repetition of the same views, applied to the army, embraced in the extract I have just cited. But, sir, there was a Union panic got up in 1798, also. To show upon what grounds this panic was created, and how it was met by the leaders of the republican party at that day, I will read an extract from a contemporary publication of one of the most distinguished of that party, a son of Virginia, and who, during the whole of Mr. Jefferson's administration, was one of the greatest ornaments and most distinguished champions of republicanism in Congress. I allude to William B. Giles.

After dwelling at some length upon the first part of a conversation which had become the subject of a newspaper discussion, Mr. Giles proceeded thus:

"I remarked that I always had been, and still was, a friend of the Union; yet if the measures proposed were to be adopted as permanent systems, I would rather see a separation of the Union, upon proper and pacific arrangements, than be perpetually subject to all the pernicious consequences which, in my opinion, would necessarily flow from them. I considered disunion as a deplorable event; but less deplorable than a perpetuity of expensive armies, perpetuity of expensive navies, perpetuity of excessive debts, perpetuity of excessive taxes, and all the oppressive consequences resulting therefrom. I explained further by saying that I hoped these propositions would never be matured into political systems; that I trusted the constitutional corrective would soon be applied; that after the people should become apprized of the artifice of exciting and playing off their prejudices in one part of the Union against their prejudices in another; after they shall become fatigued with the various delusions practised upon them by interested partisans, they will listen to the voice of interest, and in a regular and constitutional way relieve themselves from their oppressions, if they should unfortunately be systematized."

These proofs and references establish beyond cavil the truth of what I have said as to the close resemblance between the parties in power in 1798 and at the present moment. The analogy is manifest in the powers assumed by and for the Executive, in the policy in relation to a standing army and a great naval establishment, and in many of the practices of the party then and now in power. Sir, the doctrines and practices of the party in power in 1798, I affirm, are vindicated and justified by the course and principles of the one now in the ascendancy. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] is not so inconsistent as some of his former friends have supposed him to be. He is now supporting the principles to which he adhered during his own administration, and which he is also impelled to sustain by the most powerful and interesting considerations arising out of the recollection who it was that held the reins of government in 1798. The gentleman from Massachusetts has not changed his principles, but the dominant party have become converts to his doctrines and policy. I infer that he is now engaged to support them in all their measures; but this is a declaration I feel, upon reflection, I have no right to make.

But, sir, alarming and dangerous as were the pretensions of the federal party in 1798, it was less dangerous to the country and its institutions than the one which is now seeking to perpetuate its power and maxims. The party in power in 1798 had the frankness and manliness to assume and avow their principles. They openly proclaimed them, defended them with courage, and finally fell by them. But, sir, the party now in power shrink from the open avowal of their real principles. They assume the mask of republicans; and, while they practise upon many of the most odious maxims of the party in power in 1798, they do all in the name of democracy and liberty.

If any one shall object to this discussion because it savors of President-making, if any gentleman shall be deluded by the opinion that topics directly connected with the politics of the day should be excluded from this hall, I ask him to reflect for a moment upon the fact, that no subject at this day, of importance, does or can arise in Congress, which is not sustained or opposed, and finally decided, upon principles and motives which enter directly and deeply into the presidential canvass, and ultimately decide that issue. And when, sir, the action of this House, and so great a proportion of the business of the House, are dictated and controlled by party views, and to advance or depress the prospects of one or the other of the candidates for the presidency, shall it be held improper to speak out, to avow openly, and vindicate in debate, the motives and principles which actually govern our votes? Sir, does not every gentleman know that the very first business of the session, I mean the election of the principal officers of the House, and that one, especially, who is known to possess great power and influence in shaping and directing the entire business of the session, was decided upon grounds intimately connected with President-making? I hope I may be permitted to refer to this part of the action of the House without offence, since I can do so without the slightest feeling on my part against any portion of the members who compose it. That election, sir, was openly claimed and boasted of in the columns of the party press, as a test of the strength of the party attached to the interest of the Vice President.

But, Mr. Chairman, it has of late become more important than at any former period in the history of the Government that this subject of President-making should be taken up seriously, and made a part of the regular business of Congress. By force of that system of party organization and discipline which is now rapidly maturing and spreading itself over the country, it must soon come to pass (if, indeed, it is not now the case) that the election of a President will determine every other question of public policy or public interest for at least four years, and perhaps eight. If this be so, if it be true that every thing is to be settled by the decrees of the party, and that the President, as the head of the party, is only the organ through which their decree is to be communicated to Congress, then I appeal to you, sir, whether you [Mr. HAMER] would not, upon reflection, retract a sentiment expressed the other day, and admit the importance of discussing every question connected, nearly or remotely, with the presidential election? I repeat that, if the doctrine is to be established that no member of this House who professes to belong to the party in power can vote against a measure recommended either publicly or privately by the President, without incurring the imputation of deserting his party, (and such, I believe, is the rigor of the new system of party tactics in operation;) if whatever the President recommends cannot be resisted by the party which profess to support him, I assert that this subject of President-making is the first and most important that can and ought to occupy our attention. If the result of an election is to annihilate the independent power of action by Congress, and put every thing in the hands of the President of a party, it is time not only to assert the right to discuss the question here, but to do it promptly, freely, and fully; and it shall not be my fault if it is not done. There is strong reason to believe that the obligations of party are held so sacred that none who belong to the majority dare to do any thing which the President shall forbid, or to fail in the support of whatever he shall recommend. Have we not lately seen the force of this obligation to be so strong in this House, that the absolute power of peace and of war was ready to be yielded up, in effect, into the hands of one man? Coming to this House under the extraordinary party pledges usual in popular elections of late, I hope it will not be regarded as improper or disrespectful to ask if the President had, during the late crisis, said "we must have war," would the party in this House have had the power to gainsay it? War we must then have had, and the moral power was not in this House to resist it, whatever may have been the private opinions of honorable members of the wisdom of such a measure.

No occasion can be more appropriate for the discussion of the principles and practices of the Government than the one presented by the appropriation bills, presented as a whole. It is proposed to increase the annual expenditure for the military defences of the country and internal improvement ten millions in one year. It is a new era in the history of the Government. So extravagant a proposition is unknown in our annals. The results of this new policy are beyond the ken or conception of many; but those who planned it understood them well enough, though it may not be desirable to their interests to avow them all at once. The first inevitable result of this policy, if it shall be sanctioned by Congress, will be the introduction, in a short period, of an increased and oppressive system of taxation. An increased annual expenditure of ten millions may be met for a few years from the present sources of revenue; but the public lands are now in a state of such rapid exhaustion, that very soon we will find our revenue from this quarter reduced to a million or less. The public works which we are now about to commence must be carried on, and funds will have to be raised to support those which may be completed in the mean time. Then comes a new and increased system of taxation, as a matter of course, with its usual train of evils. But what will be a more serious consequence, is the great increase of the army and navy, which cannot fail to follow the adoption of this new and extravagant policy. When all the navy yards, and all the new fortifications now proposed to be established, shall be completed, a standing army of less than fifteen or twenty thousand men would not be thought of or tolerated under the new impulse which is soon to be given to the military spirit. Indeed, less than that number would not be sufficient to guard our Western frontier, and at the same time secure so many fortifications upon the seacoast against surprise. As to the navy, after such gigantic preparations for the improvement and increase of it as are now proposed, will a navy of less than one hundred ships of war in commission be regarded as at all admissible for a country of such resources, of such character and importance in the scale of nations? Such are the views of grandeur and power which are now beginning to exercise an important influence over the course of many of the leading men in power. Some opinion may be formed of the magnificence of the projects of the party, from the declaration upon this subject of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] made in the course of his remarks upon the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS.] That gentleman expressed the hope that in a short time we would see the navy of this country placed upon a footing to cope with the most powerful maritime Power of Europe! Who does not see from all this that we are to have an increased tariff in due season, and that the managers of the party are preparing to claim the support of the manufacturing interests?

H. OF R.]

Naval Service Bill.

But if we should be satisfied that it is the true policy of the country to adopt the plan of defending the country by fortifications, no matter at what cost; to increase the army and navy, at the risk even of an increased system of taxation, still the inquiry and discussion which I propose to go into will be of great importance. The system of public defence may be wise and prudent in itself; but the time and manner of carrying it into execution may, and does, demand a separate consideration. The improvement of the navy, and the new fortifications projected, it is estimated, will require an annual expenditure of ten millions for ten years, making a total of one hundred millions. The faithful and judicious application of this vast fund, supposing it to be settled that it shall be expended upon these objects, becomes a subject of the deepest interest to the whole country. The country has a right to inquire, who are the agents and public servants about to be intrusted with the disbursement of this enormous capital? Are they faithful? Are they competent? Have they proved themselves so upon past trial? Sir, a great preliminary question is to be settled before we add ten millions to the usual annual expenditure. It is a question of confidence in public servants, as well as expediency. Who are they that demand from the representatives of the people this signal mark of confidence; to place ten millions in their hands, during the present year, more than at any former period? Are they the same public servants who have had charge of the public defences during our late difficulties with France, and under whose superintendence they have suffered decay and dilapidation? By what title do they ask this extraordinary evidence of confidence?

Sir, they ask for money and increased confidence; we demand scrutiny into past conduct. They ask for reward for past merit and service; it may become our duty to arraign them as delinquents before the tribunal of the public, instead of pouring the treasury into their laps. To vote money is the least difficult and most pleasant duty of a representative of the people. It requires neither experience, industry, talents, nor fidelity, in members. But, sir, to see and to provide that it shall be faithfully expended, and applied to objects of public utility, is a more difficult as well as more important part of our duty. I am aware that upon this question of confidence, and competency of the public officers of the Government, as well as the policy of making large appropriations for building up the defences of the country, there is a ready and conclusive argument at hand in the minds of many. I know well enough that all objections are intended to be met and put down here, and before the people, by holding up for their due regard and acquiescence the sentiment and recommendation of the late special message upon French affairs. It should be borne in mind that 25,000 copies of that message were ordered to be printed by this House; and in a week from the date of that order, the whole number was said to be published, and at the disposal of members, when, at the same time, there were documents ordered to be printed at the commencement of the session, which had not been furnished. It is easy to penetrate the design of this unusual despatch. That document was expected to give tone to public sentiment, generally and speedily. The effect of it upon this House, after it had had time to be returned upon it through a thousand channels, was relied upon to pass the bill necessary to carry this new policy of the administration into execution. I beg leave to read a single paragraph of this message, that I may submit a few remarks upon the singular character of it:

"I may be permitted, I trust, at this time, without a suspicion of the most remote desire to throw off censure from the Executive, or to point it to any other department or branch of the Government, to refer to the want of effective preparation in which our country was found at the late crisis. From the nature of our institutions, the movements of the Government in preparation for hostilities must ever be too slow for the exigencies of unexpected war. I submit it then to you, whether the first duty we owe to the people who have confided to us their power is not to place our country in such an attitude as always to be so amply supplied with the means of self-defence as to afford no inducement to other nations to presume upon our forbearance, or to expect important advantages from a sudden assault, either upon our commerce, our seacoast, or our interior frontier. In case of the commencement of hostilities during the recess of Congress, the time inevitably elapsing before that body could be called together, even under the most favorable circumstances, would be pregnant with danger, and if we escaped without signal disaster or national dishonor, the hazard of both unnecessarily incurred could not fail to excite a feeling of deep reproach. I earnestly recommend to you therefore, to make such provisions, that in no future time shall we be found without ample means to repel aggression, even although it may come upon us without a note of warning. We are now, fortunately, so situated that the expenditure for this purpose will not be felt; and if it were, it would be approved by those from whom all its means are derived, and for whose benefit only it should be used with a liberal economy and an enlightened forecast."

Here, sir, we have a distinct avowal that there has been gross neglect somewhere. That is something gained; but it is left doubtful whether it is Congress or the Executive

MARCH 16, 1836.]

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

that is chargeable with the neglect which is so manifest as to call for a full acknowledgment. It is evident, however, that the effect of the manner of this admission is to shield the delinquents, whoever they may be, and to charge the defenceless condition of our country at the late crisis to the nature of our Government. I shall, before I sit down, endeavor to vindicate our form of government from this charge, at least so far as concerns the late default. I pledge myself to show who were the real delinquents, and what were their employments when they should have been taking care of the public safety and interests. But there appears to me to be an inconsistency in the passage I have just read, which I cannot omit to point out. In one part of the paragraph this sentiment is expressed:

"From the nature of our institutions, the movements of the Government in preparations for hostilities must ever be too slow for the exigencies of unexpected war."

In another part of the same paragraph we find this sentence:

"I earnestly recommend to you, therefore, to make such provisions, that in no future time shall we be found without ample means to repel aggression, even although it may come upon us without a note of warning."

Now, sir, I do not know that it is proper to consider this passage as the result of deliberation, or to criticize too closely a paper which, like many of the same kind, have often to be drawn up without affording time for close or accurate revision; but it is manifest that this document was intended and expected to produce results of the greatest importance to the country. It was doubtless intended to prepare and reconcile the public mind to the change of policy by the party in power, and to give popularity to the project of expending the surplus revenue upon such objects as would raise us to the first rank among nations in military and naval power. I regard it, therefore, as entirely proper to point out any inconsistency which may impair the effect of it. It would be idle to vote a hundred millions to the public defence of the country, if it be true that, by reason of the nature of our Government, it is impossible that the country can ever be put into a condition to meet the emergency of sudden war.

Mr. Chairman, I regard the time as particularly propitious to a general review of the conduct and principles of men in power, especially in reference to the public defences. The French question is at an end, and we can now inquire into the conduct of the public officers who are responsible for them, and hold them up naked to the world, without a risk of exposing our weakness to a public enemy. A time of peace, too, it is said, is the time to prepare for war. This is the great maxim upon which the new policy of the administration is expected to be supported. A true and wise maxim it is, but one which is only half understood by those in whose mouths we most frequently find it. Many suppose that the only preparation for war consists in increasing our military and naval establishments. The great minister of the fourth Henry of France, who was surnamed the Great, understood the full import of this maxim. The best, the truest, and most effective preparation for war is to take care that all the important departments of the civil administration are in a sound and healthful condition, especially those connected with the fiscal resources of the country, and those which are the keys to public confidence. If they be disordered and deranged when entering upon a war, there can be no hope of a successful and economical management of the public credit and resources, or, in other words, of the sinews of war. There can be no reform in time of war. Public confidence is as essential to the support of war as money itself. In truth, it is confidence which supplies money. If you mean, then, really to enter upon a system of defence and effective preparation for war, begin at the right point: correct the abuses in your civil administration—regulate and discipline your household troops. When you have done this, and not before, may you feel secure of the faithful and skilful application of the public treasure to the public defence; and, when war shall actually come, success and victory cannot fail to crown your arms.

But there is a stronger justification than any I have yet mentioned, of the course of discussion and scrutiny which I propose. It is, that no time is to be lost in calling the attention of the public to, and exposing, some late practices of the party in power—practices which are of the most mischievous and alarming tendency. We have too long slept upon this subject. Every moment of silent acquiescence here tends to give currency and support to these dangerous innovations, in the minds of the people. If there were but one voice to be lifted up in this House against the late conduct of the party, it ought to be instantly and boldly uttered. Besides the direct interference of public officers of the highest grade in the election of members to both Houses of Congress, is not the Executive Chief Magistrate engaged in the canvass, the open advocate and champion of the election of the Vice President to the presidency? Have we not, in fact, a Government candidate for the presidency, supported by the whole power and influence of the Executive? Are not the whole train of public officers, with all their dependants, in the field, in full cry, harkening away, and hunting down every man who dares to interpose his influence against the consummation of their plans? I here in my place declare there is such a candidate, who, should he be elected, may be said to have succeeded to the presidency as truly and manifestly through the power and influence of the Government, as though he had been appointed to the succession, and actually installed in office by his predecessor. I do not say that every individual in office is giving himself up to this service; I know there are many honorable exceptions; but as a class, a corps, what I have said of the public officers I reaffirm. Sir, how long is this state of things to continue, before any solemn opinion shall be expressed by this House in regard to it? This interference of the Government in the election of a successor has been open and notorious for the last nine or twelve months. A session of Congress in the mean time has intervened; more than three months have elapsed since its commencement, and yet no resolution has been offered—no notice of any kind taken of so extraordinary a state of things. We have, too, a House of Representatives, in which there are said to be one hundred and forty members, who profess to be republicans! the disciples and followers of Jefferson! and not one of them has lifted up his voice here to denounce a practice so dangerous, and destructive of the constitutional guarantees of our liberty! How are we to account for this silence? Is it agreed by the party that there is no method of perpetuating their power but by a regular line of succession? Is this silence the result of a deliberate judgment, in favor of the practice of employing the patronage and influence of the Executive in behalf of the regularly nominated candidate? Sir, I hope, for the safety of the country, that it is not. But I have lately witnessed the rapid progress of error on this subject, not only in the minds of individuals, but of a whole community; and it is melancholy to reflect how sudden and precipitate may be the overthrow of all those principles and maxims which have heretofore been regarded as fundamental and essential to the very existence of our institutions and the public liberty. When the first evidence was given to the public of a direct interference of the Executive in the election of his successor, scarcely an individual of the party could be heard to defend it. But in a few short months every supporter of the Vice President in that community was ready to attest his sanction of the practice, as just and expedient, under his hand and seal, if necessary. It is time to oppose ourselves to this error, if we would save the constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken with great freedom of the course of the party in power, and I have not spared my censure when I thought it was deserved. I intend to continue to exercise this privilege in the course of the remarks I yet propose to submit. But it is due to myself, standing in the delicate and difficult relation I now do towards that party, that I should distinctly declare the nature of that relation. I have, up to a late period, given a general support to the present administration of the Government. I still consider myself a supporter of the administration, upon every leading and important question which has arisen, to the same extent to which I formerly gave them my support, except those which originated in, or have been changed and modified by, the illegitimate desire and purpose of the Executive to secure the election of a particular and favorite successor. As to all the principles and practices which have proceeded from this source, I am, I have been, and I am firmly resolved still to be, opposed. If any member of this House can claim the indulgence of the committee in commenting freely upon the present state of public affairs, and especially upon the practices and objects of those in power, when it is remembered by whom and in what manner I have been assailed, I think I may do so. It is not only due to myself, but it is due to the few friends with whom I act in this House. I owe it to many of those of the Jackson party who have united their interests and influence with the party which is attempting to bring in the Vice President, and whom I hope I may still claim as my personal friends, to vindicate the principles which have impelled me to my late course. It has been said that I have abandoned the party to which I once belonged. I deny that the party now in power is, properly speaking, and if principle be the test of party, the same with which I once acted. But, sir, if this be the party of which I was once a member, I am free to admit, and I am ready to demonstrate to them and the world, that either I or they have proved recreant and faithless to every cardinal principle and political virtue which they once professed and avowed as the rules of their conduct. I proceed now to the proofs; and I shall, when I have arrayed them, most cheerfully submit to the decision of the public upon the question whether I or the party are the culprits.

[Here Mr. BELL gave way to a motion that the committee rise. March 21st, the navy bill being again taken up, Mr. B. resumed.]

At the close of my remarks on yesterday, I was claiming the privilege of vindicating the course of myself and the few friends with whom I act in this House. I said they were few in number; they are so. For the sake of the country, I could wish the number greater; but for the honor of the enterprise in which we are engaged, I would not add a unit to it. I know, too, the exact extent of the sympathies and good wishes of those who constitute the larger proportion of the opposition in this House to the party of the succession, to which those with whom I act may lay claim; but I am content to receive their countenance and support, however limited it may be.

Mr. Chairman, some of those with whom I formerly acted in this House did not think my declaration upon the nature of my present relations to the party in power sufficiently explicit. I can have no possible motive to assume an equivocal position, either before the committee or the country; on the contrary, I consider my honor at stake in taking a different course. I therefore repeat, that I shall support all the measures of this administration which I shall find to be in accordance with its early avowed principles, in the same manner and to the same extent I have hitherto done; and I shall oppose with all my influence and ability, whatever they may be worth, every measure, every practice and movement of the party, which can be traced to the policy or motive of electing the executive favorite to the succession. If the declaration that I hold myself still the supporter of the administration, to any extent shall appear inconsistent with my votes upon so many party questions which arise in this House from day to day, I can only answer that it is not my fault if the party action of this House shall, in almost every instance, have a direct reference not to the support of General Jackson so much as to the election of a particular candidate the presidency.

I now proceed to notice briefly those leading and prominent principles and professions of the original Jackson party, which those who now claim to be identical with that party have abandoned and disregarded in practice.

The original supporters of General Jackson advocated his election against Mr. Crawford, the candidate nominated according to party usage, upon the ground that the practice of caucus nominations of a President of the United States was a violation of the spirit of the constitution, as it tended to defeat the contingent right of the small States to have an equal vote in the election of that high officer, as often as the election might devolve upon the House of Representatives. They also objected to such nominations, because they were effected by intrigue and corrupt influences; and upon the further ground that they tended to defeat the free and independent voice of the people. All the objections to a nomination by a congressional caucus apply with still greater force to a nomination by a convention of pretended delegates from the people, such as we have lately seen at Baltimore. In the first canvass of General Jackson this was, in a very large section of the Union, decidedly the most popular and available argument against the candidate who had the advantage of a nomination by the republican party. But now, sir, no man is admitted to be a Jackson man, or a supporter of his administration, who refuses to admit the practice of caucus nominations to be orthodox, and to subscribe to the obligation of acquiescence and absolute obedience. It is worthy of notice that the very individual (Mr. Grundy) who, in the State which I have the honor to represent in part, was the most active and powerful opponent of the practice of caucus nominations in 1824, is now the leader of the party in that State which supports the candidate of the Baltimore convention!

In General Jackson's second canvass for the office which he now holds, commencing in 1825, the first, most exciting, and one of the most important positions or principles assumed by his friends was, that the right of the people to elect the President should be rescued from the hands of political managers in and out of Congress, and vindicated and secured to them by new constitutional guarantees. The recent election of the gentleman from Massachusetts who sits before me [Mr. ADAMS] had given rise to this feeling and determination of the Jackson party. Hence the proposition to amend the constitution, so as forever to prevent the recurrence of a similar event, was taken up and proclaimed as a capital object to be accomplished by the election of General Jackson. So serious and obligatory was this engagement of his original supporters regarded by General Jackson, that he has felt himself bound, in common decency and candor, to bring the subject of an amendment of the constitution to the notice of Congress at the beginning of every session of his administration. But what has been the result? The party which now has the assurance to claim to be the only and exclusive supporters of that distinguished man have wilfully evaded the subject, as I will show before I close my remarks. They appear to have come to an understanding among themselves to regard all that the President is in the habit of repeating at each session upon this subject as an empty form. It has never been made a party question since General Jackson's first election. The fear of an election by the House was too potent an argument in favor of caucus nominations, to be dispensed with by a sagacious party. Another and most important principle assumed by the Jackson party in the canvass between 1825 and 1829 was, that it was essential to the purity of the Government, and to the independence of the elective franchise, that the practice of electing any of the great official incumbents to the presidency should be broken down. It was observed that, in the early period of the Government, it had come to be considered that the Vice President should, almost as a matter of course, and of right, succeed to the presidency. The first Mr. Adams, who was Vice President during General Washington's administration, was the next President. Mr. Vice President Jefferson ousted Mr. Adams, and, no doubt, but for the suicidal course of Mr. Vice President Burr, he would have succeeded Mr. Jefferson as President. But in Mr. Burr the regular succession of the Vice President to the presidency was broken, and afterwards the Secretary of State acquired something like a prescriptive right to succeed to the presidency. We must all remember the sentiment of a distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay,) expressed in justification of his vote, as a member of this House, in favor of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams,] upon this subject: he avowed the opinion that the election of the Secretary of State to the presidency was a safe precedent. How obnoxious this doctrine soon became, and how much the author of it suffered in the estimation of the honest and stern yeomanry of the country who supported General Jackson, are well known. It was said, that if the precedent of electing any of the great officers of the Government to the presidency should be followed for any great length of time, we might as well establish an hereditary succession at once. The argument was ably and powerfully enforced, that such a practice would necessarily lead to great abuses of the patronage and influence of the Executive; that a public officer of so high a grade, being always near the Government, and constituting a part of it, would always be able, with a very small share of address, to conciliate the favor and support of the Executive. Have these arguments lost their force by the mere lapse of time? Do they not carry with them the same weight and conclusiveness now, that they did during the canvass which brought General Jackson into power? Yet, sir, do we not see in the support which is given by the Government to the Vice President this important principle, these solid arguments, all set aside and trampled under foot by the party which still bears the name of Jackson?

It was also a favorite principle, and a most effective topic of electioneering declamation of the Jackson party, that the purity and independence of the public press should be guarded and protected by legal restrictions and provisions against the influence and control of the Executive. It was thought by the Jackson party in former years that $30,000, disbursed at the discretion of the Secretary of State, was sufficient to corrupt, in a dangerous degree, the entire public press. The discretion of the Secretary of State, it was seriously contended, ought to be limited by law, so as to prevent the possible abuse of this fund, by bestowing it upon political partisans. Who among us does not remember the famous resolution of a gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Saunders] upon this subject, and the equally famous debate that arose upon it? It was, I believe, a favorite scheme of my colleague, who is now the presiding officer of this House, [Mr. Polk,] to take from the Secretary of State the power of designating the publishers of the laws, and to vest it in the House of Representatives; so important, at that day, was the purity of the public press regarded by the Jackson party! I well remember what a decided effect was produced upon the minds of the people in the State which I represent in part, and what indignation was excited by the single act of the Secretary of State under the late administration, of taking the printing of the laws from the Nashville Republican, a paper friendly to the election of General Jackson, and giving it to the Whig, a paper published in the same place, and supposed to be in the interest of the administration. Well, sir, in the vicissitude of human affairs, it so happened that the party in whose cause the Nashville Republican had suffered came to be uppermost, and it was restored to its former rights and benefits; but, as if it were intended to manifest the utmost possible contempt for the early principles of Jacksonism, and to give the most unequivocal guarantee to new allies, which the nature of the case admits, that all the principles avowed by the original Jackson party are henceforth and forever to be repudiated and forgotten, the present orthodox Secretary of State has recently ordered the printing of the laws to be again taken from the Nashville Republican, which is now supporting Judge White for the presidency, and given to the Union, a paper printed in the same place, a paper purely partisan in its character, newly established, and of a very limited circulation, but in the interest of the Vice President. The Postmaster General has added his testimony to that of the Secretary of State, that the early principles identified with the name of Jackson are no longer to be the guide of the party in power. He has not only appointed a printer of a newspaper to be postmaster of a very thriving and considerable town in Tennessee, but the printer and the postmaster are actually suffered to meet in the same office. It is needless to say that this printer is, also, an avowed supporter of the Vice President. But, sir, to enumerate all the evidences which exist to show the deliberate purpose of the party to use the patronage of the Government in seducing the public press to their interests, would far exceed the limits of my remarks.

But the necessity of reform, a retrenchment of the expenditures of the Government, and the reduction and limitation of executive patronage, were the perpetual themes of the Jackson party, as originally constituted. The Augean stable, over which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] was said to preside, was to be cleansed; the number of executive officers was to be diminished; and the discretionary power of the President of removing or changing them was to be restrained by legal enactments. The principle of all these engagements of the party, and to which they were bound by the highest obligations of truth, honor, and patriotism, was regarded as vital. Corruption, through executive patronage, it was foreseen, would become so universal as soon to sap and undermine the pure foundation of our free institutions, and convert them into the mere instrument of power and ambition. How these promises and expectations have been fulfilled by the party which now wears its mantle, may be inferred from these facts: first, the abuses then existing in several departments of the public service have actually multiplied under the present administration, instead of being reformed; second, the expenditures, especially in those branches of the public service most liable to suspicion and abuse, have been increased; third, public offices have been increased, and numerous officers have been appointed, some with discretionary and arbitrary allowances, and some with annual salaries, without necessity or warrant of law. The patronage of the Government, instead of being reduced, has, of late, been increased in a most extraordinary and alarming degree in a variety of ways. The most obvious and alarming accession of executive patronage, power, and influence, which has taken place, has proceeded from the policy of the administration in putting down the United States Bank. Whatever may have been the motive, however pure and honest the purpose, the effect of that policy has been most clearly to put the Treasury, the money power of the country, at the absolute disposal of the Executive. Where is now your Treasury, and by what guards is it watched and secured? If the President should think proper to convert the entire revenue of the Government to any objects whatever of his own, whether public or private, is there any check or control existing in any department or officer of the Government, or any law, according to the construction which has been put upon existing enactments, over his will or command? Are not all the depositories of the public money selected, changed, and the terms of their connexion with the Treasury modified, at the mere will and pleasure of the Executive? Can he not order the public money to be retained in the hands of the collectors and receivers, or paid over, just as he shall think proper to direct? Though it may be that we have no just ground to apprehend any misapplication of the public funds by the President, (and I, for one, certainly have no such fears,) yet, is it fit in a republic that any one man, no matter how exalted in the public estimation, should have it in his power to dispose of the public moneys at his discretion? Is it fit, I repeat, that such a state of things should continue even for a day? But, sir, a party which calls itself republican has suffered not only months, but years, to elapse, under its administration of public affairs, without providing a remedy for this evil.

But, although we may have no fears of the fidelity of the President, so far as regards the expenditures of the public moneys by him, yet the mischief of increased executive patronage is actually abroad. The command of the depositories of the public money confers upon the Executive, in effect, the control of every bank in the Union, nearly five hundred in number. It is not only the deposit banks which are liable to become the instruments of his will and purposes, in the selection of their officers and in the general management of their affairs, but the control which he exercises over them clothes him with the power to embarrass and cripple the operations of every other bank in the United States, if he shall think proper to exercise it. Does any one doubt the ability of the Government, acting, through an unofficial and irresponsible agent, upon the various depositories of the public moneys, to bring sudden destruction upon the interests and affairs of any bank whatever, which may incur the displeasure of the party in power? If the late bank, chartered by Pennsylvania, shall be able to encounter the hostility of the Government, I undertake to say it will be the only one which can hope to sustain itself in such a conflict. The very consciousness that the power exists in the Executive of the United States to inflict so great an injury upon the interests of any bank which shall cross the wishes of those in power, whether there shall be any intention to exercise it or not, will cause every bank in the country to become more or less subservient to the purposes of the dominant party. But is there not just such an agent as I have described now in the employment of the Government? The Secretary of the Treasury could not be safely made the instrument of executive influence and control over the moneyed institutions of the country; his acts and correspondence would be official, and might be called for and exposed; even his verbal instructions and intimations could not be disavowed by the Government, should they by any accident be brought to light; but not so of the acts of the agent generally resident in this city, and notoriously in the confidence of the Executive and the deposit banks.

Sir, when we consider that the surplus revenue, including the unexpended balance in the Treasury, will, during the present year, average not less than thirty-five, and probably forty millions; and when we bring to mind the immense influence which the gratuitous use of this enormous capital gives to the Executive, besides the ordinary patronage of the Government, it is time that the country should awake to a sense of the consequences. Can public freedom long resist the assaults of such tremendous influences, when brought to bear, as we have just reason to believe they are, directly upon the election of the highest officers of the Government? It is not British capital; it is not the money of the United States Bank, whether dealt out in loans or largesses upon particular individuals; it is the people's own money which is turned against them, to corrupt the purity and destroy the freedom of the elective franchise!

Have we not seen very lately, by the proceedings of this House, that the party feel themselves no longer bound to pay even a decent regard to the question of the propriety of reducing or limiting executive patronage? The bill lately sent us from the Senate embraced, substantially, the creed of the original Jackson party upon this subject; yet, sir, the idea of attempting to attach any great importance to that bill, or to the subject-matter of it, was openly derided by several leading members of the party; and no single member of it gave it the least countenance, except the gentleman from Virginia who sits before me, [Mr. PATTON;] and even he qualified his approbation of the measure. Another honorable member from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] gave that bill its quietus in this House. It sleeps the sleep of death in the tomb to which he has consigned it. But does not every member of this committee know that an honorable Senator from Tennessee, and who stands in a very important relation to the public at this moment, has been denounced by the leaders of the party, and openly read out of the republican church by several of the leading journals of the party, for his course upon this bill? After these bold and undisguised evidences of the real contempt of the party for this whole subject, who is so credulous as to be hereafter deluded by their professions?

But again: is not the Senate, which was intended by the constitution to be in itself a standing check and limitation upon the use and abuse of executive patronage, to that extent, and as regards that purpose of its institution, actually expunged, and that, too, by executive power and influence? I demand of gentlemen to answer me, and say, if there exists, at this moment, practically, any controlling power in the Senate over the will of the Executive? Is not the constitution itself, for the time being, abrogated, subverted, overthrown? All men must now see and acknowledge that the duty of sending nominations of public officers to the Senate for advice and confirmation is reduced, in practice, to mere form. Have we not a Senate of the United States, notoriously replenished and organized upon the principle of non-resistance and passive obedience to the executive will and authority? And how, sir, has this state of things been brought about? The State Legislatures, those sentinel towers, as they have heretofore been supposed to be, upon the ramparts of the constitution and of the public liberty, have been boldly entered, and by executive influence seduced and prostituted to purposes of federal power and domination. Sir, if the Executive Chief Magistrate had entered the Senate chamber, sword in hand, and, supported by a band of chosen mercenaries, had driven the obnoxious Senators from their seats, and filled all the late vacancies by members of his own appointment, he would have inflicted a deep wound upon the constitution, and one which I know he would never think of inflicting; but it would have been less dangerous, and more easily healed, than the one which has actually been inflicted. Yet, sir, all these things have been done under the influence and in the name of a party which calls itself republican, and claims to be considered the Jackson party!

Naval Service Bill.

It is well known that an unbounded respect for the rights of the States was professed by the original Jackson party, and every measure or practice of the Government which tended to consolidation was denounced as inexpedient, and even dangerous. To prove how little regard has been shown by those who now wear the garb of Jacksonism for the constitutional rights and independence of the States, it would only be necessary to call to mind the interference of the Federal Government with the election of Senators by the State Legislatures. But, sir, I may add, that the legislative proceedings of State Assemblies have been interfered with, and many of those bodies have already been reduced to the condition of mere dependant and co-ordinate portions of the great party machinery by which it is supposed this country may hereafter be governed—the supple and convenient instruments of the Federal Executive and party interests.

How the pledge of the Jackson party to reform those abuses which, under the late administration, were said to have brought the patronage of the Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, has been redeemed by the party which now controls the course of public affairs, we all know, and some of us feel. Instead of an isolated case of such conflict, which now and then was supposed to have taken place during the administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] we now have the practice of such abuses reduced to a system, openly exercised, and openly justified by a large portion of the party!

I must not omit to notice the course of the party in reference to a branch of a great system of national policy which was thought, in the South and Southwest, to indicate the boundary between the two great contending parties then in the country, more clearly than any other: I allude to the subject of internal improvement by the General Government. It was supposed that this part of the policy of the late administration was checked by the celebrated veto message of 1830, and hundreds of the honest planters of the South and Southwest entertain that opinion to this day. Yes, sir, the truth is, that the expenditures upon objects which, in every light of reason, may be fairly denominated internal improvements, have actually increased under the action of the party now in the majority in this House, and far exceeded the expenditures of the late administration upon similar objects. I beg leave, as this is a curious as well as an interesting inquiry, to state the amount appropriated to objects of this description each year of the present administration, and the amount proposed to be voted by this Congress, which every one knows is orthodox. These appropriations have been usually made in two distinct bills, and under two separate classes. One class embraces the improvement of harbors and rivers, including breakwaters; the other, surveys, roads, and, in the language of the title prefixed to the acts, “certain works of internal improvement.” Under both these heads there was appropriated, in the year 1830, the sum of $525,523 48; in 1831, the sum of $732,482 44; in 1832, the sum of $1,252,658; in 1833, the sum of $1,030,493; in 1834, the sum of $736,883; in 1835, the sum of $652,377. It is proposed by the committee of this House, organized upon party principles, to appropriate to the same classes of objects, at the present session of Congress, the sum of $1,966,328 92. The amount appropriated to the same classes of objects in 1828, the last year of the late administration, was $250,808. Here, then, we propose to expend two millions during this year, or nearly so, for one of any former year. Sir, the party which sanctions all this is still called the Jackson party!

But, besides the open violation of these, and many other principles of the original Jackson party, what are we to think of the strange and before unheard-of principles avowed by leading members in the majority of this House, in the debate upon this bill? Appropriations, without limit as to object or amount, are openly vindicated. The infallibility of the Executive is proclaimed; because the people have trusted General Jackson, therefore we ought to trust him with the whole Treasury. One gentleman (I allude to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] who, I am sure, all will admit to be one of the most distinguished, as he is certainly one of the most active and efficient members of the party) declared that he had no scruples as to the amount of money to be appropriated; he was willing to trust General Jackson with the whole Treasury. “That great man,” he said, (to use his own language,) “was known upon the hills and in the valleys;” the people had unlimited confidence in him, and we ought to have the same. These, sir, were, to my ears, doctrines both new and extraordinary, whatever confidence General Jackson may be entitled to. They are surely not the doctrines of a republic, much less of a party which can justly claim the merit of exclusive devotion to republican principles. Yet these sentiments were distinctly avowed upon this floor by more than one gentleman, and no member of the party rose in his place to disavow and repudiate them. Even the ancient and famous Commonwealth of Virginia, which has long stood the boasted champion of the true republican faith, could furnish no son on that side of the House, who dared to disclaim sentiments so subversive of every principle heretofore held vital to our constitution. I am far from doing all the individuals composing the majority in this House the injustice to suppose that they approve these, or, indeed, many other principles and practices of the party with which they find themselves connected. I know how difficult it is for individual members to separate themselves from the party with which they act, upon any question whatever, which assumes a party complexion. I have often felt the difficulty of such a course myself. I believe, sir, there are many individuals of the party of the majority of this House who do not accord with the present course of the party to which they belong upon many questions; who cannot long abide their present party connexions; and, sir, if I possessed the power of exorcism upon this occasion, I would bid them instantly come out from among the uncongenial elements and associates with which they are at present united.

But we cannot be surprised at the avowal of strange doctrines by the present majority, when we recollect that the single principle upon which the elections of the present day generally turn is unlimited devotion, not to any particular political creed, but to the party! Accordingly, we often find members of this House, and leaders, too, who either have no knowledge of those principles which have heretofore divided the country, or are so entirely regardless of them, if they know what they are, as in the same speech, nay, in the same breath, to avow themselves both restrictionists and latitudinarians, States-rights men and consolidationists, thorough democrats and ultra-federalists. And yet this is the nature of the association which claims to be the republican party in the United States! I know of no instance of equal absurdity and arrogance in the assumption of names, except the one which recently occurred in Pennsylvania, in which a State bank took the name of the United States Bank!

H. of R.]

Naval Service Bill.

Sir, there is no one principle or maxim, as far as I can call to mind, avowed and professed by the original supporters of General Jackson, and which entered largely into the grounds of his success, which has not been evaded or disregarded; and many of the most vital and important of them have been openly, and, I regret to say, insultingly trampled under foot, in the face of the whole country, by the party now uppermost in influence, if not in power. In conclusion, upon this part of my subject, I have to request of gentlemen that they will answer my statements upon this subject fairly, in candor, and specifically; and that they will not evade the questions, and content themselves by pronouncing fulsome eulogies upon General Jackson, and in denouncing all who do not subscribe to every doctrine and practice of the party which supports his administration.

Mr. Chairman, I have not yet noticed the most exceptionable feature in the course of the party of the succession; for this may be well enough called the war of the succession, in the future history of the politics of the country, and one which, in my opinion, the friends of free government every where will long deplore. I allude to the practice of governing, and of securing party ascendancy, by an artful system of popular excitement and delusion. The people are treated more like children, to be led and controlled by the usual tricks of the nursery, by bewildering their fancies and exciting their fears, than as men who have understandings to be appealed to. The cause of free government, I maintain, has suffered under the action of the party in power, in this respect. The doctrine of the capacity of the people for self-government has been weakened by it.

For the last two years, the subjects which have been gotten up to agitate the public mind, and which in many sections were successful in securing majorities to the party of the succession, were a series of pretences and impostures. I cannot refrain from an attempt to expose some of them as they deserve. I pass over the gold and silver humbug of 1834, and which went off about the close of the elections in Pennsylvania and elsewhere in that year. I pass over, also, the imposture of the expunging project of the party, which has only recently spent its force. This question, all mankind must soon see, was got up with a view to change the political complexion of the Senate in regard to questions of more interest to the party than the vindication of the character of the President, as the late confirmation of certain appointments will show.

I desire chiefly, sir, to call the attention of the committee to the late war panic, as one of the engines invented to sustain the interests and carry out the projects of the party. I am disposed to discuss fully the rise, progress, and uses, of the late French war: for, sir, we had a species of war with the French, and it had proceeded so far that we had actually a French party organized in the country, according to the declaration of various public journals. One use for which this was gotten up appears to have been, to enable the party to traduce the conduct and motives of various individuals; and, indeed, the whole party opposed to the continuance in power of those who now exercise a controlling influence in the country. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] did me the honor to notice my motion to take up the subject of the rules of the House, before we went into committee upon the appropriation bills; and he charged that I had opposed his motion to take up the appropriation bills at the time when the country was exposed to the danger of a war with a powerful enemy, "to talk about rules, rules!" I made that motion, in all honesty, for the purpose then stated; and I now appeal to the committee to say, if we have not lost a great portion of the time of this session for the want of some amendments to the rules of the House. But the honorable gentleman refuted the justice of his charge, when, on the next day after, the navy bill was taken up, it was laid aside upon his motion, without any other apology than that it was important to act upon the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in New York. Upon the authority of this charge of the gentleman from New York, I must suppose a statement was found in the Globe, the official paper of the Government, which I beg leave to read. [Here Mr. BELL read a paragraph from the Globe, in which it was stated, among other things, that Mr. B. had opposed the appropriations for putting the country in a state of defence.] I care nothing for any of the misstatements in the paragraph which I have read, except the one which charges that I was opposed to appropriations for the defence of the country. This statement is so far from being true, that I took the first occasion which fairly presented itself to declare my readiness to vote for liberal appropriations for this object; and such was my determination from the first. To show how far the political managers had succeeded in agitating the country by their course upon this subject, I will read another paragraph from the same paper of the 2d February:

"Resolutions sustaining, in the strongest terms, the ground taken by the President's message, have passed both branches of the New York Legislature unanimously. Nothing can speak more absolutely the sentiments of the American people than this unanimous expression of the feeling of all parties, where the party line is most strictly drawn and firmly maintained. There was never, we presume, a unanimous vote on any great question in that State before.

"In Alabama, too, the Legislature which has just adjourned closed its labors with a patriotic declaration that the State would pour out its blood and treasure like water, to sustain the Executive in the stand he has taken for the rights of the country."

Similar resolutions were passed by many other State Legislatures. Further to unfold the use which was intended to be made of the excitement created upon this question, and how and upon whom the indignation of the country was intended to be pointed, when once successfully roused, by unfounded representations, I ask leave to read another paragraph from the same paper, of the 11th of January.

After quoting the sentiment of the late Governor Shelby, of Kentucky, in relation to the policy of increasing the public defences, and preparing for war in time of peace, the editor makes the following comment upon it:

"What humiliation, after all the warning we have had, that the French should have the opportunity afforded of profiting by our dereliction of their invaluable instruction—of adopting the policy abandoned by us, and sweeping across the seas, prepared to punish, in a whole people, the vice of tolerating factious cabals of selfish intriguers, ready to sacrifice every public virtue, every patriotic feeling, to the sinister ends of personal ambition."

Besides these improper uses made of the late panic, there is strong reason to believe that another object in keeping it up was to aid in disposing of the surplus revenue of the Government. I feel myself, therefore, justified in remarking fully upon the whole question, and I now propose to demonstrate the following propositions:

I. Either that there was no probability, at any time, of a war with France, or that the public functionaries of the Government have been guilty of criminal neglect of their public duties; or, if there was actual danger of war, then that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] and those with whom he is associated in controlling the action of the Government, have paltered with the honor and safety of the country.

It may be of use to recur to the dates of the principal events connected with our recent difficulties with France.

MARCH 16, 1836.]

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The treaty was signed on the 4th of July, 1831. The bill drawn by this Government for the first instalment due under the treaty was presented and protested on the 2d February, 1833. The treaty was laid before the Chamber of Deputies for the first time on the 6th of April, 1833; a second time on the 11th of June, 1833; and a third time on the 13th of January, 1834. It was rejected by the Chamber of Deputies on the 1st of April, 1834. Information of this rejection reached Washington on the 6th of May following. Congress was then in session, and did not adjourn before the 30th day of June following. The message of the President recommending reprisals was sent to Congress 2d December, 1834. The French Government recalled their minister in January, 1835. Congress adopted a resolution to adhere to the treaty on the 2d of March, 1835. The Chamber of Deputies passed the indemnity bill, including a clause requiring an apology from this Government, as a condition of payment, on the 18th April, 1835. Information of this fact, I suppose, must have reached this Government some time in June following, at the farthest. The letter of the Duc de Broglie was read to Mr. Forsyth on the 11th September, 1835. Connecting the order of these events with the incidents connected with each of them, and which would require too much time to enumerate, it will be seen that some ground to apprehend a rupture with France might have been found in the protest of the bill for the first instalment due under the treaty, and the delay in carrying the treaty before the Chamber of Deputies. But, if war was to be apprehended at any time, it would seem that the rejection of the treaty, in April, 1834, would furnish the strongest ground of such apprehension. It was then that the most alarming spirit showed itself in the French Chamber of Deputies. But, admitting that that occurrence was so explained as to remove any serious fears of a rupture, the recall of the minister of France, in January, 1835, was calculated to cause some alarm. But, if that was not sufficient, surely, if there has ever been any danger of war, it must have been developed upon the passage of the indemnity bill, with the clause requiring an apology, in April, 1835. But, at all events, this danger, if it existed at all, must have become manifest upon the receipt of the letter of the Duc de Broglie, on the 11th September last; which, it is alleged, gave the first authentic notice that the apology would be insisted upon. Yet, sir, during the whole period from the 3d of February, 1833, when the bill of this Government for the first instalment due under the treaty was protested, up to the commencement of the present session of Congress, the dilapidated, unfinished, and unarmed state of our fortifications, the decayed state of our little navy, and the exposed and defenceless condition of our whole seacoast, were well known to the Government. Yet no recommendation is made by the Executive, and no step actually taken, to complete, arm, or repair them, up to the present session of Congress! A prudent foresight would have called for supplies from the Treasury, and caused the utmost activity to prevail in both these branches of the public service from May, 1834; if not from that time, at all events from the moment it was known that an apology was required by France which could not be made. But not a hammer is heard; a dead silence reigns during all this time, not only in our navy yards and upon the fortifications, but even in our public documents and in our legislative proceedings, upon the subject of defence or preparation for war! But if this neglect to call upon Congress for the means of putting the country in a condition to meet the emergency of war, until the opening of the present session, may be excused, what plea can save the gentlemen? What apology can they make to the country for their failure to urge upon Congress the necessity of immediate action, and of voting the necessary supplies without delay, to finish and arm our fortifications, to fit out and repair our ships of war, at the opening of the present session of Congress? We read with amazement the reports from the War and Navy Departments, without finding any notice or recommendation of war appropriations—any reference to the supposed crisis. We read the President's message itself, without any recommendation of those speedy and vigorous measures which the alleged exigency called for. But this is not all; the regular and ordinary appropriations for the army, the navy, and fortifications, were not reported by the Committee of Ways and Means at the first of the session, nor until after the lapse of nearly a month; and, after they were reported, they were permitted to sleep upon the table for more than a month before they were seriously moved! And are two months' time of no importance, when we are upon the eve of a war? Mr. Barton arrived about the middle of January, and brought no better prospects of peace than we had at the beginning of the session. And on the 18th of January we were favored with the first special message; but still the navy bill was taken up only to be laid down again! Yet, sir, during all this time, the country is kept under continual apprehension of war! Have we not a right to an explanation of this mystery?

Let it not be said that those who caused the loss of the three million appropriation on the 3d of March, 1835, are responsible for the late neglected and defenceless condition of the country. When the news, first of the proffered mediation of England, and then of the satisfaction given to the French Government by the first message, reached us, we were within a few days of the 3d of March, 1836; nearly a whole year having elapsed since the loss of the three million appropriation, and no step was taken in the mean time to repair that error, if it were one. Who is responsible for the neglect of the public defences since the 3d of March, 1835? The constitution clearly pointed out the remedy for the miscarriage of that proposition. If any cause existed to create a just apprehension of war, Congress might have been convoked at any time after the 3d of March, 1835; and none can doubt that, if the President had recommended appropriations for the public defence, even at the close of the last session, they would have been promptly voted by both Houses of Congress. But, for the delay in adopting measures of defence and preparation for war after the present session commenced, neither the Senate nor the House is responsible: the House has never failed to take up any appropriation bill the moment it was moved by the regular organ of the administration, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I repeat, then, either that there has, at no time, been any probable cause of war; or that those whose duty it was to provide for such an emergency have been guilty of a criminal neglect of duty; or, if there was actual danger of war, that those who have controlled the action of the Government on this subject have paltered with the honor and safety of the country.

II. But, if there has been no just cause to apprehend war, I affirm that the party which now controls the Government have played upon the honest credulity of the people, trifled with the feelings of the brave and patriotic, disturbed the quiet, alarmed the timid, and checked the trade and enterprise of the country, in the most unjustifiable manner, and for the most unworthy party purposes.

Without going into particulars, I appeal to the members of this committee, and to the country, if, since the 3d of March, 1835, there has not been a constant and studied effort on the part of the Government journal of this city, by the presses in the same interest all over the country, to create and foster the belief that there was danger of a war with France? Have we forgotten,

H. of R.]

Naval Service Bill.

can we ever forget, the continued and furious denunciations of the Senate, and particularly of an honorable Senator from Tennessee, for refusing to give their support to the three million appropriation? Upon this point, we have but to remember the inflammatory appeals incessantly made to the people, upon the defenceless condition of the country, since March, 1835. But we have better proof, if possible, than these, of an intention to excite the country upon the subject of a French war. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] in his remarks upon moving the amendment of two millions to the bill under consideration, on the 13th January, and again in his speech upon the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] took high ground upon this subject, and indirectly charged every man who failed, at such a crisis, to vote for the appropriation moved at the last session of Congress, as an enemy to his country. His words were, that "every friend of his country" did so. He also spoke of frittering away the rights, and honor, and interest of the country for mere forms; and he had the audacity—I mean no offence by the use of the term, but I cannot find one more expressive of his course—he had the audacity to say to the House that it would be more profitably employed in putting the country in a state of defence, than in debating a resolution which he himself, and all his political friends, except one or two of the more sagacious, had voted to take up and discuss in preference to all other business before the House! The gentleman also reminded the House that, "in former times, the patriots of the country did not wait until the enemy was at our gates before they voted the means of defending the country." He, in the same speech, expressed the sentiment that, "if France now paid the money, she would be more disgraced than any one nation ever was."

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here explained, and asked the gentleman from Tennessee to state all that he had said in connexion with the words referred to. His meaning was, that the French Government would be disgraced, if, after exacting an apology, and declaring that none would be received but one according to the letter, it should pay the money, when none such was or ever could be made.]

Mr. BELL resumed. The gentleman from New York was correctly understood by me, but he will perceive that the force of my argument is not impaired by his explanation. It is rather strengthened by it. I was referring to that part of the gentleman's speech, to show that he intended, by that declaration, to impress the country with the belief that we would have war. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] also contributed his efforts to increase the expectation of war. He informed us, in his remarks upon the resolution submitted by him on the 26th of January, "that we might be resting under a false security; that it was unsafe to cry out peace! peace! when there was no peace;" and, in the conclusion of his argument upon that occasion, he solemnly warned members of the House of the weight of responsibility which would rest upon them if they refused to accede to his proposition at such a crisis, and when the country was in so defenceless a condition. These, sir, are fair specimens of the system of agitation which has been pursued since the 3d of March, 1835. A system of alarm and agitation upon the subject of a French war has been the order of the day. Many members of the party in this House appear to have been deceived by it. One gentleman, in speaking of the resolution of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] proposing an inquiry into the expediency of increasing the navy, declared that he was ready to anticipate the opinion of the Executive in relation to a war with France. The same gentleman said aloud, in his place, when the vote was about to be taken upon that resolution, that he would consider a vote against it as an abandonment of the administration! Now, why all these declarations? Why all this alarm? Why were we continually threatened with the prospect of war, if there was actually no probability of such an event? Gentlemen must know that much real mischief has been the result of this course. It is only a few days ago that I received a letter from a planter of the Southwest, written before the news of the present state of our relations with France reached him, filled with the most gloomy forebodings of the consequences of a war upon the planting interest, and stating that the energies of the country were already in some degree paralyzed, in contemplation of that event. A large portion of the country was misled. Many of our most intelligent citizens were made to believe that we would have war. Our merchants were afraid to adventure; our ships lay, for a time, idle at our wharves; and a material check was given to the trade and enterprise of the country. I ask again, if there was really no danger of war, why those false pretences—those unfounded alarms? I repeat, that the honest credulity of the people has been played with; the feelings of the brave and the patriotic have been trifled with; and serious injury has been inflicted upon the country for the most unworthy party purposes.

III. But whether there was danger of war or not, or whether war was intended or not, I affirm that those who advised and permitted the late state of our relations with France, and suffered the public defences to remain in their present condition, exposed the country to the imminent hazard of dishonor and great damage. Is not this now a self-evident proposition? If there was no intention to provoke a war with France, is it not evident that our diplomatists got us into a position from which we could not retreat without dishonor or war, if France had been inclined to war on her part, and had adhered obstinately to the letter of the apology demanded by her Government? Sir, we said, in the first place, that we would ask for nothing but what was right, and would submit to nothing that was wrong. We then threatened to indemnify ourselves for the money due under the treaty by reprisals upon French commerce. In our public journals, in the official gazette of this city, we openly charged the French King and Government with a breach of faith; we abused, through the same journals, the whole French people and character; and, at the same time, did all we could to rouse the people of our own country to a war spirit and determination against France. Well, sir, while we are in the midst of this honorable career, the Chambers vote the money, but say they must have an explicit explanation of these sayings and doings on our part, as a sine qua non of payment. The President replies promptly, as was proper, that he will make no apology. Now, sir, was there any course left, but to fight, or be disgraced in the eyes of all the world, if France had been obstinate, and had agreed to receive no apology except one in the form the President had declared he would not give it? After years of pompous declarations of what we would do if France did not comply with our demands, we could not, with honor, have delayed such measures of redress as would have provoked an immediate declaration of war on the part of France. If it had been our fortune to have encountered immediate war—that, in the outset, our arms would have suffered defeat, and all our interests infinite injury, none can doubt. If any gentleman is disposed to imagine a different result, let him look at the relative condition and resources of the two countries at this moment. Our fortifications are decayed, incomplete, and unarmed; our harbors and large towns undefended and defenceless; our navy, consisting of only some twenty ships of war in commission, and among the number only one ship of the line and four frigates. To match these, France has more than a hundred ships of war in commission, and, among the number, six or eight ships of the line and sixteen frigates. But we have some forty ships upon the stocks, and which might be made available in a short time, and, among the rest, eleven ships of the line and fourteen frigates. But, to match these, again, France has more than two hundred ships of war on the stocks or in ordinary, and which could be made available in a short time, and, among the rest, fifty-seven ships of the line and sixty-four frigates. It was against this naval force, five times greater than our own, that our honor was pledged to combat without delay, if France had been obstinate, or, rather, if the political complexion of Europe had not interposed to modify her councils.

Naval Service Bill.

IV. But, upon a full view of all the circumstances of this question, there will appear too much room to believe that those who really direct the course of public affairs, and who claim to be the exclusive champions of the fame and honor of the country, never intended or had any strong apprehensions of war, whatever the rank and file of the party may have thought. They have felt, all the while, that they held in their own hands the issue of peace or of war; and they were perfectly easy on that score. How, and under what private assurances, they came to feel such confidence on these points, it is not for me to inform the public. But that they had sufficient evidence to satisfy them, on the 11th of September last, or before or after that date, that such an explanation as the President could at any time give, without any inconsistency with his declaration that he would not make the apology demanded by the indemnity bill, was in possession of the leaders of the party here, I have no doubt. But, sir, there were too many advantages to be expected from keeping up a panic; and the war has been permitted to rage, not against France, but against the Senate, against an honorable Senator from Tennessee, and upon the Treasury.

Need I go into details? Need I point out the particular proofs upon which I rest this charge, grave and serious as it is? Sir, does not the neglect to take the first step towards defending the country prove the fact, without further showing? It is notorious that one, if not more, of your largest commercial depots (Boston) and naval stations were, and are at this moment, not only defenceless, but not even a single gun can be brought to bear for its defence, though it is now nearly two years since the rejection of the treaty by the French Chambers. Public property of the value of seven or eight millions of dollars is also known to be deposited at this point. One thousand pieces of heavy ordnance are wanted to arm the fortifications already finished, or nearly so, and some fifteen hundred for the navy, in addition to those on hand; many of the guns now constituting a part of the armament of our ships of war are of a construction which renders them, in the opinion of many, as terrible to ourselves as to a public enemy, and all the while we have had nothing but rumors of war; yet, sir, the first great gun has not been cast to prepare for the battle! The timbers of your ships upon the stocks are rotting, and in some instances are actually rotten. The truth cannot be disguised, and need not now be disguised, that three frigates and five thousand men, skilfully commanded, could at this moment capture, burn, or lay under contribution, your largest commercial towns; capture and destroy all your ships of war in ordinary or on the stocks, together with every stick of timber you have been collecting for so many years, at any or all of your numerous navy yards! Nay, sir, I have heard the opinion expressed, (and I believe it well founded,) that, in the event of war, a single frigate might have been towed up the Potomac, and have battered down this Capitol, and every public building in this metropolis, with perfect impunity; so wholly neglected and defenceless are all the exposed points upon our bays and seacoast! The belief that our public functionaries can have been seriously meditating war, under these circumstances, could only be founded upon the idea that they were either lunatic or treacherous to the country—a supposition which none can for an instant indulge.

But there are other evidences that war has not been before the eyes of the leaders and managers of the party. If it had been, the first movement at the opening of the session would have been to make immediate appropriations for the public defences; the appropriation bills would not have slept upon the table until the 9th of February, for it was not until that day that the navy bill was seriously moved. The annual executive reports would also have been swollen with the note of war preparations. But what did we really see in them? The usual estimates for fortifications from the Department of War. From the Navy Department, a recommendation of three frigates and three sloops of war, in addition to the number of vessels now in commission, for the more ample protection of our commerce! But the most decisive and satisfactory evidence that war was never actually anticipated as a thing of substance, although kept continually ringing in our ears, is to be found in the action of the committees of this House, organized upon party principles, and where every disposition exists to second the views of the administration. None can be so ignorant as not to know that if war with so powerful a nation as France had been regarded as a probable event, every resource of credit and revenue ought to be husbanded with the most rigid economy. It is obvious, however, that the very reverse of this policy was pursued. New sources of expenditure have been sought out. The expenditures upon internal improvements were proposed to be doubled in the course of the present year, as we have seen. The Committee on the Public Lands, early in the session, reported a bill for the reduction of the price of the public lands, which it may be estimated would soon reduce the revenue from that source one third or one half. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who is at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs in this House, and who, from the prominent and distinguished position which he now occupies in the party, as their candidate for the vice presidency, must be presumed to have been in the secret of those who were best informed as to the prospect of a war with France, reported a bill proposing to expend, during the present year, upon fortifications, the sites of which have not yet been purchased from the private owners, and which no one supposes could be constructed in time to have been of any use in the war anticipated with France, the enormous sum of two millions and a half! But there is another piece of evidence more conclusive, if possible, than any I have yet pointed out. A salary and outfit for a minister to France are asked for in the general appropriation bill, and reported as early as the 26th of December last. This fact can only be explained upon the supposition that our Government looked with certainty to an immediate restoration of amicable relations with France. It is absurd to suppose either that this proposition found its way into the bill by accident, or that it was regarded as mere form, and the money intended to be used only upon the contingency of a settlement of the difficulties with France during the year. If the stern and apparently uncompromising and warlike stand taken by the President in his messages to Congress at this session was intended to operate upon France, as is alleged, would the Secretary of State have ventured to counteract all the effect of his display of firmness, by sending in an estimate for the support of a minister at the very court to which it was our policy to hold up the vision of war? The idea is inadmissible. The appropriation was asked in the perfect confidence that, by the close of the session, it would be desirable to send a minister to France.

H. of R.]

Naval Service Bill.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken fully of what I consider objectionable in the course of the party in power, in relation to our difficulties with France. But I wish it to be borne in mind, that it is not their course towards France that I complain of; it is to their course towards their own country, in keeping up an unfounded alarm, for various party purposes, that I object. As to France, I make no defence, I have attempted no defence, of her conduct. In my opinion, no defence can be made for the course of that Government, in requiring an apology before payment of the money. The money that was admitted to be due, by treaty, ought to have been first paid: and then an apology might, with better reason, have been demanded.

But, sir, I cannot forbear to remark on the superior skill of the French Government in the management of the question on her part, if it had been her policy or interest to provoke or make war. The French were insulted; the faith of their King called in question; and the pride of the nation roused by a menace of hostile measures on the part of this Government. They recall their minister, and our distinguished negotiators take it for granted that there was an end of French resentment. They proceed with dignity to discuss the treaty again; and when they are prepared, they announce the result to our Government by a vote of the Chambers. They give no insult; they use no menace; they make no pompous parade of hostile intentions; but simply and firmly declare that they are now ready to pay the money, but desire to be saved the mortification, in the face of all Europe, of having been compelled to the measure of payment by the terror of American arms. When France avows her purpose, in the very teeth of your unanimous resolution to adhere to the treaty, that she will pay only upon receiving an apology, she makes the declaration after active and effective preparations to meet all the consequences; she declares her purpose under cover of a hundred ships of war, and a hundred thousand men. Now, a menace under such circumstances would mean something. What must Europe have thought of our Government, if we had unfortunately been suddenly involved in a war with France? She would not have undervalued the people of this country, their spirit, or resources, for in time we would have caused both to be properly estimated; but what opinion would have been formed of the skill and foresight of the party in power, I leave to the country to determine.

Let it not be said that General Jackson is responsible for all the deficiencies in the public defences. He has responsibilities enough of his own to bear. Let the leaders of the party be held to a just proportion of them—the heads of Departments to theirs. The Vice President has less to do than any of them with the details of business—in fact, he has no business; he is the very man who has had nothing to do but to exercise a general superintendence over all the various departments of the public service. The President, besides the various and constantly recurring duties of his office, has, to my certain knowledge, given a very large proportion of his time to the interest of the Vice President in Tennessee and elsewhere. He supposed, naturally enough, that his lieutenants, his secretaries, together with the Vice President, who aspires to bear off the chief honor in the gift of the party, would take care that the public defences were duly attended to.

If I am asked, Mr. Chairman, how it happened that I was ready to have voted liberal supplies for defending the country, when I had so decided a conviction that there was no danger of a war with France, I answer, that it was not for me to assume the responsibility of acting upon the certainty that there would be no war. I formed my opinion upon circumstances which were conclusive to my mind, but I could not know what might be the result of the complicated interests of the party in power. It was quite possible that they might have found themselves engaged in a war, against their own calculations.

Sir, while I am upon the subject of the neglect and omission of duty, in relation to the military and naval defences, on the part of those who have had charge of the general interests of the country, I beg leave to make a few remarks upon the condition of other branches of the public service. It is not only our fortifications and our navy which have been permitted to remain unarmed; and in a state of dilapidation, but I affirm that many of the civil departments of the Government are in no better condition; and this I am ready to demonstrate to the House and to the whole country, if proper authority is given for that purpose. Besides the irregularities, abuses, and corruptions, which have been shown to exist in the Post Office Department, I affirm that the General Land Office is in a condition scarcely less deplorable. There is neither order, despatch, nor, in the case of some of the officers, is there fidelity in the management and administration of that most important and interesting branch of the public service. I affirm that this is true, and would be so, independently of the alleged want of clerical force in the department. The evil exists in many of the great land districts in the interior. The same thing is substantially true of the Indian department. That branch of the public service has, within a few years past, grown into an importance four or five fold greater than formerly. The expenditures in this department, a few years ago, did not exceed some two or three hundred thousand dollars annually; now they are between one and two millions; the irregularities and abuses appear to have multiplied in proportion to the magnitude of the public interests connected with it. What, it may be asked, are the causes of these extraordinary abuses? The cause is simple and single. The entire incompetency of much the larger number of the officers and agents employed as heads of bureaus, or distinct and subordinate offices. It is the want of capacity, of skill, and, in some cases, of every necessary quality. This is the great and decided cause; and the remedy does not exist in a new organization of this or that department, nor in the invention of new checks and restrictions upon the discretion of officers. The remedy for this abuse, like all others, will be found in the removal of the cause of it. Nothing is more important to be understood, and extensively propagated, in this country, than this: that no Government, however wise and perfect in its form, exists, but may and will be abused and perverted to bad and corrupt ends, whenever it shall fall into the hands of a set of administrators of loose or bad principles. No constitutional or legal enactments can supply the deficiency of ability or fidelity; no checks or regulations can anticipate and defeat the devices of artful and unprincipled office-holders. Neither ability nor purity can be conferred by law. On the other hand, all experience has shown that, under any form of government or of official regulation, however defective, when the public officers are possessed of the attributes of talents and fidelity, the public liberty will be respected, the public prosperity promoted, and the great end of human government successfully carried out.

But there is one mystery connected with the existence of the gross abuses in some branches of the public service which deserves to be mentioned. How has it happened that these abuses have not only been suffered to exist, but even to increase under an administration so decidedly popular and powerful? When this problem shall be solved to the satisfaction of the public, the remedy will be supplied. The true answer to the question how these abuses come to exist under such an administration is, because the administration is such as it is—because it is popular. Every man of sound mind and lawful age knows that the President, nor any other being of created existence, can exercise a personal inspection and superintendence over all, or even a tenth part, of the most important details of the public service; yet every important transaction connected with the public service is so managed by the subordinate officers as to throw the responsibility upon the President. If the delinquent officers do not do this themselves, their defenders in Congress and out of Congress do not fail, in effect, to fix the responsibility there. Whenever in Congress, or in the country, complaint is made of abuse in any branch of the public service, the answer is, eternally, that the charge is meant as an attack upon General Jackson! His great name and popularity are the shield and buckler of every official delinquent, whether from incompetency or infidelity, from a clerk to the head of a Department; from the register or receiver of a land office, or an Indian agent, to a minister plenipotentiary! The name and services of Gen. Jackson, I repeat, are invoked to shield and cover over, as with a mantle, every official transgression or omission, from the highest to the lowest, whenever it suits the interest of the party to avail themselves of them. And the people are called upon to rally round, to stand by and defend, not the individuals arraigned, not the delinquent department; but the President himself, who, it is asserted through a thousand channels, is intended to be struck at and stabbed through the sides of the accused officer or department. The people cannot, at once, detect the artifices of party. They are jealous of every thing which savors of an attack upon General Jackson; and they, in general, act upon that suspicion. Those, therefore, who dare, here or elsewhere, to find fault with the course of affairs, upon any ground, instead of finding countenance from those in power, or from the dominant party, instead of being cheered on in the ungracious task of reform, are met at the threshold with the charge of secret and sinister motives—with anti-Jacksonism. They are told that their object is to assail the character of the hero of New Orleans and the conqueror of the United States Bank, as if either one or the other of those victories could be of any worth, now or hereafter, except to protect the constitution, the country, and its liberties; as if those victories could be of any value, if, as the price of them, we are to surrender that very constitution, those very liberties, those rich and glorious prizes, for which those battles were fought and won. If they who venture to make charges against any department of the public service are not met precisely in this way, they are, at all events, told that General Jackson is the head of the Government; that he is responsible for all the executive branches of the public service; and no attack can be made upon any branch of the service, therefore, without attacking him, and every body knows that he does his duty; a most shameful, egregious, and pernicious fallacy. But the absurdity of the argument does not prevent it from being constantly interposed. The argument is, that, because General Jackson is able, faithful, and patriotic, in the discharge of all his duties, therefore all the subordinate officers of the Government are so likewise. But more: if any one shall reply to all this, that he means no attack upon General Jackson, and that he is willing to exonerate him from any agency in the abuses which are alleged to exist, he is forthwith denounced as a hypocrite, as a dastardly assailant, who wants the courage and independence to make a direct attack. He is dared to come forward like a man, and assail General Jackson as the author of all these abuses; his pride is appealed to, his feelings are chafed, to draw him on to utter the fatal denunciation, and the moment he does so, the myrmidons of the party stand ready to hack him to pieces! These, sir, are the true causes of the continued abuses in the public service. They are themselves, without doubt, the greatest of all abuses. So long as a great and venerated name may be successfully opposed to all inquiry, to all reform in the public service, so long will abuses continue to multiply. So long as a system of terror and punishment, through the agency of the public press, shall be successfully practised, abuses will thicken upon us. I have said that the means resorted to, to suppress inquiry into abuses, are themselves the greatest of all abuses. Sir, they are so. I affirm that they are such as cannot long exist in a free Government; for no Government in which they exist for a great while can be free.

MARCH 16, 1836.]

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The failure of the proposition to appropriate three millions of dollars for the army, navy, and fortifications, and the loss of the regular fortification bill at the close of the last session of Congress, are now become stale subjects; but the circumstances connected with those events, and the use which has since been made of them, are of too much importance, and too intimately connected with the character and conduct of the party in the majority in this House, to be suffered to pass without further notice. The common opinion of the country is, that to Congress alone is to be attributed the late defenceless condition of the country, when it was supposed that we were on the eve of a war with France; and the loss of the three million appropriation and of the fortification bill, between the two Houses, has been the evidence relied upon to fix the responsibility there. To do justice to the respective political parties, between which this subject has become a point of contention, it is important that the real authors of those miscarriages should be clearly ascertained and exposed.

But, before I come to notice the circumstances immediately connected with the action of the two Houses upon this subject, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the course of the party in power, in relation to the public defences, during the session of 1834, as well as the last session, which will include the whole period of time since the rejection of the treaty by the French Chambers, in April, 1834. I expect to show, by this inquiry, that it was the policy, systematically pursued, during the years 1834 and 1835, up to the 3d of March in that year, to keep down the appropriation for fortifications, and to curtail them below the usual standard, notwithstanding the pending quarrel with France; and, before I have done, I trust I shall be able to place before the committee such facts as will leave it no longer doubtful who should bear the responsibility of the neglected, unarmed, and decayed condition of the public defences.

The regular bill making appropriations for fortifications for the year 1834 was under consideration on the 19th day of June of that year. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. POLK,] who was the regular organ of the administration in this House on all subjects connected with appropriations of the public money, and who, in this instance at least, all will agree, cannot be suspected of taking a course in opposition to the views of the Executive, made a motion to amend the bill by reducing the item reported in the bill by the committee for preservation of Castle Island, and repairs of Fort Independence, in Boston harbor, from $34,758 80 to $17,594. This motion was successful. He followed up this motion by moving to strike from the bill $100,000, which had been reported for a fort on George's Island, in Boston harbor; but this motion failed, after an animated debate. The same gentleman again moved to strike from the bill the appropriation of $100,000 for a fort on Throg's Neck, and also the item of $50,000 for a fort at Grand Terre, Louisiana. Both these motions were carried against the wishes of the organ of the Government. A gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McKIM] moved to add an item of $25,000 for the defence of Baltimore, which was voted down. That these proceedings may be duly understood and estimated by the country, it must be borne in mind that they took place nearly a month after the receipt of the intelligence by this Government of the rejection of the treaty by the French Chamber of Deputies, and after the question of a war with France gave rise to much speculation in the public mind. It ought, also, to be remembered, in connexion with the proceeding in relation to the defence of Boston harbor, that there is not to this day a single gun mounted, nor a single work in repair, for the defence of that city.

I now proceed to notice, in order, the proceedings of the House of Representatives upon the regular fortification bill for the year 1835. That bill was taken up for consideration on the 15th January of that year. Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, moved an amendment of $75,000 for repairing the fortifications on Castle Island, in Boston harbor according to a plan of the board of engineers. He argued, in support of his motion, that a call had been made on the War Department by the estimate of the board of engineers. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. POLK] "denied that this appropriation was authorized by the recommendation of the Department. He then called on the House to endeavor to keep these appropriations down, at least to the estimates of the officers appointed to make them." He further stated that "he had long, with pain, witnessed the fact, that all excesses of appropriations had originated in that House." The same organ of the Government, and leader of the party upon this subject, [Mr. POLK,] when upon the floor again, during the same debate, declared that, "as he regarded the vote which would be given on this question indicative of the feelings of the House on subjects of the most emphatically vital importance, he deemed it essential to have a full House when it was taken. He therefore moved a call of the House." The motion of Mr. Everett was rejected, after a call of the House, by a vote of 120 to 87. Of those who voted in favor of the amendment, only sixteen belonged to the administration party; and ninety of the same party voted in the negative; and, of course, gave their deliberate sanction to the doctrines and policy laid down and advocated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

It is an important and singular fact, that the fortification bill, at the last session of Congress, went to the Senate, from the House, with less than one half of the amount appropriated in the year 1834. If dates had not been referred to, I dare assert that no one would have dreamed that these solemn proceedings, this deliberate vote in confirmation of the policy of small appropriations for the military defences of the country, could have taken place as late as the middle of January, 1835, after the date of the reprisal message, and only five or six weeks prior to the 3d of March, made notorious by the loss of the entire fortification bill. Still less will the public be able to comprehend the mystery, that those proceedings were sanctioned by the same political party which has made the whole country ring with their denunciations of those who were alleged to have exposed the country to the attacks of a foreign enemy, without the means of defence, and when there was imminent danger of war. If I were to proceed no further in arraying the proofs which I propose to lay before the committee upon this subject, I submit that there can be no longer any doubt where, and upon whom, the responsibility of neglecting the public defences must rest; at all events, up to the period of the 3d of March, 1835. Well, sir, what new lights had flashed upon the country, and upon the organs of the administration in this House, between the 21st of January, when the fortification bill passed the House, and the 3d of March following, when the proposition was made for an appropriation of three millions for the public defence? Was there any stronger reason to apprehend war in March, than had existed in equal force, from April, 1834, when the treaty was rejected by the French Chamber of Deputies; or, at all events, from the date of the reprisal message?

I now propose to notice some of the most material of those facts and circumstances connected with the loss of the fortification bill at the close of the last session, which struck me at the time, and yet impress me with conclusive force as to the motives and the authors of the loss of that bill. As to whether this House or the Senate ought to be charged with the loss of the three million appropriation, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] says is the true issue, can, in fact, present no issue at all. The Senate undoubtedly defeated the proposition to appropriate three millions, but that body did agree to appropriate one million seven hundred thousand dollars for the defence of the country, including the amount embraced in the fortification bill as it went from the House; and the question is, who defeated this appropriation bill, and, with it, the eight hundred thousand dollars agreed upon by the committee of conference; and what were the motives and objects, and what are the responsibilities, of those who defeated this bill? This is the true issue; these are the true questions presented for the decision of the public.

The strongest argument in the power of any one to address upon this subject will be found to consist of a simple narrative of the several motions and orders of the House, relative to the fortification bill, on the night of the notorious 3d of March; together with some notice of the points taken in the very brief debate which accompanied them.

The House amended the bill by inserting an appropriation of three millions of dollars; the Senate refused to concur with the House in this amendment. The House determined to insist upon its amendment; the Senate then came to a resolution to adhere to its disagreement, leaving the alternative to the House, either to recede from its amendment, or to ask a conference. If the House determined to adopt neither of them, then the bill would be lost as a matter of course. Upon the announcement of the message in the House that the Senate refused to agree to the amendment, a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GHOLSON] expressed "a fervent hope that the House would recede;" he was "conscious that no man, woman, or child, who had any intelligence upon the subject, seriously believed we would have war with France." He then moved that the House do recede from its amendment.

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. CAMBRELENG] said "he trusted the House would not recede. If no measures were to be taken for the defence of the country, let the Senate take the responsibility."

The question was then taken, and the motion to recede lost. Another message from the Senate announced that that body had adhered to its disagreement; thereupon, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] moved that the House do adhere to its amendment.

A gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEXCKR] moved that the House recede from its amendment.

A gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LYTLE,] who is now, I believe, surveyor general of the State of Ohio, and appointed by the President since the last session of Congress, rose and "objected to any conciliatory measures on the part of this House. Let it now remain with the Peers to answer for the consequences. He wished to fasten—to nail the responsibility there. He would not have the House abandon the elevated ground which it now occupied. Without an appropriation, the country would be left defenceless; that appropriation the House had tendered, and the country would put its seal of reprobation on the pusillanimous act which thwarted the measure."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] said afterwards, and when giving his reasons for not presenting the report from the committee of conference, "that he regretted the loss of the whole fortification bill; but let the responsibility fall where it ought—on the Senate of the United States." This I find in the Globe of the 5th of March.

No gentleman of this House could have heard the remarks which I have quoted, without perceiving that there was a decided and strong determination on the part of many members, and, among others, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] to suffer the whole bill to be lost, with a view to attach odium to the Senate. It is worthy of particular notice, as illustrative of the peculiar character of the party now in power, that those who were most determined to defeat the whole fortification bill did not see any objection to the loss of it, (though, according to their own declaration at the time, the country would thereby be left defenceless,) provided the Senate could be held responsible. The country was but a secondary consideration; the interest of the party had superior obligations. Although the course insisted upon by the chairman of the committee had been so far successful, and the bill with the amendments was already considered by the House as lost, it was evident that some uneasiness was felt at this result. A gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] made two efforts, before he was successful in getting the floor, to move for a committee of conference; and, notwithstanding the obstinacy with which a large majority had but a few moments before voted to adhere to their amendment, the motion for a conference was carried without a division. The Chair appointed the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] the gentleman from New Hampshire, who moved for the conference, and a gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] of the committee of conference. I distinctly remember that there was some delay on the part of the committee in leaving the House, and some symptoms of hesitation and faltering in the looks and manner of that member of the committee who was most relied upon to bring about a favorable result! It is within my personal knowledge that that gentleman was addressed by a member, and told that he had taken a step which was honest and patriotic, though contrary to the wishes and policy of a portion of the House; that it only required courage and energy to carry his object; and that no time was to be lost. It was about this time that it was rumored in the House (or, at all events, I had about this time been informed) that an honorable Senator from Tennessee had voted against the amendment of the House to the fortification bill. This, of course, did not diminish the interest I had before felt upon the subject; yet I have no distinct impression of the particular bill or question upon which the House was engaged at the time the committee returned, or at what hour of the night.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG explained, and said that the committee had left the House only after himself and another member of the committee had voted on the Cumberland road bill. He also expressed some surprise that the gentleman from Tennessee should not know that the committee had to wait in the House until a message could be sent to the Senate, and an answer returned, before they could know whether the Senate would agree to a conference. He also said that the Cumberland road bill was taken up immediately after the committee on the part of the House was appointed, or so soon afterwards that the committee could not have acted before that bill was taken up.]

Mr. BELL resumed. As I have not much confidence in the accuracy of my own memory upon these questions of time, and the order of events, that night, so am I inclined to distrust the memory of others. There was a good deal of business transacted after the appointment of the committee, and before the road bill was acted upon; besides, that bill had to be ordered to a third reading, and then actually read through, before it was put upon its passage; and the committee, in waiting to vote upon that bill, if such was the fact, were guilty of negligence, when so important a measure as the fortification bill depended so much upon despatch. It is not necessary, either, that the committee should have waited for an answer from the Senate; nor, upon such occasions, is that the usual course. The committee, if it had done its whole duty, would have followed the message of the House to the Senate chamber, and have been ready to act, instantly, with any committee which might be appointed by that body. But, sir, I regard these points as of very little importance to the principal inquiry. If the committee had returned to the House when the yeas and nays were being taken on the road bill, it would have been too late, in point of time, to obviate the scruples of those who supposed that the House could not act after the hour of twelve. I cannot say that I was right in my impression, but I am certain that I supposed that hour had arrived before the road bill passed the House. A gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Gilmer,] who was, in every respect, a most exact, sincere, and conscientious man, in the discharge of his duties as a member of this House, rose in his place, when his name was called to vote upon that bill, and declared that he regarded the constitutional term of that Congress as having expired, and he could not, conscientiously, vote upon any question; and he did not vote. There was no question made as to the true time; and the statement of the gentleman from Georgia was acquiesced in so far that no member rose to correct his statement. I can only say further upon this point, that when the bill was signed by the Speaker, it was done under a confident belief that the hour of twelve had passed; and, when the President approved it, it must have been after that hour. Whether, therefore, the committee retired from the House, or returned to it, when the question was being taken upon the road bill, is wholly immaterial, in every view of the subject. We know that the committee of conference of both Houses agreed to amend the fortification bill by adding $800,000 for the public defences, but that the report was not acted upon in the House, because of the alleged want of a quorum; and for the further reason alleged, that the term of Congress expired at the hour of twelve on the night of the 3d of March, 1835, and that the report was not presented to the House until after that hour. Now, sir, the inquiry is, how it happened that the House found itself without a quorum, at the close of its term, when so many important subjects remained to be acted upon; and who were they that withdrew at such a moment, and what were their motives? All these points I undertake to explain and settle, from circumstances so strong as to satisfy every impartial inquirer. It is fortunate that we have record proof upon this subject; and it is upon such I mainly rely in making good my engagement.

It appears from the journals of that night that one hundred and seventy-four members voted upon the passage of the Cumberland road bill; of that number, eighty-three were, and are now, the political friends and supporters of the Vice President, Mr. Van Buren, for the succession to the presidency. You, sir, [Mr. HAMER, of Ohio,] may know that there were strong reasons for the passage of that bill, besides the ordinary interest which the people of the States north of the Ohio had in the road itself; and it was not safe to be too inquisitive as to the hour of the night, or as to the precise point of time, when the constitutional powers of the House ceased. That bill was to be passed at all hazards. But a few minutes had elapsed, after the passage of the road bill, when a motion was made to take up the question of Mr. Letcher's pay; and, after some little debate, the previous question was moved; and in ascertaining whether there was a second to the motion, there appeared, on a count, to be one hundred and thirty-five members present; on taking the main question, immediately afterwards, by yeas and nays, only one hundred and thirteen members answered; and so the House appeared to be without a quorum; one hundred and twenty-one members being necessary for that purpose. It thus appears that, in the very short space of time between the vote upon the road bill and the question of Mr. Letcher's pay, sixty-one members had retired from the House, or refused to vote; and twenty-two of the members present, when the previous question was moved on the question of Letcher's pay, absented themselves immediately, or declined voting on the main question, which was put the next moment. On the question of Letcher's pay, only thirty-one members of the party voted; less than the number of the same party which had voted just before upon the road bill, by fifty-two; and so it appears that of the sixty-one members who voted on the road bill, and declined voting on the question of Letcher's pay, fifty-two were members of the dominant party, leaving only nine of the opposition to share the responsibility of depriving the House of a quorum at that important moment. These details I know are tedious and uninteresting, but they are important to the cause of truth, and equally so to the cause of justice between the respective political parties in the country. I cannot be satisfied until I show, by names, who they were—I mean of what party, and what their probable motives—that were the real authors of the miscarriage of the fortification bill. The following gentlemen, members of the last Congress, and all members of the party, voted on the Cumberland road bill, who, from scruples of conscience, or some other reason, retired, or declined to vote upon any other question during the night: Samuel Beardsley, Rowland Day, Joel Turritt, R. H. Gillet, N. Halsey, S. G. Hathaway, N. Johnson, C. McVean, Job Pierson, and William Taylor, of New York; John Galbraith, J. B. Sutherland, and A. Beaumont, of Pennsylvania; Jeremiah McLene, R. Mitchell, W. Patterson, and T. Webster, of Ohio; J. M. Harper, B. M. Bean, and H. Hubbard, of New Hampshire; William Schley, of Georgia; G. P. Osgood, of Massachusetts; A. G. Hawes, of Kentucky; H. Connor, of North Carolina; Ratliff Boon and John Carr, of Indiana; Gorham Parks, of Maine; and J. M. H. Beale, of Virginia.

I give the names, not from any personal disrespect, but that all who know the gentlemen may draw their own conclusions; as all I can vouch for in regard to them is, that, as party men, they are, without exception, good and true; as faithful a band as ever rallied under party chief; but, sir, they must be allowed to be honest, and have scruples of conscience, like other men. But I have another list, which will place this point beyond dispute. The following gentlemen, twenty-two in number, and all of the true faith, who did not vote on the question of Letcher's pay, reappeared afterwards, and actually voted upon one, and much the largest number of them on two motions to adjourn, which were decided upon the yeas and nays, long after the vote upon Letcher's case: Philemon Dickerson, M. T. Hawkins, Benjamin Jones, E. Kavanagh, J. K. Polk, I. B. Van Houten, Joseph B. Anthony, John Chaney, John Cramer, D. Kilgore, T. Lee, E. Lucas, C. Lyon, M. Mason, jr, James Parker, F. O. J. Smith, Jesse Speight, L. Jarvis, W. L. May, W. N. Shinn, J. J. McKay, and E. Howell. These twenty-two members, added to the one hundred and thirteen who voted upon the question of Letcher's pay, make the whole number one hundred and thirty-five, which must have been present, either in the House or within call, at the time the question was taken upon the proposition to pay Letcher, besides those who were present, but declined voting upon any question at all after the road bill passed. Here, then, sir, is proof positive and certain that there was a quorum present at the very point of time when it is affirmed by those who wish to avoid responsibility, and throw the odium of the loss of the fortification bill upon others, that there was not one in the House. It is due to those gentlemen whose names I have taken the liberty to mention to say that they may have acted from very proper motives, and very different from those which I have left to be inferred from the manner in which I have stated the argument.

In order to show the view which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] took of this question, and the distinct ground upon which he placed his own justification, I will read an extract from a letter printed in the Intelligencer of the 9th of March, with his signature.

[Mr. BELL was reading that part of Mr. CAMBRELENG's letter in which he stated that the committee of conference left the House immediately after it was appointed, and in which he referred to the Cumberland road bill as having been taken up and acted upon in the absence of the committee, when Mr. CAMBRELENG explained, and asked the gentleman from Tennessee if he had not heard his statement upon this point on a former day? He also referred to the journal, to show that a statement there appeared, made by him on the night of the 3d of March, in which it was alleged that the vote was decided on the question of Letcher's pay when the committee returned to the House, and he was surprised that the gentleman from Tennessee should not know the fact; and if there was any thing wrong in the journal, the Speaker, whose duty it was to see it made up properly, was responsible.]

Mr. BELL resumed. I heard the gentleman's statement on a former day. He then stated that the committee did not retire until he and another member of the committee voted on the road bill; but I still do not regard the statement as decisive of the fact, for the gentleman's own recollection was different a few days after the adjournment. And as to the responsibility to which the gentleman thinks the Speaker ought to be held, I am willing to bear all proper responsibility; but no man who was present can suppose it possible that the Speaker could remember the order of all that was said and done on that most harassing night. As to the statement which appears by the journals to have been made by the gentleman in relation to the time when the committee returned to the House, it proves nothing more than the gentleman's own verbal statement could now do; for it was a matter that did not belong to the journals, and ought not to have been there. But I state again, that I do not regard the question of the time when the committee returned to the House as at all material; I was proceeding to read the letter of the gentleman more with a view to another and distinct point, than to show how little reliance was to be placed upon the recollections of any one as to the precise time at which any particular event transpired. The gentleman further states in his letter, after affirming that the committee returned to the House while the yeas and nays were being called upon Letcher's case, that "a quorum on the question of Letcher's pay not having voted, the Chair could receive no report from any committee." This is the material statement to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. It is true the gentleman did state in his place, on that night, that there was no quorum present, and he gave that as a reason why he had not presented the report of the committee; but, in doing so, he acted gratuitously. In taking notice that no quorum was present, even if it were the fact, he assumed a duty and responsibility wholly unusual and unprecedented in the practice of this House, unless the member who takes such a course intends to defeat the measure before the House.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here appealed to the gentleman from Tennessee to say if, after a question was taken by yeas and nays, and no quorum voted, the case would not be different; and whether it was not his duty to notice the fact?]

Mr. BELL resumed. I have just submitted the evidence of the fact, that notwithstanding the vote upon Letcher's pay, there was actually a quorum in the House; and it is difficult, from all the facts of the case, to suppose that the gentleman from New York did not himself know that a quorum was either present, or within call, if he had desired one. But, sir, whether there was a quorum present or not, and although every member may properly take notice of the want of a quorum at any time, and require a count of the House, yet I appeal to the oldest members of the House (and there are gentlemen present who have been members fifteen or twenty years) to say, if they ever knew a single instance in which a member friendly to a measure required a count of the House? We all know that the journals are often read, and other business of importance transacted, without a quorum. Nothing is more common than to receive reports from committees the first half hour after the meeting of the House, without a quorum. It is the duty of the Speaker at all times to see that a quorum is present when important business is transacted; and so it would have been his duty, if the report of the committee of conference had been presented, to see that there was a quorum in the House when it was acted upon. Sir, the Speaker would have taken the responsibility of receiving the report of the committee that night, without a count of the House, because he was satisfied that there was a quorum present, notwithstanding the vote on the question of Letcher's pay; and I repeat, that the course of the gentleman, in taking upon himself the responsibility of asking a count of the House, was gratuitous, and could only be explained or justified by his desire to defeat the measure of which he had charge. Sir, I am the more earnest in pressing this point, because I feel that the Chair was, in some measure, responsible for the loss of the fortification bill, by having placed a gentleman at the head of the committee of conference who had already indicated a disposition to let the bill fall; and it was by the request of the gentleman who made the motion for a committee, and from courtesy to the gentleman from New York, who was at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that he was appointed chairman of that committee. If a gentleman friendly to the measure had been placed at the head of the committee, it is probable that the bill would have been passed.

I have now done with details on this subject. Besides these, there would be much to satisfy the mind of any man, who had a full view of this hall, and the actors in it, on that extraordinary night, upon the question at issue. Occupying the position I did, it was impossible not to have very decided opinions upon the motives and conduct of the parties concerned. Soon after the passage of the Cumberland road bill, symptoms of a disposition to do no more business, on the part of many members, were apparent. Not long after the return of the committee of conference, the elements of discord greatly increased. It was obvious that the ordinary whippers-in of the party had suddenly become the whippers-out. I saw that a powerful effort was making to prevent any further action of the House upon some measure or other. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] objected that there was no quorum present, I had no further doubt as to the course of the gentleman and his friends upon that measure. I must say, however, that I did not, at that time, indulge in any very uncharitable feelings in relation to the increased efforts of that gentleman and his friends to defeat the fortification bill; for I had heard, either about the time the committee of conference had returned to the House, or shortly afterwards, a rumor that the President had declared that he would not sign any bill which might pass after twelve o'clock; and I supposed it very natural, and not altogether unfair as a party movement, to suffer the bill to fall between the two Houses, rather than throw the whole responsibility of its loss upon the President. It is true that neither then nor since have I heard from any authentic source that the President made any such declaration; but it is also true that I have heard no contradiction of the rumor. If the President had made such a declaration, I knew, and the gentlemen themselves knew, that the President would not be likely to change his mind, whatever were the motives which prompted his course. But, sir, what I do blame in the course of the gentlemen, and for which I think they deserve the censure of the whole country, is, that after they had, as I have conclusively shown, withdrawn themselves from the House, or declined voting upon every question, or otherwise so managed as to deprive the House of a quorum, and thus to defeat the fortification bill, they should, as a party, and through the public press in their interest, join in the clamor, and countenance the charge, that at a time when there was imminent danger of war, the Senate, and particularly an honorable Senator from Tennessee, had defeated the necessary appropriations for the defence of the country. There is no apology, no defence, for such a course. Gentlemen ought to remember that Judge White, especially, was assailed in the most unjust and gross manner. He was even impeached of "treasonable conduct" for his vote upon this question; and he was charged with having prepared, in conjunction with the majority of the Senate, "to play the part of Benedict Arnold, and betray our fortifications to the enemy." This article was copied into the Globe, and the number of that paper containing it was actually sent by the President himself, under his own frank, to every member of the Tennessee Legislature. It is due to the Senate and Judge White to state that they had added, by way of amendment, $450,000 to the bill as it was originally sent to the Senate; and they had also agreed, by their committee of conference, to add $800,000 more; in all $1,250,000, in addition to the original bill, which contained $459,000 only. The House had it in its power, with the consent of the Senate, to appropriate $1,689,000 for the public defences; but the interests of party prevailed over those of the country, and the whole bill was lost.

The defence of those members of the party of the succession who withdrew, or declined voting at all, after the passage of the Cumberland road bill, is put upon the ground of conscientious scruples. This defence is liable to two decisive objections: in the first place, those scruples came upon gentlemen too suddenly, and too late, also, for the hour of twelve had arrived before the Cumberland road bill passed the House; and although some few individuals may justly be supposed to have been seized with sudden scruples of conscience after the vote on the road bill, such visitings, in their natural operation, are never known to operate upon one political party and not upon another. Of the 61 members who voted on the road bill, and refused to vote on the next question that was taken up in the House, 52 were supporters of Mr. Van Buren for the presidency. But the defence of the gentlemen is liable to this further objection: they are members of the party which has maintained the ground, during the last twelve months, and which succeeded in imposing their views upon a large portion of the public, that there was just reason to apprehend a war with France at the very time the fortification bill was lost. Now, if there was actually no danger of war, the loss of that bill was a matter of no serious consequence to the country; and all that has been said to the contrary has been mere trifling. But if there was really any probable reason to apprehend war at the close of the last session of Congress, then it was just such an emergency as that all constitutional doubts about the power of the House to pass the bill after twelve o'clock at night ought, upon principle as well as the authority of precedent, to have been solved in favor of the power. It is strange that a whole party, which claims exclusive patriotism, should have been paralyzed by doubts at such a crisis. What! when the country was supposed to be upon the eve of a war with a powerful nation—its military defences incomplete, unarmed, and decayed—is it at such a crisis that scruples and doubts about constitutional power to a mere question of hours—not of days, but of hours—are suffered to affect measures essential to the honor, safety, and perhaps the very existence of the Government? It was not so with General Jackson when the public enemy were at the gates, and threatened the safety of a single city of the Union! But what strikes me as most extraordinary is, that the President himself should have had scruples of conscience about the power of Congress to pass laws after twelve o'clock on the 3d of March, 1835; and that he should have resolved to sign no bill that should pass the House after that hour. Sir, if the President did make that declaration, it is conclusive evidence that he regarded the country as in no danger of war. He surely would not have been so regardless of the interests of the country as to desire the loss of the fortification bill for any party advantage which might be expected from it, in carrying on the war against the Senate and Judge White, when the country itself was exposed to the danger of a foreign war. Sir, the President and his advisers had no fears of a war with France at the close of the last session of Congress, nor at any other time. This is manifest from their own conduct. If it had been supposed, at the close of the last session of Congress, that a war with France was a probable event, it was the sworn and sacred duty of the President, under the constitution, to have advised Congress of his apprehensions, and to have recommended immediate measures for the defence of the country. He should have communicated his fears, freely and fully, upon this subject, to Congress; for it is the executive department of Government which has charge of, and is always presumed to be better informed upon such questions than Congress. The communication should have been made to Congress, and not to individual members. Again, sir: it was equally the duty of the President, under the constitution, to have convoked the new Congress at the earliest day possible after the last adjournment, if he really anticipated war with France. If any new cause of war, or any additional reason to apprehend a war with France, was conceived to exist, in the course of the French Chambers in requiring an apology which the President could not give consistently with the honor of the country, Congress ought to have been called immediately on the receipt of the intelligence. It would have been in the power of the President, at any time during the summer and fall of that year, to have repaired the mischief of the loss of the three million appropriation, by calling Congress together, and laying before them the state of the country, and recommending proper measures to meet the crisis. His not having done so is conclusive with me that there was no expectation of war; and the hue and cry raised about the loss of the three million appropriation and fortification bill must be regarded as one of the great number of false pretences and impostures which have been invented by the party for political effect and popular excitement.

There is another subject, Mr. Chairman, which I feel bound to avail myself of, on this occasion, to notice more particularly than I have yet done; it is another one of that series of pretences and impostures which I have so often alluded to: I refer now to the alleged mischief and danger of terminating an election of President by this House. No subject has been more artfully handled, and portrayed in more alarming colors in the South and Southwest, during the last fall and summer, by the partisans and adherents of the Vice President, than this one; none, sir, has produced a more decided effect upon the public mind. It is well known that in those sections of the Union, especially, an election by the House of Representatives was made particularly odious by the representations and denunciations of the election by the House in 1825. It was one of the standing themes of every political declaimer during the last year. The evils of such a catastrophe as another election by the House have been a subject of constant regret and lamentation in the columns of every leading journal in the interest of Mr. Van Buren. I should not be far wrong if I were to say that two thirds of all the honest and sober-minded planters and farmers in the whole South and Southwest, who are disposed to support the nomination of the Baltimore convention, would assign as the reason of their course, if they were asked, their horror of an election by the House of Representatives, and their fears that, by supporting any other candidate, they will only contribute to bring about this result. Knowing the extent of this feeling, the partisans of Mr. Van Buren have in many districts rested his cause entirely upon this point. A French war was described as an infinitely less evil than an election by the House of Representatives. It has been, and is now, asserted by the zealous and interested advocates of the Vice President throughout the country, that an election by the House would be carried by intrigue, bribery, and corruption, and that the voice of the people will be unheard in the contest. The Government journal printed in this city (the Globe) has of late uniformly represented an election by the House of Representatives as the greatest calamity which could befall the country. I propose now to unveil the course of the party in power upon this subject, and to expose their artifices and insincerity.

It is very well known to those who look beyond the surface, who pay only a due regard to professions, and examine the real motives of human action, as they are exhibited in the course of the present self-styled republican party, that they advocate the propriety and necessity of adhering to the practice of nominating a President and Vice President by caucuses or conventions, not for the purpose of preventing an election by the House of Representatives, but upon the ground that, as they allege, in no other way can a party be kept together, or the power and patronage of the Government be secured to their own members or followers. This is the true motive, and this the true secret, of the extraordinary efforts and influences which have been made and brought to bear on the people of late, in order to give popularity and permanence to the practice of such nominations. To avoid the evils of an election by the House, is the professed object of the party. That has been the great political bugbear which has been held up and paraded through the country, to frighten the people into an acquiescence in the nomination of such a body as the late Baltimore convention. The truth is, that without the benefit of the terrors created by the frightful image of an election by the House, which has been so constantly kept before the eyes of the people, the nomination of the Baltimore convention would have found no countenance. And this, sir, is the solution of the mystery; here lies the secret of the continued and marked neglect with which the repeated recommendation of the President, in relation to such an amendment of the constitution as would hereafter prevent an election of President and Vice President by the House, and secure it to the people, has been treated by the party. The history of this proposition is remarkable, and highly instructive, as well as curious.

It cannot be forgotten that, from 1825 until the commencement of the present administration, this proposition was a favorite policy of the party which brought General Jackson into power. The whole subject was, during that period, ably and fully discussed, both in Congress and in the public journals. When General Jackson was elected by the people, no one doubted but that one of the first acts which would distinguish the action of Congress would be, to recommend such an amendment to the States, for their adoption. General Jackson, in his first message, urged the subject upon the attention of Congress in the strongest and most persuasive language. In his second; and in each succeeding annual message, he has done the same thing. Regarding the discussion of the subject as having commenced in 1825, it is now upwards of ten years since it has been before the country in the most imposing form—in the annual messages of the President. The arguments and language of the message upon this subject are worthy of particular notice, and I must ask leave to refer to them. [Here Mr. BELL read several passages from the message of the President upon this subject, all of which went to show how important it was, in the opinion of the President, that such an amendment of the constitution should be made.] Well, sir, what has been the result—the effect of these repeated and urgent recommendations? In the early part of the administration, many earnest and well-meant efforts were made to get this House to take up and act upon this subject. Propositions in a variety of shapes were presented; and it has been a part of the regular forms of the House, at the beginning of every session, to appoint a select committee upon this subject; but, sir, the truth cannot be disguised or disputed, that those efforts were the efforts of individuals only; that the regular annual appointment of special committees has been but a mere form; and at no time could the party be rallied in favor of the proposition. There was always somewhere, and from some motive, a power and an influence which thwarted the action of the House upon this question.

Soon after the opening of the last session of Congress, this subject began to excite increased interest, and certainly demanded prompt attention from those who seriously and honestly believed an election by the House of Representatives ought to be avoided. It was then, sir, that it became manifest that the Jackson party would be divided upon the subject of his successor; and an honorable Senator from Tennessee was brought to the notice of the country as a candidate for the presidency, and supported under such circumstances and upon principles which forbade the hope that his friends would surrender his pretensions to the man who it was foreseen would be the favorite of the contemplated Baltimore convention. This was a conjuncture to test the principles of the party upon this subject. The danger of a division in the ranks of the party in power was manifest. That an election by the House would be a result of this state of things could not certainly be foreseen; but all must have seen that such a result might take place. As early as the 10th of December, 1834, a select committee was appointed to consider of and report upon this subject. Special care was taken to appoint a clear majority upon the committee who were known to have avowed themselves favorable to an amendment of the constitution which would exclude the election from the House. The following gentlemen composed the committee: Messrs. Gilmer, Archer, Binney, Beardsley, Gorham, Johnson of Kentucky, Speight, Hubbard, and Carr. Five of these gentlemen are the known supporters of General Jackson, and of Mr. Van Buren as his successor; and all were understood, when the committee was appointed, to be in favor of the recommendation of the President which it was their exclusive and special duty to consider and report upon. The chairman of the committee, (Mr. Gilmer, of Georgia,) though not a supporter of the administration, was known to be a gentleman of great sincerity, talents, and energy; and he was also known to be a zealous advocate of the proposition submitted to the committee. I have a personal knowledge that unusual efforts were made by the chairman of the committee, and by various other individuals, to prevail upon the committee to agree upon some report at an early day of the session, that it might be before the House and acted upon before the close of the session. The friends of Judge White, especially, fearing the use which would be made against him of the argument that, by dividing the party, the election might be brought into the House, exerted themselves in every fair and honorable way to procure a decision upon the question by Congress. Several of the members of this committee, who had always avowed themselves in favor of the measure, were privately appealed to; but all was vain. The answer was, they could not agree upon the details of the measure—no two, it was said, could agree. Now, sir, every member of the least experience in legislation knows that, upon any important question whatever, involving details, two men can rarely be found to agree upon all of them. It is notorious that no committee of this House would ever report upon any subject of importance, if a majority of its members were expected to unite upon all the details of it. All that can be expected in such cases is, that a majority shall agree upon the principle of the report. The House is always expected to alter the details, according to the views of the majority. It was no adequate excuse to say they could not agree upon details. I will not be so unjust as to say that all the members of the committee who had before that time professed a desire to see the constitution amended in this respect wiffully combined to prevent any action upon the subject last session. Of a committee of nine members, and six only of them being friendly to the principle of a measure, any two of the six were able to defeat any action upon the subject. A report from the committee, I feel warranted, from the circumstances, in asserting, was defeated by the management of some portion of the members of it who were, at the same time, avowed advocates of the expediency of such an amendment of the constitution.

The farther history of this question is this: Mr. Gilmer, the chairman of the committee, failing in all his efforts to get the committee to make a report in any shape, came into the House on the 31st of January, and asked that the committee might be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, on the ground that they could come to no agreement thereupon; and, on the same day, he was permitted to lay a resolution, containing a proposition for an amendment of the constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice President, upon the table. I well remember that, at first, one of the prominent members of the committee, and who was also a prominent member of the dominant party, refused to give his consent that Mr. Gilmer should even lay his resolution upon the table; but he became ashamed of his conduct, and withdrew his opposition. Thus the subject was before the House; and it was at any time in the power of the majority to take it up and decide upon it. On the 13th of February, Mr. Gilmer, finding that it would not do to postpone the subject any longer, without losing sight of it altogether during the session, moved to suspend the rules of the House, in order to proceed to the consideration of his resolution. Against this motion there were only fifty-six votes; and, of these, thirty-seven were the known supporters of Mr. Van Buren for the presidency, or, in other words, of a nomination by a convention; and fifteen of these thirty-seven were members of the New York delegation. The resolution was that day taken up and read a second time, and postponed to the 19th of the month; but it was superseded by other business until the 25th of February, when Mr. Wilde, of Georgia, moved that all the orders of the day be postponed, for the purpose of considering this subject. Upon this motion there were 112 yeas, and 92 nays; of the latter, 49 were supporters of Mr. Van Buren, and 24 of them members of the New York delegation. The subject that day underwent considerable discussion, but the House came to no decision upon it. On the 27th February, Mr. Gilmer again moved that his resolution be taken up; and, on taking the question, the vote stood, yeas 99, nays 104; of the nays, 60 were for Mr. Van Buren, and 24 of them from New York. On the same day, however, at a later hour, Mr. Gilmer's resolution came up in the regular order of business; when a motion was made to dispose of it finally by laying it on the table. In favor of this motion there were only 38 votes; and 30 of them were the friends of Mr. Van Buren, and 13 of that number from New York. After further debate upon the resolution, a motion was made by Mr. Vanderpoel, of New York, that the House adjourn—evidently with a view to evade the question upon the resolution. Upon this motion the votes stood, yeas 59, nays 112; of the yeas, 49 were for Mr. Van Buren, and 20 of them from New York. The subject was further debated, but no decision was arrived at. Now, sir, upon a view of all these circumstances, can there remain the shadow of a doubt that this question was wilfully and designedly evaded at the last session by the very party which now professes to hold an election by the House in such utter abhorrence? The neglect of Congress to act upon this subject, prior to the last session, might admit of some apology; there were so many exciting and important questions of another kind continually arising to absorb the chief attention of Congress; and, besides, there had been no prospect of an election by the House until the commencement of last session. But there is no justification for the course of the party at the last session upon this subject. It is but too clear that the party in favor of Mr. Van Buren for the succession determined to have the full benefit of the fears which existed in the country of an election by the House, in compelling a submission to the decrees of the Baltimore convention; else why was it that not the slightest notice was taken, by that vigilant guardian of every thing that concerns the party, (the Globe,) of the question presented by Mr. Gilmer's resolution, when it was under discussion? Not one paragraph was penned, during the sitting of Congress, upon the importance of amending the constitution so as to prevent an election of the President by the House of Representatives. Why, sir, was not the committee which had charge of this subject rated for their negligence and omission in not reporting upon the subject submitted to them? Why were not the usual denunciations uttered, through that organ, against those members of the party who voted, in every instance, to prevent the consideration of, and to defeat altogether, the resolution of Mr. Gilmer? Sir, a large portion of the party upon that question showed that they were opposed to a measure which General Jackson had earnestly urged upon Congress in every annual message since he came into office. Why were they not pointed out and denounced as anti-Jackson? There can be but one answer to this question: it was no offence to any one to oppose that proposition at the last session. That this question was designed to be blinked, was manifest to me, from the course of particular members—a course which I could account for upon no other ground. When Mr. Gilmer's resolution was under discussion, at one time there appeared to be a serious determination on the part of the House to carry it. My colleague, [Mr. POLK,] who is now the presiding officer of this House, and who cannot be charged with a disposition to thwart the views of those in power, made a speech, which was evidently intended to put an end to the further consideration of the subject at that session. He complained that the time was too short to give the subject that examination which its importance demanded. He thought he had, with the slight attention he had given the resolution, detected an error; and there might be many more. He dwelt emphatically upon the importance of not permitting the resolution to go from the House in an improper shape, "for then it would be gone forever!" When he concluded, a gentleman who sat by him rose to move that the resolution be laid on the table; but the Chair gave the floor to another member. Now, sir, further delay and further time to examine into the details of the resolution could only be had by dropping the question until another Congress. That was evident to all. But, Mr. Chairman, the party are not only answerable for the failure of the proposition at the last session, but they are responsible for its failure at the only time which has arisen within the last ten years, or which will probably arise within the next ten, when a fair prospect existed of succeeding in it. Such was the anxiety of the members of the opposition that this plea of the danger of an election by the House should be taken away from the party known to be in favor of Mr. Van Buren, in sustaining the contemplated nomination of that gentleman by a convention at Baltimore, that many of them, who had always before that time been opposed to such an amendment of the constitution as was proposed, were willing then to see it adopted. It will be found that more than fifty members of the opposition voted to sustain Mr. Gilmer's resolution; and there cannot be a doubt that, if the party in power had not deserted their own principles upon this occasion, the proposition would have been carried by the requisite majority. We have seen the same question treated with the same neglect, so far, at the present session. According to custom, we have a select committee upon the subject; but half the session is passed by, and we have no report from it. But I am free to say, sir, that I regard the course of the committee, at this session, of but little consequence. If we were now to adopt a proposition for amending the constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice President, it can hardly be calculated that the Legislatures of three fourths of the States could be got to act upon the question in time to operate upon the next presidential election. There might have been some prospect of a favorable result, if the committee had reported at the beginning of the session; but it is now too late to hope for success to any such measure. There are too many interests still combined to defeat it.

Naval Service Bill.

I am too much exhausted, Mr. Chairman, to pursue this, or any other subject, any further at present. I have omitted to notice several subjects which I originally intended to remark upon. I cannot ask the further indulgence of the committee. I feel that I am already under great obligations to the members of it. But I cannot sit down without referring again to my own position, and the difficult task laid before me, of opposing the present course and policy of those whom I once supported. I have already stated to what extent I held myself bound to support this administration, and I have briefly sketched the reasons why I feel myself bound to oppose a set of measures, and a system of party action, adopted with a view, not of upholding the present administration, but of securing the future to particular aspirants. But, in doing this, I desire to say, in this place, that I depart from no one principle which I have heretofore supported; nor do I mean to change my principles until I see some better reason for doing so than the mere desire to be in a majority. Sir, I beg leave to speak with some assurance upon this point; and I defy my opponents, upon the strictest scrutiny, to point out any departure from my former principles. I know, sir, that, in former years, many incidental, and often frivolous questions arose in this House which came to be decided by a party vote, and upon which I voted with those with whom I usually acted. But, whatever may have been the error of such votes, they will appear to have involved no important principle, in any material degree. Still, sir, there were some questions upon which I always differed with, and always voted against, the present administration, as gentlemen will find by proper inquiry.

Contested Election.

It is fortunate for me, perhaps, that, in regard to some of the most important questions upon which I separated myself from those who are now in the majority in this House, there are living witnesses, who enjoy a respectable, not to say a high rank in the party, and who were once members of this House, to the fact that, at the very commencement of the present administration, I declared that I would feel myself bound to separate from the party then and now in power, the moment either one or both of two principles, or rather practices, should be made a test of party fidelity or adherence. The one was, that all elections are to be decided, so far as regards the vote of the party, by caucus nominations; and the other, and perhaps the more important one, was that a difference of political opinion should be a sufficient ground upon which to change the subordinate officers of the Government. I protested against this principle the second or third day after the first inauguration of the President. Sir, I have done.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested election from North Carolina.

Two motions were pending. The first in order was that of Mr. MANN, of New York, making the report of the Committee of Elections the special order of the day for Wednesday next; and the second proposition was that of Mr. HANN, to recommit the report, with instructions to allow further time to the sitting member for taking additional testimony.

Mr. NEWLAND, (the petitioner,) having permission to appear in his own behalf, addressed the House: As he had before stated, he was but a plain cultivator of the soil, and made no pretensions to high learning; therefore, if he transgressed the rules of order, he hoped it would not be imputed to any other motive than the proper one. He wished merely to lay the plain, simple state of facts before the House. From the statements which had been made in that House, the inference was to be drawn that the petitioner had endeavored to take advantage of the sitting member. He denied any such charge, and merely wished to call the attention of gentlemen to the facts. It had been said by the sitting member that the petitioner had occupied nearly all the time for taking testimony, so that he (the sitting member) had not an opportunity of getting his testimony. Now, Mr. N. had to remark that the election was held in August, and on the 20th of that month, when the polls were compared, he had addressed many of his friends, in the presence of his honorable opponent, and had stated his intention to contest his election, if it was the wish of the people that he should do so. On the 4th Monday of September the court met in Burke county, and at that time his honorable opponent was aware of the petitioner's intention to contest his right to his seat, and he might have been engaged in taking testimony throughout the counties at the courts which followed, if he had been so disposed. The sitting member attended all these courts, where he might have been employed in the collection of evidence.

Mr. N. said he served notice on his opponent at the September court. How, then, could the petitioner have been receiving evidence without the knowledge of the sitting member. The petitioner's object was, in taking the course of going to the different county courts, to give the sitting member an opportunity of obtaining testimony. If gentlemen would only take the trouble to look at the documents, they would see which was entitled to the most credit. Mr. N. stated several places in his district at which he had taken evidence, and where the evidence was cross-examined, either by the sitting member or his agents. He wished to call the attention of the House to another fact, that, on the second of November, he (the petitioner) had notified his opponent of his intention to take testimony at Morgantown on the 30th of that month, and at Flatrock on the 26th of the same month; but after that notice had been served, the sitting member had notified the petitioner of his intention to take testimony on those same days at other places. The petitioner had also been notified to attend examinations in places two hundred miles apart on the same day. If gentlemen will examine the notices, they will find that, so far from the petitioner throwing obstacles in the way of taking testimony, it was the sitting member who threw the obstacles in the way of the petitioner. He remarked that the notices were in conformity with the laws of North Carolina. When the subject was before the committee, the petitioner had expressed his readiness to trust his fate to the testimony then in his possession. After the committee had examined the testimony, they were informed that they would be heard by the committee. Mr. N. recollected, he said he was content with the testimony then in their possession. He recollected a motion was made in the committee, that the testimony be submitted to them, that they might make out an abstract. He fell to work, to make out his abstract; but although the sitting member was there, and had the evidence in his possession, he declined making out any. When the committee next met, he (the petitioner) submitted his abstract, but there had not one word been said about further time, until they had examined the documents. He did not wish to detain the House, but he wished to correct a statement which had been made there. It had been stated that, in the case of Taliaferro and Hungerford, there was more time than in the present for taking depositions. It had been stated that the parties then commenced taking depositions in September, but it had been carefully kept out of view that Congress met at that time a month earlier than they do now. Congress then met in November; so that the time allowed in the present case was longer than the time then allowed. He had again to state to the House that he had no sinister motive to bring him there, but that he came, as he conceived, by the will of a majority of the freemen of his district, not to maintain his own rights alone, but to maintain the rights of his constituents. He wished, in all due deference to the House, to state that their forefathers, in the adoption of the constitution, had said that each House shall be the judge of their own elections, evidently intending that they were the guardians of the rights of the people. Therefore, if he was rightfully entitled to the seat, he ought to have it; and all he asked was stern justice.

Mr. HOWARD said that, as both the candidates for membership had now addressed the House, it seemed as if the argument was closed, and the judicial functions of the House about to commence. The question under consideration was one of time, as the sitting member had requested a postponement of the final trial until he could have an opportunity of collecting further testimony. When called upon to vote upon this prayer, Mr. H. said that he found it sustained by many considerations of great weight. The sitting member alleged that he could not proceed with justice to himself, and a respectable minority of the committee had recommended that the indulgence should be granted. He had looked into the case so far, and so far only, as to enable himself to give a correct vote upon the question of time, and regretted to say that he could not grant it. For a vote, apparently so unkind and harsh, he begged leave to assign his reasons, which, if not well founded, could be shown to be so, and he would cheerfully change his vote. It seemed to him, that if the testimony was in an imperfect state, it was the fault of the sitting member that it was so; and if he should lose his seat, in consequence of this imperfection, the result must be attributed to the error of judgment into which the sitting member had fallen, respecting his duty to his district and to the House. In order to bring the point distinctly up, he would request the Clerk to read the passages which he had marked, in the report of the Committee of Elections.

Contested Election.

[The Clerk accordingly read two extracts, showing that the sitting member and minority of the committee were of opinion that the evidence was left imperfect, from the necessity of his attending to his duty at Washington, at the opening of Congress.]

Mr. H. said that he wholly dissented from the opinion just read. It seemed to him that one of the first duties of the House, after its organization, was to inspect the validity of the titles of those who presented themselves as members, in order to settle all conflicting claims which might arise; and this duty was in its nature preliminary to the performance of all other duties. The nation at large had a right to require that those only who had been legally elected should sit and vote upon matters of deep public interest, which were often decided by a single vote. If this were true, it became the duty of every member to increase the facilities of the House for the decision of conflicting claims, with as much promptness as justice would admit. The collection of testimony was therefore in the direct discharge of the first duty which the sitting member owed to the House, and he erred in judgment when he abandoned the field in the midst of the investigation, trusting the prosecution of the inquiry to friends or agents who had omitted to fulfil it. The personal superintendence of the sitting member ought to have been given to the scrutiny, because there was no duty which he could have been called upon to perform in Washington of such urgency as the investigation of his own title to a seat. The consequence of the error was, that now, in the middle of March, the House was called upon to postpone its final inquiry into the case, in order that the sitting member might either leave his seat and repair to his district to obtain additional testimony, or again trust those agents who had already disappointed him. Mr. H. said that he meant no disrespect to the sitting member; but it was one of those cases where a public man must construe his duty for himself, and abide by the consequences if he judged erroneously.

If he had moved into his building before examining whether its foundations were secure, and it should tumble upon him, the misfortune could be attributed only to the hasty zeal with which he had taken possession. Had it been his own case, Mr. H. said, he would not have left his adversary in possession of the field, but remained as long as the combat went on. It was the case of two generals who had fought a battle, in which one appeared to be worsted; but the victor had gone too soon into winter quarters. His opponent had continued the contest, and captured post after post; and now this House, a neutral party, is asked to interpose and obtain a postponement of further operations, until the field can again be taken and the lost ground recovered. Justice to the parties, to the people of the district, and to the nation, forbade it. It was now the middle of March, and if the defective state of the evidence was owing to the error of the sitting member, what was the condition of the petitioner? For three months and a half, he had prosecuted his claim; and if the friends of the sitting member had consulted together to devise a plan by which most effectually to baffle the petitioner, none could have been adopted more likely to succeed, than to procrastinate the inquiry during the whole winter, and in the spring obtain a further grant of time. But he again said that he imputed nothing of the kind to the sitting member or his friends, who were no doubt convinced of the justice of his cause, and disposed to uphold it by the fairest proceedings. He compared the House to passengers in a stage coach, for a journey of thirty miles, empowered to decide upon the rights to seats. One of these being claimed, the petitioner was told to run along for ten miles, and then the case would be decided; but at the end of that time, he is told that the passengers have been talking about other things, and he must continue his pursuit for ten miles more; when, two thirds of the journey being over, he shall be allowed to come in, if his right shall be confirmed.

Mr. H. said he had thus presented, as briefly as possible, his reasons for declining to grant further time, but was willing to take up the case upon the evidence before the House, which he would examine without prejudice.

Mr. GRAHAM said, it must be borne in mind by the House that at each time he had addressed them, it was a matter of sheer duty to himself. It had been said by the petitioner that he had given notice at the comparing of the polls of his intention to contest the election. Mr. G. knew that the petitioner had made such a statement, but it had been made to an assembly of persons, and not to him personally, and it was impossible for him to say whether he intended to do so or not from that assertion. The petitioner had also stated that he had given notice that he would take testimony on days which had already been set apart for that purpose. Mr. G. asked how he was to take testimony in any other way, when the petitioner had every day appropriated to himself? With regard to what had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD,] he had only to say that, whatever might be his notion, Mr. G. was bound to conform to the opinion of his constituents, and however much he might respect that gentleman's opinions, still he respected the opinions of his constituents more. Mr. G. then read letters from three of the persons which he had appointed agents to take testimony and cross-examine witnesses, stating that, for various reasons, they had not been enabled to perform that duty.

Mr. NEWLAND, in reply, remarked that if he were disposed to pursue the same course adopted by the sitting member, he could have produced a large number of letters of the same tenor; but he had resolved to abide by the usual action of that House and the laws of the State of North Carolina. This observation applied equally to additional depositions, which had been tendered to him, but he had refrained from availing himself of them, for the same reason.

Mr. BOYD adverted to a few facts in the report of the committee, showing that full and sufficient notices had in all cases been given to the sitting member, and that any complaint on that ground would have come with far more propriety or reason from the petitioner than his opponent. The former had not only served the latter with notices in due time, but with even more time than the strict requisition of the laws of North Carolina required. Mr. B. also entered into a statement of sundry facts which occurred in the Committee of Elections.

Naval Service Bill—Contested Election.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MAURY explained that he had distinctly recollected, at one meeting of the committee, at which all the members were not present, that a majority of those present deemed the notice insufficient, and that the sitting member ought to be allowed more time.

Mr. BOYD had not charged any one with misrepresentation; but where so many meetings were held, it was natural to expect a discrepancy of recollection. The sitting member had not made the application in time, and the committee had passed on the sufficiency of the notices before they entered on the testimony. His recollection varied from that of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MAURY said the protest of the sitting member had been overruled, and he was not apprized of it in time. He called upon the honorable chairman of the committee to state what his recollection was on this point.

Mr. CLAIBORNE could not undertake to relate every thing that occurred in the committee, but he would say he was not in the habit of communicating any thing to either of the parties, unless under instructions of the committee. He did communicate to Mr. GRAHAM the action on his protest. He recollected, also, a meeting of the committee, at which a majority of those present were of opinion the notices were sufficient; that they contained a sufficient indication of an intent to dispute the election, and a sufficient indication of an intention to take depositions.

Mr. WISE here called for the orders of the day, but the motion was negatived.

Mr. BOYD again proceeded, and said he had a most distinct recollection that the committee did not act on the preliminary question till the middle of January.

Mr. HARD next obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. MAURY, who desired to explain. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOYD] had remarked that he was borne out in the statements which he had made by the recollections of several members of the committee. He (Mr. M.) was satisfied that the facts which he had submitted were substantially set forth in the report which was signed by four members of the minority. He repeated that his recollection was distinct, that on the 15th of January the chairman was instructed to notify Mr. GRAHAM that his protest had been overruled; and, in point of fact, no decision was made before the day to which he had referred. Several days previous to that time he had been asked by the sitting member if they had come to any decision upon his protest; and he informed him that they had not, but were waiting for a full meeting of the committee.

Mr. HARD again addressed the House, and contended that the notices given to the sitting member by Mr. Newland were informal and insufficient, both as to time and substance. He urged the propriety of granting further time to the sitting member to take testimony essential to his defence, and to a correct decision of the case, and entered into a particular description of the notices, to show not only their insufficiency, but that their general character was so indefinite and vague as to preclude the sitting member from the opportunity of taking all the testimony which he deemed necessary.

Before Mr. H. concluded his remarks, the hour arrived for proceeding with the consideration of the special order.

Mr. BOYD moved to suspend the rule, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the contested election.

Mr. GALBRAITH called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Bynum, Carr,

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House, pursuant to the special order of the 26th January, then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMEN in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the year 1836.

The question being on the motion of Mr. BELL to strike out the following clause:

“For improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, sixty-seven thousand dollars.”

Mr. HAWES moved to postpone all the rules of the House, for the purpose of introducing a motion to rescind the order of the House making the appropriation bills the special order for each day, excepting Friday and Saturday, after one o'clock; and on that motion he asked for the yeas and nays; which were refused.

The motion was then rejected.

Mr. BELL resumed, and continued his argument, as given entire in preceding pages; when, without concluding, Mr. B. gave way for a motion that the committee rise; which was carried, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 18.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections relative to the North Carolina contested election.

Two motions were pending. The first in order was that of Mr. MANN, of New York, making the report of the Committee of Elections the special order of the day for Wednesday next; and the second proposition was that of Mr. HARD, to recommit the report, with instructions to allow further time to the sitting member for taking additional testimony.

Mr. HARD continued, at considerable length, the remarks which he commenced yesterday. He wished to call the attention of the House to some of the facts which ought to induce them to grant further time to the sitting member to take testimony. In the first place, the notice given to the sitting member was not sufficient, either as to length of time or as to form, and the sitting member had scarcely any of the time allowed him for taking evidence, after notice was given, because the petitioner occupied nearly the whole of it himself. That fact alone ought to induce the House to grant further time. As he was one of the minority of the committee, who had recommended further time to be given the sitting member, he felt called upon to show the reasons which had led them to that conclusion. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD,] who addressed the House yesterday, had stated it as his opinion that it was the paramount duty of the sitting member to have remained in his district, and that he should not have left it, even to attend to a duty which was deemed paramount by the committee to every other. Mr. H. did not agree with the honorable gentleman. He considered it the duty of the sitting member to have attended at the meeting of Congress, if for no other purpose than to maintain his right to his seat there. The same remark might apply to the petitioner. The petitioner had thought proper to be there himself, to attend to his own trial in propria persona. Well, if it became a matter of so much importance that the petitioner had remained there at his own expense, was it not of importance that the sitting member should be there also for the purpose of explaining, and being heard before the committee in his own defence? The opinion of the gentleman from Maryland could not have proceeded from due reflection in the case. The question for the House to decide presented itself in one simple undivided point, which was this: has the sitting member had sufficient time for the collection of his evidence? He would appeal to the good sense of the House, whether the great extent of the district and the short time allowed, not more than thirty days for the collection of testimony, and that time employed almost exclusively by the petitioner, should not induce them to grant the sitting member further time, to allow him to take his defensive evidence. He then recurred to some of the occurrences in committee on the subject.

The 15th of December last was the first day on which the Committee of Elections met and were organized; at least it was the first day that the parties had an opportunity of having their claims considered. The committee found a mass of testimony before them, and they permitted the petitioner to be heard by counsel, so that he had all his points laid clearly before the committee. When the counsel had closed his remarks, the sitting member rose and offered his protest, protesting against receiving the evidence, and offered reasons for rejecting it, which were considered sound reasons by a portion of the committee; and the committee were then unwilling to decide, because they might be liable to decide wrong. At the next meeting of the committee, the member of the committee from North Carolina was absent. It was found that the committee were divided in opinion as to the legality of the testimony. It was proposed that they should postpone the consideration of the case until the member from North Carolina returned; but as there was a great deal on the hands of the committee, it was agreed that they should go on examining the testimony, and not come to a decision of the matter until the gentleman from North Carolina returned. Unfortunately, however, for the committee, at that time, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] was taken sick, and they continued still to examine the evidence in the case. At a subsequent day, however, a vote was taken, and it was found that a majority of the committee present overruled the receiving of the protest; but the report would show that the decision was not made until the 14th day of January.

Mr. BOYD said he had stated, on the first day that the preliminary question was before the House, what he again intended to state; which was, that the sitting member had offered a protest, wishing to set aside the whole of the testimony; and that the only vote which was taken was the vote which overruled that protest; and that was among the first acts of the committee in investigating that case.

Mr. HARD resumed, and again stated that the first decision of the committee was made known to the sitting member on the 14th day of January. He contended that the sitting member was not bound to take any action in the matter until that decision was made known to him. Soon after the 14th day of January the sitting member applied for further time, which was as soon as he was bound to do so. In reply to what had been said about the sitting member applying to the House for further time, he had only to remark that that would not have been the parliamentary course, and he had no doubt it would have been objected to. But supposing he had presented a petition to the House, the usual course would be to refer it to the committee that had charge of the subject; and it would have gone back to the committee, there to sleep. He would only ask, in reply to the charge of unnecessary and oppressive delay, on whom was the charge to rest? The committee were ready to act at any time; and on whom the fault was to fall he would leave gentlemen to answer.

Mr. MAURY did not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but for the purpose of making a statement to the House; and he called upon the gentleman from Kentucky to admit or deny the correctness of it; because it was proper that this matter should be truly presented to the House. About the middle of December the protest of the sitting member was presented to the committee. At that time there were seven members of the committee present, out of nine; the vote was taken, and of the seven members, four were of opinion that the protest ought to be overruled; and there were three of opinion that it ought to be sustained; so that four was a minority of nine. It was then suggested, as two members were absent, and as the majority of the whole number of the committee had not concurred in overruling the protest; that the matter might lie over; and a full session of the committee did not take place until the middle of January. At that time it appeared that the protest was overruled, and no sooner; and at that time the chairman of the committee informed the sitting member that his protest was overruled. He knew the fact was not made known formally to the sitting member, and he believed it had not been made known informally at an earlier day.

Mr. RENCHER said, notwithstanding the apparent impatience of the House to bring this discussion to a close, I cannot permit the question to be taken without submitting, as briefly as I can, the views which I take of a subject so important to a portion of the people of my State. A sense of public duty compels me to throw myself upon the indulgence of the House. Anxious as I am that this question should be decided speedily, I am still more anxious that it should be decided correctly; and I can assure the House that I do not intend to trouble them with any argument or any authority which I do not consider pertinent, and essential to a correct understanding and decision of the questions now under consideration. Some gentlemen seem to consider this subject as involving the rights of the two gentlemen only who are now contending for a seat upon this floor; but I think it a question of higher magnitude. It is one which involves the constitutional rights of the people of the twelfth congressional district of the State of North Carolina. And what are those rights? Can any gentleman tell me what are the constitutional qualifications of a voter in the State of North Carolina? Has the committee informed the House what provision the constitution and laws of North Carolina have made to secure the purity of her elections? Have we been put in possession of the information necessary to enable us to decide this question upon principle? We have not. The report of the majority has said not one word about it. It is as silent as the grave. The committee have not condescended to give us the principles upon which they have decided this case. I am, therefore, surprised and astonished to see the anxiety with which some gentlemen wish to precipitate this House into a decision of this question. Are we to take the report of the committee upon faith, and eject the sitting member; or are we to go to the law and the testimony, and examine for ourselves? I repeat the question, can any gentleman tell me, from reading this report, the principles upon which the committee have decided this case? And if this House cannot solve this insolvable riddle, how will it be possible for those who come after us?

Contested Election.

The constitution of North Carolina has fixed the qualifications of a voter for the lower branch of her Legislature, and, consequently, for a member to Congress, the qualifications in each being the same. What this constitution is, the majority of the committee, in their report, have not even hinted at, while the minority have entirely misconceived, and misstated it. Here it is: "that all freemen of the age of twenty-one years, who have been inhabitants of any one county within the State twelve months immediately preceding the day of any election, and shall have paid public taxes, shall be entitled to vote for members of the House of Commons for the county in which he resides."

To enable a man to vote for a member of Congress, he must have complied strictly with the requirements of the constitution. He must be twenty-one years of age, have paid a public tax, must vote in the county in which he resides, and have been an inhabitant of that county twelve months immediately preceding the day of election. It is not sufficient that he has been an inhabitant of the State twelve months immediately preceding the day of election, but he must have been an inhabitant of the county where he votes. Suppose a man to have been all his lifetime an inhabitant of the county of Burke, and six months before the election he moves into the county of Buncombe, can he vote in the county of Buncombe? He has lived in Buncombe only six months, and his residence in Burke, whatever it might have been, was not immediately preceding the day of election, and, to make the constitutional period, you must add his residence in Buncombe to his residence in Burke; and that would be any thing else than a residence in any one county twelve months immediately preceding the day of election.

This construction, which requires a residence in the county twelve months immediately preceding the day of election, is not only the letter of the constitution, which cannot be departed from, but it is the spirit and intent of the framers of the constitution. They did not intend that any should vote for the county, but such as had a fixed residence for twelve months, so as to enable the judges to know them and their qualifications; and for the same reason it does not allow a voter, even in the same congressional district, to vote out of his own county, because the judges of that county are supposed to know him and his qualifications best. But while the committee have acted upon this plain letter of the constitution in one instance, and have rejected, and properly rejected, from the poll of the sitting member all votes given out of the county where the voter resided, though they were residents of the district; yet by some strange process of reasoning they have received and counted for the petitioner votes given by persons who had not resided in the county twelve months immediately preceding the day of election. I leave it to others to reconcile such strange inconsistency.

If it were necessary to adduce authorities to support the construction for which I contend, I have one at hand, as strong as authority can be. That is the case of Kelly and Harriss, which came here from Tennessee, and the question depended upon a single vote. The voter had resided in the county in which he voted only three months immediately before the election. The language of the constitution of Tennessee is, "every freeman, being an inhabitant of any one county in the State six months immediately preceding the election, shall be entitled to vote for members of the General Assembly, for the county in which he shall reside." It will be seen that this language is the same with that of our constitution, except that six months only is required instead of twelve; and the House decided that the constitution restricts him to the county wherein he has been an inhabitant six months immediately preceding the day of election, and permits him to vote nowhere else; and such must be the decision of this House upon the constitution of North Carolina. He must reside twelve months in the county where he votes immediately before the election, and he can vote in no other.

Mr. Speaker, having shown that the committee have entirely misconceived and misstated the constitutional qualifications of a voter in North Carolina, and that, therefore, this report should be recommitted to the committee, that these defects may be supplied and corrected, I come now to the application of the sitting member for further time to complete his testimony. To me this application appears reasonable, and ought to be granted. What is the principle upon which the petitioner expects to obtain a seat upon this floor? It is by rejecting votes given to the sitting member, not because they were not qualified to vote in the twelfth congressional district, but because they did not vote in the particular county in which they resided, supposing they had a right to vote any where in the congressional district. It is known and proven to be a common though a mistaken opinion, prevailing not only in the twelfth congressional district, but to a greater or less degree throughout the State. These honest men supposed that, being qualified voters in any county of the district, substantially, it made no difference where they might cast their votes, provided they voted within the district; because the member thus elected to Congress would be the member for the whole district, and not for any particular county. It is not wonderful, therefore, that the farmers of the country should have fallen into this mistake. It is in evidence that the petitioner's brothers fell into a similar error; and the petitioner himself, though for many years a member of the State Legislature, and twice a candidate for Congress, fell into the same mistake; for he voted for Congress out of the county in which he resided.

[The SPEAKER here suggested to Mr. RENCHER that he was going too much into the merits of this question, which would not be in order at this stage of the proceedings.]

Mr. RENCHER said his object was to show that the petitioner did not rely upon the substantial merits of his claim, but took advantage of a mere form as to the place of voting; and that, where a party took advantage of such an objection, this House ought to grant every reasonable indulgence to the sitting member, and to the people of the twelfth congressional district, to bring before the House the true merits of this case, which he presumed to be in order.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order: proceed.

Who, Mr. Speaker, these two men voted for does not appear, and is left altogether to inference. The petitioner asks of us to strike from the poll of the sitting member all such votes as were given to him by persons qualified to vote in the district, but who voted through mistake, like himself, out of the county in which they resided.

I regret that I am compelled to disfranchise these honest but mistaken voters; but the petitioner has demanded it, and the constitution is imperative. But I would ask the House if, under these circumstances, when the petitioner asks for a seat upon grounds strictly technical, and upon principles which he himself had violated in the election, if we ought or can refuse further time to the sitting member, to show that he is still clearly entitled to the seat, notwithstanding such objections?

But there is another point of view in which this subject cannot fail to strike the attention of the House. Notwithstanding the narrow and illiberal ground taken by the petitioner, the committee and the House have extended to him extraordinary indulgence. Of this I do not complain. No one shall go farther than I will to extend indulgence to every one who seeks in his own person to secure the rights and privileges of the people; but this indulgence loses the noble character of justice, unless it be extended to all alike. Through all the stages of this controversy before the Committee of Elections, the petitioner has had the benefit of able and experienced counsel; a thing that is unprecedented; and though the report of the committee would induce us to believe that the arguments before that committee were made by the petitioner himself, it is not the fact; for it is known that they were made by the district attorney, a most skilful and ingenious lawyer, while the claim of the sitting member has had no other aid than what his daily duties in this House would enable him to bestow upon it. This is not all. A majority of the committee who attended the committee-room, heard the arguments and examined the facts, have at all times been in favor of the sitting member.

They could at any time, if they had chose to do so, have granted the request now made to the House, or they could at once have reported in favor of the sitting member. They did not choose to do so, but allowed, what is expressly forbidden by parliamentary law, all these questions to be decided by members confined to their sick chambers, who could not attend the committee-room, who did not hear the arguments or examine the facts. Recently the petitioner asked permission to appear upon this floor in proper person, pending the discussion of these preliminary questions. The request was at once granted, and had my support. And now, when the sitting member asks only for a few weeks to take testimony which he had not time to take before leaving home, that the whole truth may be heard, can the House refuse the application? If this reasonable application should be refused, the country will have good cause to inquire why the House has made fish of one and flesh of another.

[Here, the morning hour having expired, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.]

On the following day,

Mr. RENCHER again rose: Before I proceed (said he) with the argument which I commenced yesterday, and in which I was interrupted by the expiration of the hour allotted for such discussions, I beg leave to remark upon the extraordinary announcement made by my honorable colleague, [Mr. BYNUM.] Upon resuming my seat on yesterday, my colleague rose in his place and announced, in the most formal and emphatic manner, that he should on Tuesday next call the previous question, and cut off this debate. I could not but feel a little surprised and astonished, not only at this very extraordinary announcement, but especially so at the particular quarter from whence it came. My colleague, it is well known, has addressed the House oftener and consumed more time upon this subject than all his other colleagues together. Of this I do not complain; he has doubtless felt it his duty to do so; but when another gentleman feels it equally his duty to address the House, that he should throw out a threat that the House was to be gagged, and the freedom of debate suppressed, is a matter of profound astonishment and mortification. And this, too, upon a subject involving the constitutional rights of the State from which we come, and that which the people there hold as dear to them as life itself—the freedom, independence, and purity of the ballot-box. But my colleague, by way of justification, repeated the trite sentiment of another, “that he would demand nothing but what was right, and would submit to nothing wrong,” which means, I suppose, being interpreted, that he would not demand to speak more than half a dozen times himself, and would not submit that another should speak at all! I hope we shall hear nothing more of this previous question from that quarter at least.

In the remarks I shall submit to-day, my only object is justice and truth, and in their pursuit I intend to be, as I feel, perfectly respectful to the petitioner, perfectly respectful to the majority of the committee, whose report I shall examine with much freedom, and strictly observant of the rules of order, so far as I understand them. In the remarks which I submitted on yesterday, my object was to show, and I trust I succeeded, that the report of the committee was so defective that it was impossible for this House, and much less so for any future Congress, to say upon what principles the committee have decided this case against the sitting member; and that, so far as their views had come to light, they had entirely misconceived and misstated the constitutional provisions of the State from which this contested election comes.

My object to-day will be to show that this report is still more defective in matters of fact; and that, from beginning to end, it is a misstatement and a misrepresentation of the truth, as it appears in evidence. But before I commence this important part of the discussion, I must invite the attention of the House to the argument which I commenced on yesterday, upon the application of the sitting member for further time to take testimony. In the remarks which I submitted, I was endeavoring to show that the petitioner had placed his claims to a seat upon a mere matter of form, and such as was entirely technical; and that if he obtained a seat at all, it would be by striking from the poll of the sitting member such votes as were given by good qualified voters, but who, through mistake, voted, as he himself did, out of their proper county. I declared my intention to strike off these votes; and that, however unwilling I might be thus to disfranchise these honest voters, the constitution was imperative, and under my oath I had no alternative. Whether it is fair and generous, in the petitioner, to wish thus to obtain a seat, is a consideration for himself and the people of the twelfth congressional district, a majority of whom he claims to represent. But as the petitioner thus takes advantage of a mere matter of form, it is but reasonable that the same strict legal rules should be applied to him. Let us therefore inquire whether the notice given by the petitioner was a reasonable and lawful one. I do not intend to inquire whether this notice, from its vagueness and uncertainty, is absolutely void. That would not at present be in order, under the rules of the House; but it is in order to show that these notices are so vague and uncertain that the sitting member could not know the specific grounds of objection, and could not therefore collect testimony until the petitioner had commenced, which was not until the 29th October, about one month before the meeting of Congress. The election took place early in August, and it is not until the 2d day of October that the sitting member receives notice that his seat was to be contested. And what was this notice? Why, "that illegal votes had been given to him, while legal votes offered for petitioner had been rejected, at different precincts in the district." Now, I would ask the House if any thing can be more vague? If he had said, take notice, I intend to oust you from Congress, would it have been more vague and uncertain than it is? Illegal votes given at the different precincts! How illegal? by whom given? and at what precinct? And as to the legal votes illegally rejected, who were they? where offered? and by whom proven? All these questions present points which should have been specified in the notice, so as to enable the sitting member to know the grounds of objection and collect evidence.

They are questions, the answers to which the petitioner must have known. He had spent two months in searching out these facts, and yet he studiously conceals them in his notice. This House has determined, again and again, that notice shall be given with reasonable certainty, so as to enable the sitting member to know the particular grounds on which his election is contested. In the case of Easton and Scott, this House resolved "that the names of persons objected to for want of sufficient qualifications ought to be set forth prior to the taking of testimony." Will any gentleman contend that the time allowed the sitting member, under such a vague notice as this, was sufficient to enable him to hunt up and take testimony, and at the same time to attend to the notices of his opponent, in the largest congressional district perhaps in the Union, embracing six large counties, and extending two hundred miles in length and nearly a hundred in breadth? In North Carolina, in a contested election for the Legislature, thirty days' previous notice is necessary in a single county. This is considered but reasonable notice for a single county; how, then, can sixty days be considered reasonable notice for six counties, even if the notice had been such a one as it ought to have been? I beg gentlemen to consider of the difficulty of collecting testimony in a State where the election is by ballot, as in North Carolina. I would address this argument particularly to gentlemen coming from States where they vote viva voce.

In Virginia and Kentucky, for instance, the name of the voter is recorded, and opposite his name is found the candidate for whom he voted; while in North Carolina, where they vote by ballot, you must ascertain that by inquiry in the neighborhood of every precinct election. Can any gentleman say that two months is sufficient time to make those inquiries, and take the testimony at the "different precincts" in this immense district, especially under a notice so vague and undefined? What has been the course pursued by the petitioner? The election took place in August, but he does not pretend to give notice till October; and does not commence taking testimony, so as to enable the sitting member to know upon what grounds he relied, till about a single month before the meeting of Congress. Why the petitioner should thus delay for nearly three months, and then suddenly spring upon his antagonist, I will not say; but this much I will say, that if he had formed a plan to take advantage of the sitting member, he could not have formed a more artful and perfect one. Will the House thus permit injustice to be done, not merely to the individual member, but to the people of the twelfth congressional district? Ought they not rather to say, let the whole truth be heard fully, impartially, and fairly?

I beg leave now, Mr. Speaker, to examine some authorities which have been brought in review in the course of this debate. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] has relied with confidence upon the case of Taliaferro and Hungerford, for refusing the present application. I have examined that case; and, so far from its being opposed to the present application, it sanctions it. That case came here from Virginia, where they vote viva voce. The election took place in April; Hungerford obtained the certificate of the sheriffs; Taliaferro immediately gave him notice that he should contest his seat, and in that notice specified particularly the grounds of objection; the votes that were to be disqualified, and even the names of the witnesses by whom such disqualification was to be proven. Hungerford disregarded this notice altogether, and took no testimony whatever.

But notwithstanding the gross and criminal neglect of Hungerford, the Committee of Elections agreed to grant further time. I beg leave to read from that report, to show that the patriotic men of that day did not view contested elections as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOWARD] has done, a mere scuffle between individuals for place. "The committee are aware," says the report, "that some inconvenience may arise to the petitioner, if this contest is laid over for any time; but they think the right of suffrage ought not to be hazarded or destroyed on account of any individual inconvenience. If there has not been gross neglect in the sitting member, the committee conceive that it is due to the electors of the district, who polled for him, and to himself, not to hurry his case to a decision, without giving them and him an opportunity to make good the election if they can do it." The House overruled this report by a small majority, because, as is evident, Hungerford had been guilty of the grossest neglect. There is no such neglect in this case; but, on the contrary, there is positive proof that all that could be done has been done by the sitting member, considering the shortness and vagueness of the notice and the extent of his district.

But I have a more recent authority, in which this House granted to the parties further time to take testimony, in a case not half so strong as the one now under consideration. It is one of high authority, because it had the approbation of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL], who was a member of the Committee of Elections. I allude to the case of Moore and Letcher. In that case the election was viva voce. It took place in August; both parties commenced taking testimony immediately, in a congressional district not so large as the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina; they continued to take testimony up to the meeting of Congress, and yet the House granted them further time to complete their testimony. A stronger authority than this cannot be found. Both parties had consumed four months, and yet both wished further time. The House did not think the application unreasonable; the gentleman from New York did not then think it unreasonable, for he voted for it, both in the committee and in the House, though he now thinks the application of the sitting member most unreasonable. It is no answer to this argument to say that, in the case referred to, both parties applied for further time. It only shows, what I have been contending for, that, with all possible industry, neither party believed his testimony complete, although they had double the time allowed the sitting member, and in a congressional district not near so large.

With these two cases staring us in the face, and many others that might be mentioned, it must be a matter of surprise and regret that the committee, in their report now under consideration, should declare in the most broad and unqualified terms that no precedent could be found, in which an application similar to the present had been granted, either by the Committee of Elections or by the House. If, therefore, reason and argument is to prevail; if precedent and authority are entitled to any weight; if equal and evenhanded justice is to be administered to all alike; if we wish that the truth should be heard, and the twelfth congressional district should speak her own voice, and not the voice of a party in this House, then we will not, and cannot, refuse to grant further time, that the whole truth may be heard.

Contested Election.

I must here, Mr. Speaker, take occasion to protest against the gratuitous inference, made the other day by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD,] that this application had been made after the battle had been fought and lost by the sitting member. This application was made in January last, before the evidence was examined, and before the sitting member could know how the committee would report. He did not then believe, he does not now believe, that this battle will be lost if justice shall be done; but he feels it his duty, a duty he owes to himself as well as to the people he represents, to put this question beyond all cavil, so that the most miserable tool of party shall not doubt. I have examined this case upon the evidence before me, carefully and impartially, and I must say that if ever there was a case in which injustice has been done, if there ever was a case in which the right of the sitting member to his seat was clear, it is this; and yet I am for giving further time, because it is desired. I wish to hear all that can be said, that the whole truth may appear. Are gentlemen afraid of the light? Is the petitioner afraid that the whole truth should be heard? If not, then let us give further time, and not hasten this important question to a premature decision.

Mr. Speaker, the most unpleasant task remains to be performed. I am constrained, from a sense of public duty, to examine further into the errors and misrepresentation of this extraordinary report, whose like I hope we shall never see again. I beg the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BORD] to believe that it is in no unkind spirit towards him that I speak thus freely of his labors. I heard the honorable gentleman a few days ago disclaim all party feelings, and avow the honesty of purpose by which he had been governed. The gentleman spoke with earnestness, and I felt, at the time, that he spoke conscientiously; but I could not but deeply regret that, in the review and self-examination of which he spoke, he had not detected the gross errors by which he has done great injustice to the sitting member, and irreparable injury to the State from which I come. Let me, therefore, invite the honorable member to the review which I propose to make of this public document.

At the Franklin precinct, in Macon county, five or six votes were found in the Commons box for Newland, and taken from that box, and placed to his poll for Congress, although it made five votes more than the number of freemen who had voted at that election. The committee allow these five votes, and, as a reason for allowing them, the report says: "Robert Hall, one of the judges, states that it is customary to correct such mistakes. There is no positive proof to show how many ballots were thus exchanged, nor who they were all for. Killian says there were five or six for Newland, and perhaps some for Graham—he does not recollect. It is left quite uncertain whether there was not some for the sitting member!" Sir, in this short sentence there are not less than three misstatements of facts. For the truth of this, I beg to read the testimony of Robert Hall and James W. Killian. Here it is. Robert Hall's testimony: "The judges, upon consultation, agreed to exchange the votes, and the exchange was made, but I do not recollect the number. I know that it has been the custom for men who lived in the district to vote in whatever county in the district where they may be at the election." James W. Killian's testimony: "I was present at the close of the business of counting our tickets. There were several tickets, five or six, for Congress, in the Commons box, and the same number for the candidates for the Senate and Commons in the Congress box. These were exchanged. All the tickets taken from the Commons box, for candidates for Congress, were given for Newland. If there were any for Graham, I do not recollect it. There may have been some, but I do not know of any."

The committee say that Robert Hall swears it was customary to make such exchange; but Robert Hall swears no such thing. He swears that it was customary for men living in the district to vote any where in the district; but, notwithstanding this custom, the committee have rejected such votes, and, as I have heretofore shown, properly rejected them. The committee say that there was no positive proof to show how many ballots were thus exchanged; but Killian swears that there were five or six. The committee say that it was left quite uncertain whether there were not some for the sitting member; perhaps, say they, there were some for Graham. But what says Killian. Let him speak for himself. "All the tickets," says he, "were for Newland; if there were any for Graham I do not recollect; there may have been some, but I do not know of any." And this positive, unequivocal testimony, the committee construe to mean "perhaps—quite uncertain!" Can the House adopt in this report this undeniable falsehood? Can they construe the clearest and most positive denial to mean "perhaps?" But the committee have not only stated that which is not true, but they have not stated what they ought to have known to be the fact. At the Franklin precinct there were 445 names recorded as having voted for Congress. There were 450 votes returned—five votes more than were polled. Can any one doubt that these five votes were the very same that were improperly taken from the Commons box, [and counted for Newland? And yet, in the face of this positive testimony, the committee have allowed these five votes for Newland. Will the House sanction such a fraud upon the purity of the ballot-box? Such votes heretofore have never been allowed.

Will the House, for the sake of ejecting the sitting member, establish so dangerous a precedent, by which a fraudulent voter will be enabled to cast as many votes for Congress as there are ballot-boxes? But I do not at this time intend to go into this subject. My only object at present is to show that this report is defective, and ought to be recommitted. Let the committee re-examine and correct the many errors and misrepresentations with which it abounds, and then, and not until then, shall we be able to give an enlightened judgment, so as to do justice to the sitting member, and the people of the twelfth congressional district.

But though the committee have stricken from the poll of the sitting member all votes given for him by persons living out of the county in which they voted, they have not deducted from the poll of the petitioner either his own vote, or that of his two brothers, though proven to have voted out of the county in which they reside. They say there is no positive proof how either of these men voted; but who can doubt how they voted, having left their own county to electioneer for their brother. But there is a case in which the proof is clear and positive; and yet the committee have refused to strike off such votes from the poll of the petitioner. I allude to the three votes given for Newland at the Henderson precinct, in the county of Buncombe. It is proven by the certificate of the judges at the Henderson precinct, as well as by the poll-books themselves, that these three votes were given for Newland, by persons living in the county of Yancy. The judges at Ashville, upon comparing the polls, properly struck these votes from the poll of the petitioner. The House will perceive, that if the judges at Ashville had not stricken off these three votes, the committee, to be consistent, must have done it. But what have they done? Strange to tell, the committee have restored these three votes, and have counted them for the petitioner! Can the House sanction such glaring inconsistency, such palpable injustice to the sitting member, as well as to the people of the twelfth congressional district? If such should be the case, and I have reason to fear it may be, let not this proceeding any longer be disguised under the name of a contested election, but let it be called what it is—an expulsion of the sitting member, to place in his seat another, whose political opinions may be more easily changed and moulded to suit the dominant party in this House.

MARCH 18, 1836.]

Contested Election.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to another class of votes allowed the petitioner by the committee, which were never given in at the polls. Yes, votes which never were voted have been counted for him. To his poll the committee have added five votes, which they say “were legally offered for him, and illegally refused.” How legally offered the committee do not state, nor is there any proof that these votes were legally tendered.

[Mr. HAMER, of Ohio, here rose to a point of order. He understood there were two motions before the House: one to fix a day for the consideration of the report, and the other, a motion to recommit the report to the committee, with leave to the parties to take further testimony. His question of order was this: whether, upon a motion to recommit to a committee, it was in order to discuss the proposition whether the committee had correctly stated the facts already laid before them, or drawn proper deductions from those facts.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Kentucky, stated that there was nothing stronger in favor of recommitting the report to the committee, than to show that the committee had misstated both the law and the facts on this subject.

The SPEAKER stated that to discuss the merits of the main question upon this contested election would not be in order at this stage of the proceeding. He had, however, not arrested the gentleman's remarks, because others had gone somewhat into the merits of the question, and the Chair now found some difficulty in restraining the gentleman from North Carolina. The debate had taken a wide range; but he hoped the gentleman would confine himself to remarks that would be in order.]

Mr. RENCHER stated that he well knew his remarks would not be very acceptable to the gentleman from Ohio, but while he would go as far as the rules of order would allow, he did not intend to transgress those rules if he knew it. But could it be out of order, when urging the recommitment of this report, to show that the committee have misconceived the law and misstated the facts in this case? He did not charge the committee with any design to misrepresent, but he wished to show that the committee had been misled themselves, and that their report, unless corrected, must mislead this House, in a matter of vital importance to the freemen of the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina.

Mr. R. continued. The report says that five votes had been legally offered, and illegally refused. How legally offered? The law of North Carolina has prescribed the mode by which a vote shall be legally offered. In that State, when a vote is objected to, the voter is required by law to swear “that he is qualified to vote under the constitution, and that he hath not voted before at such election.” We are to presume that the sworn officers of the law did their duty, unless the contrary appear. Is there any evidence here that these judges did not do their duty, or that these voters offered to qualify, as the law directs? Not the slightest particle; and although the report asserts that these votes were legally offered, the assertion is made without any evidence to justify it, and without giving to the House the law of North Carolina, by which a voter is required, if his vote be objected to, to swear both to his qualification and that he has not voted before at such election. The judges have a right to require, and do require, this oath of every voter whose vote is objected to; and if he refuse to qualify, he loses his elective franchise, and has no right to vote. However competent such a voter may be, he loses his right by refusing to comply with the requisitions of the law. But there is no evidence that these five votes, which the committee say were legally offered and illegally refused, were qualified votes; but, on the contrary, there is positive proof that three of these voters were not qualified to vote, and therefore properly refused.

We have the deposition of three of these men, and they swear that neither of them had resided in the county twelve months before the election, which I have shown is indispensable to enable a freeman to vote under the constitution of North Carolina. The committee assert that these votes were legally offered and illegally refused; while there is no proof that they were legally offered, and positive proof that they were legally and properly refused. And how are the other two votes proven to have been legal votes? Not by the oath of the voters themselves, but by the ex parte affidavit of a near relative of the petitioner. And will the House give more weight to such an affidavit than to the solemn judgment of judges appointed by law, and acting under the solemnity of an oath? Is the House prepared, upon such an affidavit, to say that these votes were legally offered and illegally refused by the judges? The committee say that these five voters were qualified to vote, and therefore illegally refused, while the judges decided, under oath, that they were not qualified, and refused their votes. When we look into the proof, three of them swear to facts which show they were not qualified; while the only evidence you have of the qualification of the other two is the ex parte evidence of a near relative of the petitioner.

I have dwelt upon this point to show that these votes were properly rejected, and that the committee have asserted, without any proof to justify it, that they were legally offered and illegally refused. At a proper time, when such a discussion will be in order, I shall be able to show, from the highest authority, that this House cannot count, for either candidate, votes which were refused by the judges at the polls. The most that we can do is to set aside an election, when it shall appear that the judges have been guilty of fraud, in refusing such a number of good votes as would have changed the result of the election. In this case no such fraud is pretended. The judges not only acted honestly, but the proof is clear that they decided properly.

Mr. Speaker, I have done with this report. I regret that my duty has compelled me to say thus much of it. Many other points of objection I have left unnoticed; for, from beginning to end, this whole document is nothing but a tissue of misstatements and misrepresentations, not intentional, I admit, but which are well calculated to mislead the public mind. It doubtless has and will mislead many honest voters in the twelfth congressional district, into which I am told a large number, obtained from our public printer, was sent many days before it was laid upon our tables. But here, with the law and the facts before us, I am determined it shall mislead no one, unless he be willingly misled. I trust, therefore, that this whole subject will be recommitment to the committee, that we may have such a report as will enable us to decide this controversy correctly and impartially. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BORN] appears impatient to hurry this House into a premature decision of this case. He declares that we can decide it in a single hour. Though it has cost him and the committee between two and three months of assiduous labor to enable him to decide it, he thinks this House ought to decide in one hour! Let me tell the gentleman that, although there may be some who are willing to take the gentleman's report upon faith, and eject the sitting member without even an hour's examination, yet there are others, and I hope a large majority of this House, who wish to examine this large volume of evidence for themselves, and who wish to decide this case upon the eternal principles of truth and justice, and not under the influence of party dictation. I regret that the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] should have announced his determination not to give us time to examine this subject. He, too, can decide it in a single hour. Let me remind the gentleman of his own experience upon contested elections. At the last Congress the gentleman was a member of the Committee of Elections, and examined the case of Moore and Letcher for six months. He came to a clear conclusion in favor of Moore, and so reported. But the House, upon examination of the evidence, decided that Letcher had a majority of the legal votes. Suddenly the gentleman became bewildered, his intellect was benighted, and he then declared, for his life, he could not tell which was entitled to the seat, and therefore voted to send it back to the people! The gentleman's own experience should make him a little more distrustful of his ability to decide contested elections. Then, after six months' examination, he reversed his own decision, and decided that he could not decide; but now he can decide a question equally complicated in one hour! What, let me ask, has so whetted the gentleman's mental faculties? What has made this child of doubt and of darkness on yesterday, to-day an intellectual giant? But though he has so increased in intellectual strength, and can now decide this case in a single hour, yet I trust he will show some indulgence towards others, who have not been so fortunate, and give them time to examine and decide for themselves.

Contested Election.

Mr. Speaker, in the course of this debate frequent allusion has been made to party, and the politics of the two gentlemen. For the sitting member I have great personal respect. The able and independent manner in which he has discharged his public duties, and his correct and amiable deportment in private life, must have secured him the respect and esteem of all who know him. But, upon this subject, I feel that I am acting under the obligations of an oath, and I am determined to know no party except my country, and to yield to no feeling except truth and justice. But why should I cherish any party feeling? I trust I have no cause to do so. Both these gentlemen, when before the people, held the same political sentiments I do upon the all-absorbing question that now agitates this country from one extreme to the other. They both avowed their preference for Judge White for the next presidency. They both hoisted his flag, which has been truly said to be a flag without a stain. I hope neither of them has pulled down that flag, and abandoned the principles he held before the people. It is true, I have heard the petitioner has deserted that flag, and given in his adhesion to Van Buren; but I do not know the fact to be so. I hope it is not so, and that the gentleman will contradict a report so unfavorable to his political integrity. Anxious and ambitious as he may be to obtain a seat on this floor, (and it is worthy of ambition,) I hope he will never consent to do so by bartering away his own political principles, and the political rights of a free, independent, and generous people. The Van Buren party, who now constitute a majority in this House, must be anxious to obtain the casting vote from North Carolina, should the election of President come to the House of Representatives; but I am unwilling to believe any party in this country so base as to buy up political power, by violating the sacred rights of the ballot-box, and placing upon this floor a political apostate, whom the people have not sent here by their votes. But if, hereafter, the melancholy conviction should be forced upon my mind that such is the fact, and that the people of the twelfth congressional district have thus been betrayed, I shall not hesitate to proclaim and denounce such bargain and bribery freely and fearlessly, and in such terms as corruption deserves. The people will rise in their majesty, and avenge their violated rights. But be that as it may, the path of duty to me is plain; I must decide this controversy according to law and testimony, and I am determined to do so impartially, conscientiously, and without regard to party dictation. I was not drifted here upon the waves of party. I have the satisfaction to believe that I came here from the confidence which my constituents repose in my devotion to the constitution and laws of my country, and the rights and interests of the people. I shall endeavor to do nothing, either on this or any other occasion, to impair that kind and indulgent opinion.

Before Mr. RENCHER had concluded his remarks, the whole of which are given above,

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the orders of the day.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to suspend the rules for this day, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the subject then pending; and intimated, at the same time, that if it was not disposed of to-day, he should renew a similar motion to-morrow.

Mr. MANN, of New York, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the vote was: Yeas 111, nays 70:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Boon, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Davis, Dickerson, Dickson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Fairfield, French, William K. Shepard, Shields, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Underwood, Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Wise—70.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. BYNUM inquired of the Chair, what would be the effect of the motion for the previous question?

The CHAIR replied, that the subject had passed from before the House that day, by the vote just taken.

Alford and Brush.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BYNUM then gave notice, promising that he asked for nothing but what was right, and was not disposed to submit to what was wrong, that he should move the previous question.

The House then proceeded to the orders of the day.

ALFORD AND BRUSH.

The House resumed the consideration of the joint resolution for the relief of Benedict Alford and Robert Brush.

[The resolution was presented under the following circumstances: At the first session of the 23d Congress, a bill passed the House of Representatives, granting pensions to Benedict Alford and Robert Brush, soldiers of the revolutionary war. By the journals of the Senate, it appears that this bill was indefinitely postponed in that body, and the House of Representatives was so notified; and it is also so entered in the journal of the House. The postponement of the bill in the Senate, in the hurry of business at the last hour of the session, was inadvertently overlooked by the enrolling clerk, as well as by the Committee on Enrolled Bills in the House, and it was enrolled and signed by the officers of the two Houses, and presented to, and approved by, the President. A few days after the adjournment of Congress, the error was discovered in the Clerk's office of the House of Representatives, and notice of the fact was immediately given to the War Department. The Secretary of War thereupon declined complying with the provisions of the bill, under the conviction that it was not a valid statute. At the last session of Congress, the President communicated the fact to the Senate by message. No action in the case was, however, had in either House at the last session. At the present session Benedict Alford again presented his petition, which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. The committee reported that, in its opinion, the act was a valid one, and that no further legislation was necessary to give a pension to the petitioner, which, in their opinion, the Secretary of War was bound to pay him. A member of the committee, differing from the majority, after the report was made, moved the resolution directing the Secretary of War to execute the act, which had passed in the manner herein stated; and the discussion on a former day, and on the present occasion, was mainly whether or not the bill of the first session of the 23d Congress was, under the circumstances above stated, a valid act.]

The motion pending was that of Mr. VINTON, to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report whether the act mentioned in the resolution was a law of the land or not.

Mr. WHITTLESEY expressed the hope that the instructions would be withdrawn, and the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, without further debate.

Mr. WISE made a few remarks in opposition to the validity of the act; when

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved to postpone the subject to Friday next; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. INGERSOLL, who offered a substitute for the motion of Mr. VINTON, directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill, if they should deem it proper, for the relief of the persons mentioned in the resolution.

After some remarks by Messrs. INGERSOLL and DICKERSON,

Mr. WHITTLESEY renewed the motion to postpone the whole subject until Friday next, but subsequently withdrew it.

The discussion was further continued by Messrs. TOUCY, INGERSOLL, ROBERTSON, MERCER, LANE, JUDSON, and CRAIG.

Mr. McKEON remarked that, aware as he was that a large portion of the public time had been given to this question, he would ask the attention of the House but for a very few moments. He was satisfied that it was due to themselves, as well as those whom they represented, that they should theorize less. It was time to produce results of a practical character. Day after day was consumed in trifles, and it was time to pause in the career the House had been pursuing. The question growing out of the claims of the petitioners was, to his mind, as simple as any one could be; as plain a proposition as ever was submitted to a legislative body. It appeared that, by some inadvertence, a bill granting pensions to these revolutionary soldiers had received all the necessary certificates of the officers of the two branches of Congress, and had all the appearance of a law, without ever having been adopted by the Senate. The President of the United States has sent his message to the House, stating that the bill never received the sanction of the Senate. This fact, sir, said Mr. McK., appears from the journal of that Senate, showing that the bill was indefinitely postponed. It was evident that no action had taken place upon it in that body—that action so necessary to pass it into a law. It was admitted on every side of that House, that a measure, to have the effect of law, must be sanctioned by both branches of Congress. If there was a doubt as to the amount of evidence necessary to prove the adoption by either branch, he (Mr. McK.) insisted that the House ought to lean in favor of that position which tended to keep the power in the legislative branches. That was the doctrine of the Executive; of that Executive so frequently charged with a desire to dispense with the Senate; and which Executive was now found sending his message here, stating that, as the Senate had not sanctioned the bill, the law had not been executed. He (Mr. McK.) had heard gentlemen on that floor insist that the Executive officer ought not to look behind the certificates of the passage of the law; that those certificates were sufficient authority for them. The Executive deserved, for his vigilance and scrutiny into the facts of the case, the approbation of every man who voted to see the proper exercise of the powers of each branch of the Government. The constitution insists that the assent of both branches shall be given to a bill. What has been the case here? We find the bill adopted by the House, and, so far as the House is concerned, bearing every evidence of its being approved by this branch. We follow the bill to the Senate, and find upon the journal that it was postponed indefinitely. We find evidence of its not having passed that body. One member insists that we shall go further; he tells us that the officers whose duty it is to execute the law ought not to examine beyond the signatures which are affixed to the bill. Sir, said Mr. McK., I go as far as the truth goes, so far as the fact appears from the journal that it is not a law with the approval of the Senate. It was, undoubtedly, on the same principle the Secretary of War refused to put the law into execution. The opposite doctrine would undoubtedly throw the power out of the hands of this House; frauds might be committed; the public treasure squandered. In this case, in the hurry of business, a mistake has occurred, and it is our business not to waste time on nice distinctions, but to remedy the defect at once. Before taking my seat, allow me to refer to a point which, though not strictly relevant, yet has been made during the discussion this morning.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] has taken occasion, in the course of his remarks, to say that this question is a fine commentary on the new-fashioned doctrine of expunging. I know that this expunging is not popular with many; but, sir, so far as the novelty is concerned, let me inform the gentleman from Virginia that we have a precedent already upon the journals of an American Congress—upon the journal of the Senate of the United States. The case can be found in the journal of the Senate of the year 1806. I read from the journal. Here is the resolution, with this same objectionable word, expunge. I produce it to show what was done in the days of Thomas Jefferson—what was the practice during the administration of one of Virginia's noblest children.

"Monday, 5 o'clock, P. M., April 21, 1806.

"It passed in the affirmative—yeas 13, nays 8.

"The yeas and nays having been required by one fifth of the Senators present, those who voted in the affirmative are,

"Messrs. Adair, Condit, Gilman, Kitchel, Logan, Mitchell, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Thruston, Turner, Worthington, and Wright.

"Those who voted in the negative are,

"Messrs. Adams, Baldwin, Hillhouse, Pickering, Plummer, Smith of Ohio, Tracy, and White."

In the list of yeas and nays the name of the distinguished and venerable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] is found; and if there be any thing in reference to the vote, of which explanation may be demanded, he certainly can inform us. If the precedent be examined, it will be found to contain sufficient authority for the present day.

Mr. McK. hoped there was a disposition in the House to do justice to these time-honored and war-worn petitioners, who were soldiers of the Revolution—that the resolution would be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. Let us act as if the matter was res integra—as if it was a pure question. If deemed necessary, let a preamble to the bill be reported, setting forth the circumstances in relation to the case. He was satisfied that this course would alone produce the result so greatly desired on all sides.

At the suggestion of Mr. HOLSEY, Mr. INGERSOLL accepted a modification of his amendment, to change the reference of the subject from the Judiciary Committee to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The discussion was then further continued by Mr. HOLSEY; when

Mr. GILLET moved the previous question.

Mr. VINTON modified his motion by directing the Committee on the Judiciary, if they should be of opinion that the act was not a valid one, to report a bill for the benefit of the persons named in the same, if they should be of opinion that relief ought to be granted to them.

The motion for the previous question was not seconded.

After various propositions to amend, and some further remarks and suggestions by Messrs. BEARDSLEY, SUTHERLAND, ADAMS, INGERSOLL, ANTHONY, GRENNELL, KENNON, and EVERETT, the substitute proposed by Mr. INGERSOLL for the motion of Mr. VINTON was negatived: Ayes 63, noes 65.

Mr. ADAMS then moved a substitute for the motion of Mr. VINTON, in substance that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to report a bill for the relief of Benedict Alford and Robert Brush; which was agreed to: Ayes 80, noes not counted.

So the joint resolution was committed to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, with the instructions moved by Mr. ADAMS.

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, MARCH 19.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the subject of the North Carolina contested election.

The question being originally on the motion reported from the committee to postpone the consideration of the report till the 2d day of March, and make it the special order for that day,

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to strike out the 2d of March, and insert Wednesday, the 23d of March.

Mr. HARD had moved to recommit the whole subject to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to allow further time for the parties to take depositions in the case.

Mr. RENCHER resumed his remarks in favor of the motion to allow further time.

The morning hour having expired, the orders of the day were called for.

On motion of Mr. HARD, the rules were suspended for this day, with a view to proceed in the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. RENCHER having concluded his remarks, as given heretofore,

Mr. NEWLAND then addressed the House at some length. He said he was sorry it had again become his duty to trouble the House with any further remarks. When the House did him the honor to permit him to appear on Wednesday last in his own behalf, he first addressed the Chair, and inquired the nature of the motions then pending. The Chair was kind enough to explain, and informed him that it would be out of order to discuss the main question. Mr. N. on that occasion endeavored strictly to observe the landmarks laid down by the Chair, carefully avoiding any explanation of the testimony, and confining himself to a plain and simple statement of facts, in regard to the notices he had served on his honorable opponent, and the notices served on himself by his opponent. If, on that occasion, he was happy enough to be understood, and gentlemen had examined the dates he then referred to, he trusted the House was now fully satisfied that, so far from the petitioner having any intention to seek any advantages of the sitting member, he had manifested every disposition to afford that gentleman all the facilities a reasonable man could ask for. He had given him more than double the time the laws of their State required, serving the original notice on him at the September court in Burke county, the first court in the district, and continuing, week after week, from one county to another, until it passed through the whole district, at each and all of which his opponent saw all his friends, and had all the opportunity he could have asked for to collect and embody his testimony.

Mr. N. said these facts spoke for themselves; and gentlemen surely must be satisfied that the sitting member had occupied more time in taking depositions than he had, coupled as this was with the fact that the sitting member had notified him (the petitioner) that he would continue taking depositions up to the 15th of December, having served notices to that effect prior to his [Mr. GRAHAM] leaving home.

By permission of the House, Mr. N. would turn for a moment to the remarks that had fallen from several honorable gentlemen who had spoken, but more particularly to what had just fallen from one of the representatives from his own State, [Mr. RENCHER.] As to the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HARD,] Mr. N. could not pretend to answer him, for the reason that much of what he said was in an unknown tongue, or, at least, in language Mr. N. was not conversant in. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RENCHER] (he presumed he would, under no circumstances, permit him to call the gentleman his colleague) had said a good deal about prejudging this case, and about predilections. Now, he (Mr. N.) would appeal to the candor of the House to say whether the gentleman himself had not prejudged this case. Before concluding his remarks, the gentleman had taken occasion to refer to the politics of the two contending gentlemen, [Mr. GRAHAM and Mr. N.] These remarks rendered it incumbent upon him that he should give some further explanation than was prescribed to him by the direction of the Speaker, or than he had originally intended; and as the gentleman [Mr. RENCHER] had indulged in a very wide range of argument and discussion, Mr. N. hoped the House would extend the same courtesy towards himself. So far as politics were concerned, he had no secrets to keep. His politics were, and ever had been, known, both in the Legislature of his native State, and to the people of his whole district. They had been inculcated into his youthful mind, and were in accordance with the views of one who made bare his bosom to achieve the liberties he then enjoyed. His early opinions he had never abandoned, nor would he; and if gentlemen wished to investigate his politics, he not only challenged, but should court it. He held himself ready to give a full, a fair, and an impartial history of his whole course, if it was desired. He had nothing to conceal, little to regret, and still less to retract.

Contested Election.

Mr. N. then proceeded to say that he had been an humble supporter of the present administration, which had, in his opinion, carried out the principles he verily believed to have been intended by the framers of the great charter of our rights.

The CHAIR here interposed, and informed the gentleman that the course he was pursuing was not strictly in order.

Mr. MAURY moved that the gentleman have leave to proceed.

Mr. BYNUM thought, as the petitioner's politics had been first brought in question by his colleague, [Mr. RENCHER], that the former gentleman had a right to proceed in reply.

The House then agreed to the motion of Mr. MAURY.

Mr. NEWLAND thanked the House for the indulgence, but having been rebuked, he would not proceed further on that subject. He hoped, however, he might be permitted to say to the honorable gentleman [Mr. RENCHER] that he (Mr. N.) was not one of those who fought under different colors. He would merely ask the gentleman to take the beam from his own eye, ere he could flatter himself with possessing that distinct perception to be able to take the mote from his brother's. Sir, said Mr. N., "straws show which way the wind blows;" and it is easy to perceive from the gentleman's argument what he is aiming at. You know the maxim, sir, that "dog will not eat dog;" and from the highest authority we are told that "he that is not for me is against me." The gentleman, in his elaborate speech, had, as must be apparent to all who heard him, taken but one side of the case.

The gentleman had given the House one reason why this report should be recommitted, viz: that the committee had wholly misconstrued the constitution of North Carolina in regard to the qualifications of voters. Now, with all due deference to the legal opinions of that gentleman, Mr. N. must be permitted to say that he was himself wholly wrong, and that the gentleman's opinion totally conflicted with the construction given to that section by the most able, experienced, and learned men of their State. Mr. N. then read that part of the constitution of North Carolina, and commented at some length upon the interpretation given to the section relating to elections by Mr. RENCHER, whose argument, he said, was an absurdity, being totally at variance with the common meaning of simple language, unless the clause was intended to consist of empty words, and mean nothing. The constitution was so plain and explicit, that it seemed to him strange indeed that the gentleman should have given it the construction he had.

Mr. N. then referred to the letters and statements of the sitting member, and said, "out of his own mouth let him be judged." Lawyer as his opponent was, Mr. N. was at a loss to perceive how the gentleman could get out of the difficulty. The gentleman thought, perhaps, he was playing a safe game, by objecting to Mr. N's testimony, yet he was willing to avail himself of the very same kind of testimony to that he objected to on Mr. N's part; if he could sustain himself by testimony, he would do so; if not, then the gentleman would set the whole aside.

Mr. N. made some further remarks, principally in reply to the speech of the sitting member.

At the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

Mr. MANN, of New York, then modified his motion by inserting Thursday, the 24th of March, instead of Wednesday, the 23d; so as to make the subject the special order for that day; which was agreed to by the House.

The question then recurring on the motion as amended,

Mr. RENCHER said he still wished to take the sense of the House upon the application of the sitting member for further time to take testimony. If, however, the House should reject that application, he was indifferent on what day the consideration of the subject was brought up. He said he saw that if the amendment should be adopted by the House, it would then be out of order to move an amendment to the effect he had indicated, or, perhaps, any other.

The CHAIR said that when the subject should come up on Thursday next, it would then be in order for the gentleman to make that motion.

Mr. RENCHER expressed a wish to move to postpone the further consideration of the subject till the third Wednesday in April.

Mr. McKAY hoped the House would decide to-day on the application of the sitting member for further time. A month had already been wasted in the discussion of this preliminary question, and as yet they had not progressed a single step. Suppose the motion of postponement, in its amended form, were adopted, and the subject made the special order for Thursday next, they would then be where they were, since he understood from his colleague that he still intended to submit the very motion now pending, for further time. Mr. McK. did hope that, inasmuch as the rules had been suspended that morning for the purpose of proceeding in the consideration of this case, at least this preliminary question would be disposed of.

Mr. MANN had no objection to withdraw his motion for the present, if he could do so, so as to enable the House to reach the other question.

The CHAIR, having stated the question, said that could only be done by a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had adopted the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then made the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BYNUM wished to know the object of the reconsideration.

Mr. RENCHER explained that it was to obtain the vote of the House upon the application of the sitting member for further time to take testimony. He also wished to obtain that vote at this time, so that the preliminary question should not be in the way of the House when it came to act on the main question.

Mr. McKAY again expressed a hope that the House would act on that question without further delay.

Mr. GILLET thought, if the motion to reconsider prevailed, they would stand precisely in the same situation they had been for the last month, and it was not in the power of man to tell when they would proceed with it. There were several other propositions, subsequent to the one already decided, before the House, upon which decisions would be likewise called for; and, as he was opposed to wasting any more time in these preliminary questions, he moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

H. or R.]

Contested Election.

[MARCH 19, 1836.]

Mr. BYNUM inquired of the Chair what would be the effect of that motion, if it prevailed?

The CHAIR replied that the motion to lay a motion to reconsider on the table would cohere to the main proposition, and, if agreed to by the House, would carry the main subject with it, and lay the whole on the table; whereupon,

Mr. GILLET withdrew the motion.

Mr. BYNUM remarked that it appeared to him there was something more than met the eye in this motion to reconsider. His colleague now wanted to move for further time to be allowed the sitting member, and not to recommit, which seemed to Mr. B. to be an entire change of the original ground.

Mr. RENCHER repeated his previous statement, that he desired a decision of the House upon the application of the sitting member for further time. If that application should prevail, the subject would be recommitted, as a matter of course. He could assure his colleague that he would do or say nothing there but what was clear.

Mr. VANDERPOEL thought the object represented by the gentleman to be very reasonable, and one that ought to be concurred in, otherwise they had gained nothing at all, and had been making speeches for the last month to no purpose whatever. He thought they were emphatically called upon to dispose of that application at once, one way or the other.

The motion was then agreed to without a count, and the House reconsidered its vote adopting the amendment of Mr. MANN.

Mr. RENCHER then moved to strike out the 2d of March, as in the original motion of the committee, and insert "the third Thursday in April next, and that the parties have leave, until that time, to take further testimony."

Mr. MANN, of New York, asked for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired, if this motion should be rejected, whether the motion would still be open to insert Thursday next?

The CHAIR replied that would be the next question in order, the vote being taken on the most distant time first, which was the present motion.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. RENCHER was rejected: Yeas 87, nays 104:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, H. Allen, Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bunch, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, G. Chambers, J. Chambers, Chapman, Childs, N. H. Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks—104.

The question then recurring upon the modified amendment of Mr. MANN, of New York, to strike out the 2d and insert the 24th of March,

Mr. MANN, with a view, he said, to test the sense of the House upon proceeding at once with the subject, withdrew his motion for the 24th, and moved to insert this day, stating that, if any objection were made, he should withdraw it.

Mr. RENCHER hoped a few days' further time, at least, would be allowed.

Mr. MANN thereupon withdrew the latter motion, and renewed the former.

Mr. RENCHER desired also to take the sense of the House on the propriety of recommitting the report, as he wished the law and qualifications of electors to be so represented to the House as to enable it to act understandingly. If there was any way by which that object could be accomplished, he desired the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. SPEIGHT hoped the committee would report upon what they conceived the strict and legal interpretation of that part of the constitution and laws of North Carolina bearing upon the subject of elections, and that object could be attained by his colleague, by moving to have the constitution and all the acts of North Carolina regulating elections in that State printed. Mr. S. expressed his surprise at one remark that fell from his colleague [Mr. RENCHER] that day, in reference to the qualification of voters of the House of Commons and Representatives in Congress from North Carolina. He understood his colleague to say that it required twelve months' residence in the county before an individual was entitled to vote. Surely a gentleman so distinguished and learned in the law as his colleague would not contend for such an interpretation of the ninth section of their constitution as that. It had been correctly read, and very correctly commented upon, by the petitioner, and his interpretation was in conformity with the construction given to that clause by the most learned men of their State. Any man otherwise qualified to vote, moving into another county, and swearing that that had become his bona fide place of residence, was entitled to vote. It required no particular time of residence, if a voter had paid his taxes, and his residence was in the county.

Mr. UNDERWOOD remarked that, since the report had been made, additional testimony had been laid on the tables of the House, and it seemed to him proper that the committee should report thereupon. Upon that ground he should vote for the recommitment of the report.

Mr. MAURY moved to insert Thursday two weeks, and that in the mean time the additional testimony be recommitment to the committee, with instructions to report thereon.

The CHAIR said the motion in that form was not then in order; but if the House should now refuse to postpone to a day certain, the next question would be the motion to recommit.

Mr. MAURY. But if the House agree to postpone to a day certain, sir?

The CHAIR. If the House agree to postpone to a day certain, then on that day it would be in order to make the motion indicated by the gentleman. The House might then proceed to act upon the report of the committee, or postpone further, or recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD should not vote for the recommitment of the report, for he was satisfied that the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. SPEIGHT] would obviate the necessity of doing so. The section of the constitution and the laws regulating elections in North Carolina were embodied in a very small compass, and could be conveniently printed in a day or so.

As to the additional testimony taken by the sitting member since the report of the committee was made, all he had to say was this: it had been printed and laid on their tables; and when the House went into the consideration of the whole subject, it would then be competent for any gentleman to call for the reading of that testimony; and it was not so voluminous but that the House could extract the proof from it as well as the committee. It had never been Mr. S's purpose to throw difficulty in the way of any question; and he should, therefore, make no motion tending to embarrass any of the preliminary questions.

Mr. RENCHER was satisfied at the suggestion of his colleague, [Mr. SPEIGHT.] There was only a portion of the constitution, and one or two sections of the law, that it would be necessary to print.

Mr. SPEIGHT suggested to his colleague to amend his motion by directing the same to be printed under the direction of the committee.

Mr. RENCHER was also, he said, about to propose a more distant day, and he hoped the gentleman from New York would consent to a modification for Tuesday two weeks.

Mr. MANN replied that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, as well as other gentlemen, wished to occupy Tuesday in public business, and Mr. M. therefore proposed Thursday and the two succeeding days.

Mr. GLASCOCK said it appeared to him that the motion to recommit these proceedings to the committee was all important, and would save the House a great deal of trouble and much time. When the subject came up for final action, the most important question that would then be presented would be with regard to the propriety of admitting or rejecting the additional testimony presented to the House though the Chair, subsequently to the report of the committee. He was clearly of opinion that the sense of the House ought now to be taken, with a view to ascertain what disposition should be made of it. He believed it indispensably necessary that the committee should be put in possession of the testimony recently arrived, and that they should report upon it; and, for himself, he was not prepared to exclude it. If that testimony should have the effect of changing the report of the committee, he should feel it his duty not to sustain the report, though he should certainly sustain it if the testimony warranted him in so doing. His main object, however, in wishing the committee to report upon it was, to prevent the discussion that would necessarily arise in the House upon the propriety of the reception or rejection of the additional testimony. It was true that it had been printed and laid on their tables, but no decision had been had, whether it should be received or not. He hoped, therefore, that a motion would be sustained that the testimony which had been recently received should be committed to the Committee of Elections; and that the committee be instructed to report thereon as speedily as possible. Mr. G., in conclusion, hesitated not to say that he was prepared to receive all the testimony now in possession of the House, if taken in conformity with the constitution and laws of North Carolina; and if that additional testimony would authorize the sitting member to retain his seat, Mr. G. would so record his vote. Mr. G. then made the above motion.

Mr. HARDIN had, as yet, been unable to lay his hand upon the constitution of North Carolina, or any law of that State upon the subject of elections. Mr. H. concurred entirely in the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GLASCOCK,] and he should take the whole testimony into consideration, as well that which had been before the committee as that which had subsequently been presented and laid on the tables of the House. With that understanding, he did not know of any particular necessity to call upon the Committee of Elections to report upon it.

Mr. GLASCOCK then withdrew his motion, and the modified amendment of Mr. MANN, to insert the 24th instead of the 2d of March, was agreed to without a count.

The question recurring on agreeing to the motion of the Committee of Elections as amended,

Mr. MANN, at the suggestion of Mr. RENCHER, withdrew his motion to make the subject also the special order for the two succeeding days, to Thursday, the 24th.

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to without a count.

The CHAIR said, to avoid a question of order, he would understand it to be the pleasure of two thirds of the House, when Thursday arrived, unless otherwise determined by the House, that this subject would take precedence of the special order (the appropriation bills) on that day.

Mr. WISE then said, I call for a division of the House on that question.

The vote was then taken by tellers, and the result was, ayes 124, noes 49, being two thirds in the affirmative; and so the subject was postponed, and made the special order for Thursday next, the 24th of March.

The question then recurred on Mr. SPEIGHT's motion, that that portion of the constitution and laws of North Carolina relating to the elections of that State be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. HARDIN suggested a modification, to the following effect: "as much as may be pointed out by the sitting member and the petitioner;" which Mr. SPEIGHT accepted; and the motion was agreed to by the House.

Mr. ANTHONY moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITTLESEY asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the yeas were 104, nays 86; and so

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 21.

TRADES UNION—HOURS OF LABOR.

The memorial presented on Monday last, by Mr. HOWARD, from the Trades Union of Baltimore, asking Congress to regulate the hours of labor of the operatives on the public works, so as to confine the time of such labor to ten hours in each day, was taken up.

There were three motions pending: the first to refer the memorial to a select committee, the second to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and the third, that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The first question in order was to refer the memorial to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. HOWARD had not supposed that the memorial would give rise to any debate, and less did he suppose that discussion could have arisen on the mere question of its reference. It was a prayer from about three thousand of the laboring classes of the community, and

H. OF R.]

Mr. H. detailed the substance of the contents of the memorial, and the reasons assigned by the memorialists for the legislation of Congress on the subject. Mr. H. thought the Committee on Roads and Canals was not the proper reference, for they had but a comparatively small branch of the public works under their charge. For a similar reason he was opposed to referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if any reference was necessary, he thought a select committee should be raised on the subject. The memorial was a reasonable one, and might be acted on by the House itself.

Mr. PARKER thought the subject itself one in which Congress had neither the right nor the power to interfere. It should be left to the regulations of the parties themselves—the workman and his employer.

Mr. WARDWELL was inclined to believe this question was not one of such small importance as the gentleman from New Jersey seemed to suppose. Certainly the Committee on Roads and Canals was not, in Mr. W.'s opinion, the proper reference, nor the Committee on the Judiciary, for it was not a question of law, but of expediency. He was in favor of having a special committee raised on the subject. Every other subject sent there was certain of a reference, but these men who labored with their hands, and toiled for their bread by the sweat of their brow, who were the bone and sinew of their country, were to be denied having even their memorial referred to a committee. He expressed his surprise at the remark of the gentleman, that this was a small matter.

Mr. PARKER explained. He did not say it was a small matter. At first he did not know the subject of the memorial, until he asked the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD.]

Mr. WARDWELL understood the gentleman to say something to that effect. It was notorious that there were many abuses which these men suffered, and which ought to be inquired into. It was notorious that the men employed for the Government worked not only from sunrise to sunset every week day, but often on Sundays too. Mr. W. said he should vote against every other proposition than that to refer the memorial to a select committee.

Mr. PARKER was misunderstood in saying that he was opposed to the object of the memorial, as it had been explained. All the petitioners asked was, that they should not be compelled to work on the public works more than ten hours a day. Now, Mr. P. was not aware that there was any law to compel them to work longer, nor ought there to be. He was not opposed to the interest of the working man, but he was always prepared to maintain it. He had no objection to this memorial, but he questioned the power of Congress to interfere with the subject at all, and he thought it much wiser to leave it to the parties themselves for regulation.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved that the further consideration of the memorial be postponed until Monday next. He explained that he made this motion on account of the indisposition of one of his colleagues, [Mr. MOORE,] who was confined to his room, and who wished to address the House on the subject. The motion, also, was in accordance with the wish of the gentleman who presented the memorial.

Mr. HAMER announced his intention of moving to lay the memorial on the table. He meant no reflection on any gentleman, when he said that there were some politicians in this country who seemed to think that every thing ought to be regulated by law. Now, he was against that doctrine. Every man should be left free, being prevented from encroaching on the rights of his fellow-man, and ought to be left free to manage his own affairs in his own way, with this restriction.

Mr. ADAMS rose to a question of order. The gentleman had given notice that he intended to move to lay the memorial on the table, which motion was not debatable; and, from the gentleman's exordium, Mr. A. apprehended a long speech from him. Now, Mr. A. inquired if it was in order for the gentleman to make a speech, after the intimation of his intention to make a motion to lay the memorial on the table?

The CHAIR replied that the motion to lay on the table was not debatable; but that motion had not been made.

Mr. HAMER had no intention of making a long speech. Mr. BEARDSLEY would inquire, then, if the remarks of the gentleman were pertinent to the question under consideration, which was merely to postpone?

The CHAIR replied that the motion to postpone was debatable, though within very narrow limits.

Mr. HAMER said he should have been through by that time, if he had not been interrupted. He was against the whole proposition, and, consequently, he was opposed to its postponement. He did not believe it was a subject that ought to be entertained by Congress, and he thought they should dispose of it at once. Why, said Mr. H., we might just as well prescribe by law what sort of clothes a man should wear, or at what time he should eat his dinner! A man who is free should be left to make his own contract. He therefore moved to lay the memorial on the table; which motion was agreed to by the House: Ayes 102, noes not counted.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then took up, as the next subject in order, the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, in favor of the distribution of the proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands among the several States, presented last Monday.

The question being on the resolution offered by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, for the reference of the subject to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands among the several States, for the purposes of internal improvement and education,

Mr. ALLAN took the floor, and said:

Mr. Speaker: I rise to discharge the duty requested of me by the Legislature of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. This duty, I am happy to know, is consistent with the opinions of my immediate constituents.

I am pleased that this great subject is brought before this House by one of the States of this Union—a subject of higher importance than any which was ever submitted to the deliberation of Congress under the present constitution, and in the decision of which, as I solemnly believe, is involved the fate of our free institutions. It is fit that such a subject should be brought here by a member of the confederacy. The State comes not to solicit a favor, but to demand a right. I rejoice that the attention of Congress has been thus brought directly to the question, what shall be done with the thirty millions of dollars now in the Treasury over and above the wants of the Government, and the millions of surplus destined hereafter to come into the Treasury? Shall these vast sums be loaned out to favorites, or shall they all be exhausted in a still further increase of the expenses, power, and patronage, of the General Government? Or shall they be divided among the States?

These are the grand questions which we are called upon to decide. This is the great business of the session. Yet nearly four months have passed away, and we have not even approached it. The principal occupation of these four months, in my judgment, has been worse than useless; which is the reason why I have not felt it to be my duty to participate in the debates. I repeat that I rejoice that the House is at last brought to the consideration of the subject of the surplus revenue—a subject which has been at the bottom of all the political movements which we have witnessed for more than a year. The excellent law of 1817, which was enacted by the wise and provident councils of that time, for the payment of the national debt, having accomplished its object, we find our Treasury overflowing. It now devolves on the present Congress to decide how this treasure can be most beneficially used for our country. The disposition of the public revenue heretofore had relation chiefly to the annual expenses of the Government and the execution of plans of policy which had been adopted. But, in the present condition of the Treasury, the subject stands connected with a new system of policy, destined to exercise a decisive influence upon the security of our institutions and the liberty of the people.

Sir, we are thrown here at a most important point of history. Our country is in a situation hitherto unknown. It is our duty to meet the occasion promptly. The weighty contest now depending before Congress and before the nation is, whether the thirty millions of dollars, which is the produce of the honest labor of our constituents, shall be returned to their pockets, or devoted to the schemes of official ambition upon the eve of a presidential election. In this aspect of the question, it bears directly upon all the great interests of the nation and upon the interest and liberty of every man in the nation. It is a question between the tax-payers and the tax-receivers—between power and liberty. It is a question that will justify debate in its broadest amplitude of freedom. Sir, it is our duty to call off from the profitless skirmishing on the outposts, in which so much of the session has been consumed, and come at once up to the main battle.

Would you, Mr. Speaker, be willing to adjourn without action? Would you be willing to face the farmers of Tennessee, and tell them that you had left thirty millions of the public money loaned out, without interest, to persons that you did not know, and for what purposes you could not tell?

I impeach the motives of no one; but inaction accomplishes the purposes of those who desire to let the money remain in its present position better than action. To do nothing gains the prize, or rather retains the prize which they already have fast in their hands.

It is certain that, in the disposition of the surplus revenue, one of three plans will be adopted: 1st. It will either be suffered to remain where it now is; or, 2d. The expenses of the Government will be increased enough to exhaust it; or, 3d. So much of it as has arisen from the sales of the public lands will be divided among the States.

I propose, before I take my seat, to devote some attention to the consideration of each of these plans. But there is an indispensable preliminary inquiry essential to a clear understanding of all the bearings of this important subject. As it is proposed to invest this Government, this central agency, with the use of this vast sum of money, the duty is imposed on us of inquiring how and for what purposes the power already possessed has been used, before we double this power by placing thirty millions more in its reach. As it is known that power is ever on the alert to enlarge its authority, it is the first duty of the representatives of a free people to watch its encroachments upon the public liberty with a sleepless vigilance.

It is a very proper occasion to pause before we make this new and important step to the future, and take an impartial retrospect of the past. We are just entering upon the eighth year of the present administration, and we have before us the estimates and recommendations for the residue of the term; so that we now have a full view of the whole ground; and, upon looking over it, we shall be better able to decide upon the present character of federal power, and its tendencies, and how far it would be prudent to enlarge its boundaries, by placing under its control the surplus treasure of the people; and this retrospect is involved in much difficulty; there is no subject about which there is more controversy than “what are the principles of the present administration?” To this question you receive a different answer from almost every man to whom it is propounded. As the helmsmen of the vessel of state, let us turn to our log-book, and ascertain, if we can, what courses we have been steering. Let us ascertain our latitude and longitude, and find whereabouts we are in the broad political ocean.

In several documents, to which I will take leave to call the attention of the House, we can have a distinct view of the points to which this administration proposed to steer, before and at the commencement of its voyage. The first I shall offer is the celebrated letter of General Jackson to President Monroe, which contains, in part, the principles upon which this administration came into power; an extract from which the Clerk read, as follows:

“Pardon me, my dear sir, for the following remarks concerning the next presidential term: they are made with the sincerity and freedom of a friend. I cannot doubt they will be received with feelings similar to those which have impelled me to make them. Every thing depends on the selection of your ministry. In every selection, party and party feelings should be avoided. Now is the time to exterminate that monster called party spirit. By selecting characters most conspicuous for their probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness, without any regard to party, you will go far to, if not entirely, eradicate those feelings which, on former occasions, threw so many obstacles in the way of Government, and, perhaps, have the pleasure and honor of uniting a people heretofore politically divided. The Chief Magistrate of a great and powerful nation should never indulge in party feelings. His conduct should be liberal and disinterested, always bearing in mind that he acts for the whole, and not a part of the community. By this course you will exalt the national character, and acquire for yourself a name as imperishable as monumental marble. Consult no party in your choice; pursue the dictates of that unerring judgment which has so long and so often benefited our country, and rendered conspicuous its rulers. These are the sentiments of a friend; they are the feelings, if I know my own heart, of an undissembled patriot.

“Accept assurances of my sincere friendship, and believe me to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

“HON. JAMES MONROE.”

We have in the paper which has just been read the important principles which the faith of the party now in power was pledged to pursue.

In the appointment of public officers have “characters been selected most conspicuous for their probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness, without any regard to party?” On the contrary, can a single instance be found where any one received an office who did not belong to “the party?” Have we not seen, throughout the land, officers who were “conspicuous for their probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness,” hurled from their stations without a charge of misconduct, without a hearing or a trial, because they dared to think and speak according to the dictates of their consciences, and because they did not belong to “the party?”

Has this administration wielded its power to crush the monster called party spirit? On the contrary, has not this fell monster been nurtured and fed until it has become a bloated Juggernaut, whose voracious appetite has not been satisfied with a thousand victims of the opposite party, but has, without pity or remorse, crushed beneath its ponderous wheels almost all its original votaries? Must not all worship at the shrine of this idol, under pain of their proscription and unrelenting persecution? Has not the irreversible decree gone forth, that all true believers, as a passport to office, must repeat the confession of faith that there is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet? We must seek elsewhere for the principles of this administration; they are not to be found in the Monroe letter.

Let us turn over another leaf of our book of reckoning. It is a letter from General Jackson to the Legislature of Tennessee, upon the occasion of his being nominated as a candidate for the presidency; an extract from which reads as follows:

"Upon this principle I venture fully to accord with you in the contemplated change proposed to the constitution, and, indeed, would go further, with a view to sustain more effectually, in practice, the axiom which divides the three great classes of power into independent constitutional checks. I would impose a provision rendering any member of Congress ineligible to office, under the General Government, during the term for which he was elected, and for two years thereafter, except in cases of judicial office; and these I would except, for the reason that vacancies in this department are not frequent occurrences, and because no barrier should be interposed in selecting to the bench men of the first talents and integrity. Their trusts and duties being of the most responsible kind, the widest possible range should be permitted, that judicious and safe selections might be made. The politician may err, yet his error may be presently retrieved, and no considerable injury result; but with judges, particularly in the last resort, error is fatal, because without a remedy.

"The effect of such a constitutional provision is obvious. By it Congress, in a considerable degree, would be free from that connexion with the executive department which at present gives strong ground for apprehension and jealousy on the part of the people. Members, instead of being liable to be withdrawn from legislating on the great interests of the nation through prospects of executive patronage, would be more liberally confided in by their constituents, while their vigilance would be less interrupted by party feelings and party excitements. Calculations from intrigue and management would fail, nor would their deliberations or their investigations of subjects consume so much time. The morals of the country would be improved, and virtue, uniting with the labors of the representatives, and with the official ministers of the law, would tend to perpetuate the honor and glory of the Government.

"But if this change in the constitution should not be obtained, and important appointments continue to devolve on the representatives in Congress, it requires no depth of thought to be convinced that corruption will become the order of the day, and that, under the garb of conscientious sacrifices to establish precedents for the public good, evils of serious importance to the freedom and prosperity of the republic may arise. It is through this channel that the people may expect to be attacked in their constitutional sovereignty, and where tyranny may well be apprehended to spring up in some favorable emergency. Against such inroads every guard ought to be interposed, and none better occurs than that of closing the suspected avenue with some necessary constitutional restriction. We know human nature to be prone to evil; we are early taught to pray that we may not be led into temptation; and hence the opinion that, by constitutional provision, all avenues to temptation on the part of our political servants should be closed."

Here the nation is informed that the power of the President to appoint members of Congress to office is the channel through which tyranny will approach, through which corruption will creep, by which the representatives of the people will be seduced to abandon the posts assigned them by their constituents, by which the legislative power will be brought in base submission to executive dictation, by which corruption will be the order of the day.

The annunciation of these great and important truths by General Jackson, while he was electioneering for the presidency, made a powerful impression on the public mind; and he was elected to make an alteration in the practice of the Government, and a change in the constitution, by which the people would be shielded from the danger of having the fountain of the legislative power poisoned with corruption.

I will here call the attention of the House to another document, as a practical commentary upon the foregoing professions. It is an official report of the Register of the Treasury of the amount of money which has been drawn from the Treasury by members of Congress who have received their appointments from the present Chief Magistrate, which reads in the following words and figures:

VOL. XII.—182

It will be seen by the foregoing paper that the same members of Congress have received two, and, in some instances, three, important appointments. In addition to the list in the above report, three other members of Congress have been appointed to office: the Hon. J. M. Wayne, to be a judge of the Supreme Court—the Hon. Andrew Stevenson, to be minister to England—and the Hon. John H. Eaton, to be minister to Spain. So that, if the aggregate account was made out up to this time, it would appear that over five hundred and thirty thousand dollars of the people's money had been distributed among members of both Houses of Congress, in the form of salaries and outfits. It appears that the highest honors and emoluments of the nation have been constantly held up to glitter in their eyes.

It is thus that the prayer of our Lord and Saviour has been remembered; it is thus that the members of Congress have been kept out of temptation; it is thus that the channel of tyranny and corruption has been closed; it is thus that the purity of legislation has been preserved.

In pursuit of the principles of this administration, let us pass to the consideration of two other documents.

On the 24th of February, 1825, (see the Senate journal, page 194,) as a member of the Senate, General Jackson voted for a subscription of stock on the part of this Government, to aid in the completion of the Dismal Swamp canal, and on the same day he voted for the passage of the bill authorizing a subscription of stock in the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company. In the year 1828, the General, being a candidate for the presidency, and there being great anxiety in the Western country to know certainly his principles in regard to internal improvements, (this anxiety arose from the fact that, from the commencement of the Government, the revenues of the country had been expended on the seaboard, and every Western interest had been neglected,) the election of a Western President was looked to as an event that would bring the protection and blessings of the Government to all parts of the Union. That there might not remain any doubt on the subject, Governor Ray, of the State of Indiana, at the instance of the Senate of that State, addressed a letter of inquiry to General Jackson, and on the 28th day of February, 1828, the General sent his answer to the Governor and Senate; an extract from which reads in these words:

"I pray you, sir, respectfully to state to the Senate of Indiana that my opinions at present are precisely what they were in 1823-24, when they were communicated by letter to Dr. Coleman, of North Carolina, and when I voted for the present tariff, and appropriations for internal improvements."

This letter, throughout the West, was considered as removing every doubt, and the vote of that country was given upon the faith of the positive pledge it contained. This pledge was redeemed by the veto of the Maysville road bill, and the veto of the bill for the benefit of the Louisville canal—redeemed, by depriving Kentucky of the appropriations voted by the Congress of the United States, and by consenting to pour out millions at every session for internal improvements in other more favored parts of the United States, under the very same clauses of the constitution upon which any grant of money for the benefit of Kentucky was refused.

In the veto of the bill for the benefit of the Louisville canal, we are informed that "positive experience, and a more thorough consideration of the subject, have convinced me (the President) of the impropriety as well as inexpediency of such investments."

Here we have an example to weaken the ties which bind together representative and constituent. What right has a representative to change his opinions in regard to principles which he was pledged to support before his election? But it was necessary to break the force of the shock which this disappointment caused in the West.

Public Lands.

This purpose was accomplished in the message of 1829, in which the country was informed that, after the payment of the public debt, there would remain a large surplus in the Treasury, which could be applied to purposes of internal improvements, so as to avoid the objections which had been made to the system. The President says: "To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their ratio of representation; and, should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it."

This view revived the hopes of the West, believing that, on the extinguishment of the national debt, the surplus revenue would be divided among the States. But when the time came for realizing this new promise, and the Congress of the United States, by almost two thirds of each House, passed a law to divide the proceeds of the public lands among the States, it was met by another veto. When this promise was made, there was no surplus then to divide; now, when there is a surplus of thirty millions, we hear no more of the safe, just, and federal apportionment among the several States; but we are now urged to add the whole to the expenses of the Federal Government.

The principles of this administration are not to be found in the recorded votes on the Senate journal, or in the letter to Governor Ray, or in the message of 1829. In his inaugural address on the 4th of March, 1829, the President expresses himself thus:

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform; which will require particularly the correction of abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections."

Here we have the promulgation of a principle upon which the very existence of a representative Government depends. For it is evident that, if the power and patronage of the General Government were brought into conflict with the freedom of elections, the freedom of opinion in the exercise of the elective franchise must perish, and the ballot-box become a mere form to carry out the decrees of power. It is in the power of the General Government with the public money to buy up the public press, and make it a false witness between the rulers and the people. It is in the power of the General Government, through the agency of the public officers and the Treasury Department, to wield an influence over public opinion dangerous to the liberties of the country. The nation, therefore, look to this administration to keep its power at a distance from the polls, and leave the selection of public agents to the unbiased judgment of the people.

This great right of election was reserved by the people, to enable them to maintain their sovereignty. Whenever the exercise of this right shall cease to proceed from a free and virtuous people, and shall be guided and corrupted by the influence of the Federal Government, the power and freedom of the people are gone.

Sir, what is the present gloomy condition of our public affairs, in regard to this view of them? Have not the people every where beheld the federal officers bearing, with all their force, in perfect concert, on elections? Have we not seen them appointing electioneering meetings of the people, and holding political conventions to control public sentiment, and devoting their industry and their means to influence votes? Do we not see that thirty millions of the public money is now in a position where it can be easily brought into conflict with the freedom and purity of elections? Who is it that has of late run a political race on the side of power that does not feel conscious that he was lifted up and borne along by it? Who has run against this power that does not know at every step he was pulled back by it? That the whole power of the Federal Government is now exerted throughout the nation, with wakeful vigilance, to control the next election, is a matter of public notoriety. Does not the proclamation which has gone forth, that all the honors and revenues of the republic are lawful spoil, to be divided among the victors in the desperate scramble for power, avowedly bring the offices and treasure of the nation into the political market, to be bartered for votes and influence?

The principles of this administration are not found in the inaugural address of the 4th of March, 1829.

None of the professions of this administration have attracted more of public attention than those which related to the suppression of paper money and the extension of a metallic currency. Under these professions, what has been accomplished? The administration struck down the best currency in the world, of equal value in all parts of the Union—everywhere preferred to gold and silver. The bank that issued this currency was the only means ever discovered by which the State banks could be checked and regulated, and the currency preserved sound, and the constitutional power of the General Government to fix the standard of value maintained—a means that had received the sanction of Washington and Madison, and its benefits established by the experience of half a century. Since the overthrow of this long-tried system, upon which all commercial relations reposed in security, in place of a currency of the precious metals, the following statement will show the wretched condition of the currency, and the alarming increase of paper money called into existence by the influence of the General Government:

In 1832, there were in the United States 330 banks.
Circulation, - - - - -	$61,000,000
Aggregate capital, - - - - -	145,000,000

In 1835, there were 604 banks.
Capital, - - - - -	400,000,000
Notes in circulation, probably, - - - - -	200,000,000

So that, since the delusion was got up about gold and silver, banks and bank notes and paper money have more than doubled. Since the prostration of the bank that could hold the local institutions in check, the States seem to be moving forward with a spirit of controversy which shall deluge the land with the deepest and broadest sluices of paper money. And thus, in violation of the spirit of the constitution, the power of regulating the currency is given up to local banks, and we are thrown back into all the evils of depreciated bills of credit, against which it was one of the main objects of the constitution to guard.

All men of forecast know that, upon the first great reverse in our commercial relations, we are destined again to experience all the train of calamities which will flow from the depreciation of the millions of paper money now in the hands of the people. They know that labor will again be robbed of its earnings, and the property of the people sacrificed at public auction.

The appearance of things at present is delusive. The exorbitant prices of property are not signs of real health and vigor in the body politic; they are rather delusive symptoms of a bloated plethora.

In the face of existing appearances to the contrary, I warn my friends and my constituents, and my country, to be prepared, as well as they can, for the realities that lie behind the present temporary delusion.

Mr. Speaker, permit me here to digress from the consideration of our domestic affairs for a few minutes, for the purpose of inquiring what are the principles of this administration in regard to its intercourse with foreign nations.

Public Lands.

Although the unfortunate difference with France is settled, yet there are some views in relation to it which ought never to be forgotten. In the year 1830, the French Government took offence at a passage of the President's message to Congress in 1829, which was construed to be disrespectful to France. It was then determined by the administration that a difference so trivial, proceeding from a misunderstanding, should not interrupt the friendly relations with our ancient ally that stood by us in the darkest days of the Revolution, and that it should not interfere with or suspend the pending negotiation.

Mr. Rives, our minister at the French court, promptly explained the President's message in a satisfactory manner, and communicated the result to his Government; and the following extract of a note from Mr. Van Buren, then Secretary of State, to Mr. Rives, by order of the President, will show how well satisfied he was with the explanation which Mr. Rives had given to the French Government of his message of 1829:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, April 2, 1830.

"SIR: Your several despatches, to No. 14, inclusive, have been received at this Department, and submitted to the President. He approves fully of your reply to the observations of Prince Polignac in regard to portions of his message to Congress which refer to the state of our affairs with France. It contains, as far as it goes, a fair exposition of his sentiments upon the point alluded to."

But as it is customary among civilized nations, in friendship and peace, to treat each other with marked respect, even in their official communications between departments of the same Government; and lest the impression should still remain in France, that the President intended a menace in his message of 1829, and the negotiation thereby be injured, Mr. Van Buren, under the orders of the President, gave a still more ample explanation of the message of 1829 to the French Government, as fully appears by the following extract of a letter to our minister at the French court:

"The friendly predilections which have so long existed between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of his Most Christian Majesty; the unceasing endeavors of this Government to place the relations of the two countries upon the footing of a still more friendly and mutually beneficial intercourse; the liberality displayed by the United States, in not pressing upon France, in the hour of her difficulties, the immediate discharge of her responsibilities to our citizens; the undeviating delicacy with which they have presented their claims in the season of prosperity, and the patience with which they have awaited the result, are considerations which should dissuade the King of France from too readily construing into a tone of menace the frank, but not unfriendly, language in which the President has expressed the sentiments of the Government and people of the United States. The President has no desire nearer his heart than that of preserving the most harmonious relations with all the world, but particularly with his Majesty the King of France. It was to enable him more certainly to obtain the fulfilment of the first wish of his heart, that he called the national attention, in a spirit of regret and apprehension, to the possible consequences of a protracted continuation of the present untoward state of things. A brave and generous mind never assumes an attitude of menace, as long as any thing can be hoped from a love of justice and a regard to the rights of others. On neither of these, as motives, on the part of his Most Christian Majesty, to a fair adjustment of this most fruitful source of misunderstanding between the two countries, has the President ever entertained a doubt."

In 1835 there again occurred the same difficulty. The French King understood the President's message to Congress in 1834 to charge his Government with bad faith, and as placing this Government in a menacing attitude towards that of France. The President admitted, without reserve, that, in his message of 1834, he did not intend to charge the French Government with bad faith, or to make any threat, or to convey any affront whatever, but that he would not explain this misunderstanding to France.

In the progress of the negotiation between the two nations, the controversy was at last narrowed down to the mere misunderstanding as to a passage in the message of 1834. And upon this point it was decided to devote this nation to the hazards of war, rather than say to the French Government it had placed a meaning on the message which the President admitted he did not intend to give it.

The following are the positions taken in 1835 by this Government:

1st. That a foreign Government, in its intercourse with our own, has no right to take any notice whatever of any communication made by the President to Congress in the discharge of his official duties, and, consequently, no right to demand an explanation of the purport of any such message, whatever imputations it may contain, and however offensive and imperious its terms may seem.

2d. That to give or offer such explanations would be to admit the right to claim them, and that such an admission, by subjecting the Executive, in the discharge of a constitutional duty, to the interference and control of a foreign Power, would be inconsistent with the character and dignity of our Government, and a virtual sacrifice of the national honor and independence.

This principle, that a foreign nation should not be permitted to inquire into the meaning of a message of the President to Congress, was held to be so vital, so connected with our national independence, that it was said in debate here by one in confidence, [MR. CAMBRELENG,] that, if the nation was flowing in blood from Maine to Orleans, the misunderstanding with France would not be explained.

The misunderstanding of 1830 and 1835, occurring between the same nations, upon a point in all respects precisely similar, was in the first case freely explained; and in the last, war was deemed preferable to explanation. Whether the administration was right in 1830 or 1835, I will not undertake here to decide; but every candid man must see that if the same course had been pursued in the last instance that there was in the first, there would have been no occasion to break the ancient friendship between America and France with any talk of war. Whether the case of 1830 or that of 1835 will be regarded in Europe or America as containing the principle of this administration in regard to the subject, no one can tell, as the two cases were alike and the decisions opposite.

In 1830 a French treaty was very much desired, and it was very popular, and was made to cut a great figure in the elections of that time. In 1835 there was a large surplus in the Treasury, and the money and the apparent necessity for fleets and armies were well calculated to induce the nation to consent to such an increase of expenditures as would place the surplus under the control of the Federal Government, and defeat the division of any portion of it among the States.

Sir, I will now return from this foreign digression to our domestic concerns again.

The present dominant party owes its elevation to power more to the promise to retrench the expenses of the Government than to any other cause. This string was struck oftener in the canvass from 1825 to 1829 than any other. "The party," before they came into power, and when they were seeking votes, told the people of this country that the expenditures of the Federal Government were prodigally, dangerously, wastefully extravagant; and that, if they were invested with power, they would speedily introduce such a system of reform and retrenchment as would bring back the Government to the Jeffersonian economy. The people believed these representations, and put their faith in these solemn pledges of reform; which were a thousand times repeated.

"The party" being snugly seated in power, these pledges were soon forgotten. We have seen seven years glide away, and the first effective movement for retrenchment has not yet been made. In place of retrenchment, we have, during these seven years, seen annual millions added to the wide-spread extravagance of the public expenses. Sir, in my remarks, I intend to rely upon no facts except those that are established by documents that none can question. What I am about to state in regard to the public expenses is taken from a report made to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Woodbury, on the 4th day of January, 1836, and which I now hold in my hand. This report shows the annual expenses of the Government from 1816 to 1834, inclusive; this, together with the estimates in the last annual report of the same Secretary for the years 1835 and 1836, shows the expenses of this administration, provided the appropriation bills conform to the estimates. The following tabular statement, extracted from said report, shows the annual and total expenditures for the eight years of this administration, from 1829 to 1836, inclusive, contrasted with the annual and total expenditures of the preceding eight years, from 1820 to 1828, including the four last years, eight years of Mr. Monroe's administration, and the four years of Mr. Adams's, showing also the amount paid annually of the public debt during both terms:

This is the amount of the increase of the public expenditures from 1829 to 1836, over the preceding eight years.

Amount of public debt paid from 1821 to 1828, $84,337,986 34.

Amount of public debt paid from 1829 to 1836, $65,583,562 15; making the amount paid from 1821 to 1828, $18,754,424 19 more than the payments from 1829 to 1836.

But the people have been told that the reason why the expenses of the Government were so much increased of late was because the present administration had paid off so much of the public debt more than had been previously paid in the same space of time. So far from this being true, the foregoing table shows that there had been paid in the eight preceding years $18,754,424 19 more than during this administration; yet we have seen public festivals and rejoicings upon the point of the transcendent merit of having paid the public debt.

In regard to the payment of the public debt, no President, since the year 1817, deserves either praise or censure, more than the man in the moon.

Those who passed the law of 1817, for the redemption of the public debt, and the people of the United States, whose industry and enterprise filled the public Treasury, deserve all the credit for the payment of the debt.

Although it is not in place, I will here present a view that will show that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands should be taken from the control of this Government. Under our revenue system, the money power is almost irresponsible. The price of the public lands not being paid by the people in the form of a tax, their attention is not sufficiently directed to the subject to hold their representatives accountable how they use it. This administration presents a signal instance of the truth of what I say; they are held to no responsibility for substituting an increase of the public expenditures of over forty-five millions of dollars, in place of retrenchment, while they are dividing the public treasure as spoils among favorites. In the triumphs of present impunity, they can securely laugh at the simplicity of all those who believed that there was any thing serious in their promises of retrenchment and reform.

This signal instance of escape from public censure proves that our redundant income is paid under such circumstances that it can be squandered by a successful party in contempt of all the maxims of economy. By dividing the public treasure among a sufficient number of partisans, exemption from responsibility can be secured. The only cure for this evil, the only way to restore accountability, is to take the control of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands out of the hands of this central power, and give them to the States.

The principles of this administration are not to be found in retrenchment, in the economical management of the public finances. So far, professions and practices have run in directions exactly opposite.

I will now refer to two other documents, which do contain the principle, with a view to which this administration has been conducted, and by the aid of which it has attained its dangerous ascendancy. These principles were imported from one of the States, where they had been tested; and, since their adoption as the basis of federal action, have already wrought a revolution in the theory and practice of our Government.

We are informed by the President, in his veto of the land bill, that "money is power!" and we are informed by him, in his protest, that "the whole executive power being vested in the President, who is responsible for its exercise, it is a necessary consequence that he should have the right to employ agents of his own choice."

Again: he says in the same paper, speaking of the Secretary of the Treasury, "that he was an executive officer, the mere instrument of the Chief Magistrate in the execution of the laws."

From these explicit declarations that "money is power," and that the executive officers of this nation are the mere instruments of the President, the principles are revealed which have been the basis of that extraordinary ascendancy to which all the checks of the constitution have opposed so feeble a resistance.

By the original theory and practice under our constitution, the public officers were held to be the agents of the people, bound to discharge their duty according to law, and in the selection of whom regard should be had only to integrity and qualifications; and to remove any one of whom, for opinion's sake, by the Chief Magistrate, would be good cause of impeachment. But now, when they are no longer deemed agents of the people, but the mere instruments of the Executive; when they are no longer bound to discharge their offices according to law, but are required to yield obedience to the will of the President; when their continuance in office no longer depends on able and faithful service to the country, but upon unconditional submission to the dictates of power, the character of our Government is changed, and a distinct and rival interest is established between the public officers and the people; the entire agency by which the whole operations of the Government are conducted is thus brought under the control of one man.

The first effort to bring the money power into the same hand was displayed in the proposition to establish a national bank, as an instrument of the Treasury, upon a capital of public money. The next was seen in the endeavors to subject the Bank of the United States to governmental dictation.

These schemes having failed, and the complete control of the money power having been resolved on, the responsibility was taken, and the public money seized, and is now under the control of no law, placed where the representatives of the people have no power to go and examine whether it be safe or unsafe, or whether it be used for lawful or unlawful purposes. The vast revenues of this republic, between the times of collection and disbursement, are used at the discretion of a single mind. At this moment over thirty millions of dollars, the property of the people, are, through the instrumentality of deposit banks, loaned out, to whom we have no means of knowing, and for what design we can only conjecture. By making a call for the public deposits, the Secretary could crush any of these deposit banks any day he chooses; this gives a control over the capital of the States, as well as that of the nation. The power wielded in the Federal Treasury can put up and put down banks at pleasure. It can regulate the price of stocks and property; it can enrich friends and impoverish enemies. It can send millions into a State or city before an election, to be used, without interest, to reward obedience, or it can withdraw millions to punish disobedience. The Treasury of the United States is the great central fulcrum that sustains the levers by which ambitious aspirants are raised to power.

There are other views which show more clearly the length and breadth, and height and depth, of the all-gulfing power of money. The President having the appointment of the agency by which the Government is conducted, has, of course, the selection of the hands into which the public treasure shall flow; which enables him to make all officers, and all seekers of office, his "mere instruments."

The power derivable from the use of money was not anticipated at the adoption of the constitution. The Treasury was then empty; and in those good old times of honest simplicity, even the sagacious mind of Patrick Henry did not foresee that the use of money would become the principal element in that executive power which he predicted would destroy the liberty of his country. Thus the money power has been matured and organized, not by the President, not for his use, for his fame was enough for him, but by others under the shade of his military reputation; by a far-reaching sagacity has this golden ladder been erected, upon which they are to climb to greatness in time to come. The operations of the money power have produced effects before which the world has stood astonished; because the secret springs and principles of action were carefully concealed from the public eye. Throughout, we have seen professions and practices running in opposite directions; and yet we have heard the shout of applause as loud for the breach as for the promise. Hence the saying that "the popularity of General Jackson can stand any thing." It is the power to bestow money and office that can stand any thing. General Jackson's power ends on the 4th of March next, but the money power is to be transferred to other hands, where it will continue to do its work. When our venerable President descends from his exaltation, he will see human nature as it is. Of the thronging thousands that revolved in servility around his power, he will find how many crooked their knees for thrift, and how many out of respect for him.

This money power, shielded from all responsibility, from all public inspection, pervading the whole Union, operating upon all interests, brought to bear upon the hopes and fears of millions, is the most ingenious contrivance that was ever devised by the wit of man; and is sweeping along in its wake the right of suffrage, the freedom of the press, State and national legislation.

The declaration that "money is power" is most true, alarmingly true. All the hopes of the friends of human liberty, that free government could be maintained, were reposed upon having its operations conducted by officers of integrity and capacity, who were devoted to the people, and not to power. It is impossible that free government can last unless its affairs be managed by such agents.

Having ascertained the principles and the means by which federal power is making its rapid marches over the ruins of the constitution, the question is, whether we shall take away from it the money, which is the bone and sinew of its strength, and give it to the people, to build up their rights and restore their ancient and constitutional power in the Government.

Having disposed of the preliminary inquiry into the present character and tendencies of federal power, I will now proceed to the investigation of the main question, What shall be done with the surplus revenue?

At this very interesting point of our history, when it is our duty to make a new movement which will vitally affect the dearest interests of our country for many years to come, we surely ought to rise above present or mere party considerations, and look at the future consequences which will in all probability result from the adoption of each of the three plans which have been suggested of disposing of the public money. I will now proceed to consider them in order.

1. As to the propriety of leaving the surplus to accumulate from year to year in the Treasury, and be disposed of as it now is, according to the discretion of the Executive. Some of our ablest calculators tell us that, by January next, there will be fifty millions, and certainly, if unused and unwasted, it would in a few years amount to hundreds of millions. It is evident that, so soon as the amount exceeded all the specie in the United States, every State bank would be in the power of the Treasury, and this system must soon make them all instruments of the Treasury. The political uses and abuses to which the Government could devote these vast sums have already been very briefly noticed. This view of the subject presents to the minds of the friends of a cheap and a pure republican Government anticipations the most gloomy. But, sir, in addition to the political objections to this employment of the public money, there are others entitled to grave consideration.

It is now most evident that the condition of the public treasure is unsafe. Our revenue is collected in the notes of a great number of State banks, which, in all probability, in the first commercial shock, will become valueless, as they did heretofore. There is of the public funds now deposited in the thirty-five local banks, $30,678,879 91 They have of private deposits, $15,043,033 64; and notes in circulation, $26,243,688 36. Making, in all, $71,965,000 91, and but $10,198,659 24 of specie—about $7 of debt to $1 of specie. There is now due to the Government alone from these banks more than three times the amount of their specie.

The following aggregates exhibit the condition of the thirty-five deposit banks on the 1st February:

Loans & discounts, $65,439,908	Capital, -	$42,356,088

Sir, what will the people of this country say when they come to understand these facts, and see the present hazardous condition of their money? Would any prudent man risk his own money under such circumstances? If it would be madness for a man to act so in private life, is it not something more than madness for the servants of the people to act so with their money? In a trust capacity public agents are surely bound to act with as much care as a prudent man would with his own.

But it is not at all improbable that the condition of the people's money is far worse than appears from the reports of these banks. How do we know that these reports are true? We have not the power to examine these banks, and count their money. We know that the deposit banks formerly robbed the Treasury of millions, and made reports that they were safe up to the hour of explosion. Who ever knew a bank that intended to break to apprise the public of it beforehand?

But, sir, mystery is stamped upon the front of this report. These thirty-five pet banks, in counting up their means to pay their debts, say they have $8,777,228 79 in "other investments"—but they have concealed from the public what they mean by "other investments." But the friends of these banks contend that, although they have not the means in hand to pay the public deposits, yet, by calling on their debtors, they could pay. A call upon their debtors for the amount of the public deposits, upon a sudden emergency, would make an earthquake in the whole paper system of the United States. But we have no means of knowing whether the persons who have borrowed the people's money from these pet banks are either able or willing to pay. I never have known a bank that was managed for political purposes that did not sooner or later break, and unless we speedily reclaim the public treasure, and place it in the custody of the law, millions of it will be lost. But, sir, the loss of the whole would do much less public mischief than will be done by leaving it where it is, to be used as it is.

But there is another objection to this mode of using the public money, arising from the injustice of the distribution. The public revenue is used as a banking capital; and while the city of New York has the benefit of ten millions, and the Territory of Michigan over a million and a half, which it seems is principally loaned out in New York and Albany, the State of Kentucky has not the use of a dollar in such way as to contribute to the general utility. It is true that a small bank in Louisville has a small sum; but this bank issues no notes, and the circulating medium is not thereby increased. The interest on $30,000,000 is $1,800,000 per annum, which is given in spoils to favorites; the people deriving not one cent of interest for the use of their money, and running a great risk of losing the principal. The two banks in Michigan have both together but a capital of $569,779 99, and of specie but $97,902 33; yet it seems that, during the year 1835, more than three millions of the public money has passed through their hands. And it seems that they are in the habit of loaning out the public moneys in the cities of New York and Albany for profit. The money of the people has been taken from the custody of the law, and used, regardless of all the maxims of prudence for its safety, and with equal disregard to justice in its distribution. Yes, at this moment the money of the people of Kentucky, which they have earned by honest industry, is loaned out, gratis, to the shavers, and brokers, and speculators, and gamblers in stocks, in the city of New York and elsewhere. Every motive should impel us to pass a law promptly to restore to the people, upon the principles of justice and equality, the use of their own money, and thereby rescue it from hazard, and our institutions from corruption.

2. The second plan of disposing of the thirty millions is to increase the expenses of the Federal Government to that amount, in extensive military preparations; in the raising of armies, and in the construction of fortifications, and the building of a navy.

To induce us to agree to a scheme of national defence, upon a scale much more extensive than has ever been deemed safe by any American statesman, we are emphatically reminded, since the war cloud has blown away, of the maxim, "in peace, provide for war;" and now, for the first time, we are urged to proceed immediately to lay the foundation of a system of preparation for war large enough to exhaust all our present and future means. I desire to know precisely in what sense and to what extent it is proposed to reduce this maxim to practice. In legislation, as in all the active business of life, there is but little information communicated by the reassertion of those general truths to which, in the abstract form, all men agree, because there is such a diversity in applying them so as to suit the condition of individuals and nations; that, in their abstract form, they convey no distinct idea to the mind. For example, the maxim that is now so earnestly pressed upon our attention, "that peace is the proper season to prepare for war," is sustained by general acquiescence. Yet there are no two nations that act upon this maxim alike. It is limited, or extended, or modified, so as to suit the institutions and condition of each nation, and the genius of the age.

In different ages, according as the spirit of peace or war happened to pervade the earth, we find the same nations varying the size of their navies and armies, to suit the condition of the times.

The maxim, that in time of peace nations should provide for war, as it is understood and practised in Europe at this time, so far as a standing military force is concerned, is exhibited in the following statements:

	Troops.		Troops.
France,	400,000	Netherlands,	77,500
Belgium,	110,000	Spain,	71,300
Great Britain,	100,000	Prussia,	222,000

Wurtemberg,	10,000	Hanover,	12,000
Hesse Darmstadt,	8,000	Baden,	8,000
Norway and Sweden,	50,000

The population of the above States is supposed to amount to 103,045,700 souls; which, if correct, would give 11 soldiers to every 1,000 souls.

Assuming the free population of the United States to be 15,000,000, the proportion of soldiers of the present army is a fraction less than 1 to every 2,000 souls. Compared with the levy of troops on the population of the European States, it is as 1 to 22.

Total amount of Russian forces is 803,000.

Thus in Europe it is deemed consistent with the genius of monarchical Governments, taken in connexion with the fact that numerous kingdoms are compacted together with adjoining boundaries, liable at any time to sudden invasions, to keep always ready to march at a moment's warning, a strong army, and to maintain powerful navies. But sir, in America, the understanding of the maxim under consideration has been very different. Separated from the old world by an ocean three thousand miles wide, and having no powerful nation in our neighborhood, our geographical position renders a large standing force unnecessary. But that there may be no mistake about a matter so important, we will look into American history to collect the American sense upon the subject of armies, and fleets, and fortifications. At the commencement of General Washington's administration, the regular army was reduced to 1,216. In the time of the elder Adams, by the act of 27th April, 1798, the army was increased to 4,159. The act of May 28th, 1798, authorizes a provisional army of 10,000. In Mr. Jefferson's administration, the army was, by the act of March 16, 1802, reduced to 3,287.

The aggregate of the present army of the United States is 7,198. Aggregate of the navy, 52 ships.

After the experience we had in the late war, a system was adopted in 1816, for the gradual increase of the navy, and for the construction of fortifications, which system has been ever since pursued. Since the year 1816, we have expended, in fortifications, about fourteen millions of dollars; and for the increase and repairs of the navy, the sum of $22,092,287 73.

The whole military establishment, since 1816, has cost the sum of $133,273,415 75. In the same time, the whole naval establishment has cost $66,898,681 96. This, as it appears to me, is going fast enough. This progressive system will grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength, and will keep us supplied with a navy sufficiently large and fortifications sufficiently numerous. This progressive system of improving our national defences can be carried on without any increase in the annual expenses of the Government, and leave thirty millions in the Treasury for other uses. The present expenditures are now as great as can be used. We have a report from the proper Department that there is remaining in the Treasury eight million unexpended of former appropriations; we are officially informed that hands cannot be found and employed in the United States to exhaust the appropriations that are now annually made for the public works. Then where is the utility in making large appropriations, which are to remain unexpended? Such appropriations may defeat the passage of the land bill, but they will not advance the public works.

In further illustration of the American understanding of how far it is prudent to provide for war during peace, let us see what General Jackson has said on the subject, a man renowned for his warlike achievements, and who may be supposed as friendly to strong national defences as any American statesman ought to be. In his inaugural address on the 4th of March, 1829, he lays down his creed in regard to our military peace establishment in the following words: "Considering standing armies as dangerous to free Governments in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment."

And in his first message to Congress in 1829, he says: "In time of peace we have need of no more ships of war than are requisite to the protection of our commerce. Those not wanted for this object must lie in the harbors, where, without proper covering, they rapidly decay; and, even under the best precautions for their preservation, must soon become useless. Such is already the case with many of our finest vessels; which, though unfinished, will now require immense sums of money to be restored to the condition in which they were when committed to their proper element. On this subject there can be but little doubt that our best policy would be to discontinue the building of ships of the first and second class, and look rather to the possession of ample materials, prepared for the emergencies of war, than to the number of our vessels which we can float in a season of peace, as the index of our naval power. Judicious deposits, in navy yards, of timber and other materials, fashioned under the hands of skilful workmen, and fitted for prompt application to their various purposes, would enable us at all times to construct vessels as fast as they can be manned, and save the heavy expense of repairs, except to such vessels as must be employed in guarding our commerce."

In two subsequent messages the propriety of keeping a navy afloat in time of peace only sufficient to protect our commerce is maintained, and the propriety of accumulating timber in the navy yards is enforced, in place of building new ships. From all which it appears that, in the judgment of General Jackson, no provision should be made for the extension of our peace establishment; that our navy was sufficiently powerful for the protection of our commerce, and that it was better to lay up timber than to build new ships.

From this view we can collect the sense of this nation as to how far we should go in peace to provide for war.

The American practice, which was established and has been sustained by all the patriots and sages who have gone before us, was not in reference only to our geographical position in the world in regard to other nations, but was mainly produced by the warning voice of history, by which we are taught that the instances are very few where nations have been conquered by foreign invasion, but very numerous where their liberty has been overthrown by their own rulers; that the liberty of nations is in far greater danger from their own powerful fleets and armies, with a Cæsar at their head, than from all foreign enemies combined.

Now, the question is, whether we shall, under the temporary impulses of party excitement, abandon the American and adopt the European system of providing for war during peace? Whether republican America shall raise her military peace establishment to come in competition with the establishments of the monarchies of the old world?

But, sir, if it were wise to apply our whole resources to the public defences, the extension of the fortification system is not the best for the attainment of the object. The extent of our country renders it impossible to resist foreign invasion by means of fortifications. The maritime frontier of the United States, from Passamaquoddy to the mouth of the Sabine, following the shores, is over six thousand miles, one third of which belongs to the Gulf of Mexico; the northern and lake frontier three thousand miles more. This, added to the almost boundless western frontier, makes it apparent that, if the whole surplus produce of the labor of the people of the United States was forced from them in taxes, it would not fortify this vast empire so as to protect it from invasion. And if we had fortifications ready made, on convenient points, on the whole frontier, it would require a standing army of several hundred thousand to man them and preserve them. The number of fortifications, from necessity, must be limited to the defence of the cities and the exposed points. The number of fortifications already projected is greater than was required. Fortunately for the nation, it has in its power means of defence more cheap and more efficient. The bulwarks of our liberty are to be found in the hearts of a brave people, and not in the stone and mortar of forts. The bravery of a gallant people, in defence of their homes and their country, has carried us successfully and gloriously through two wars with the most powerful nation in the world. The rational means of national defence for such a people in time of peace, is to protect them by wise and equal laws, and to lighten their burdens by a cheap and pure administration of the Government, so that they may prosper and grow in strength, and power, and intelligence, and in wealth, so that their confidence in the Government may be established. All the enemies of freedom combined could not conquer such a people so governed. On the contrary, an extensive military establishment, which would oppress the people with heavy taxes, would check their spirit; would paralyze their industry; would wear away their attachment for the Government; would, in the end, change the national character, and prepare the way for a Bonaparte, at the head of the national guards.

There is a mode of expenditure more efficient for the attainment of the object than is to be found in standing armies and in fortifications. In an extensive country the success of modern war depends upon the celerity with which armies and supplies can be conveyed from place to place. And as the strength of this vast nation, in men and means, must forever remain in the interior, and not on the frontiers—in the heart, and not in the extremities—the great means of military defence is to be found in the construction of roads along which men and provisions can be thrown to meet danger, wherever it may approach the borders. For example, if there were a railroad from Lexington to Charleston, supplies of men, and arms, and cannon, and provisions, could be conveyed along the whole line in a few days, and the enemy met and repelled before he had time to do mischief. In this view of the subject is not a road, with a view to military defence, better than a fort? Say at Charleston there was an impregnable fortress, an enemy, of course, would not land within the range of its guns. He would keep at a respectful distance, and advance upon undefended places. Upon ordinary roads it would require months to move an army and heavy military munitions from the interior to Charleston, in South Carolina, to meet the foe. In this view, which is the best means of national defence, forts on the frontier, or railroads, like veins and arteries, leading from the heart to the extremities of the body politic? While this is the most efficient, it is the cheapest possible mode of providing for war. The cost of transportation on ordinary roads, during the revolutionary and late war, is more than would construct roads, on the modern plan, wherever required in the United States. The cause which retarded the military operations in the late war, and kept our brave soldiers so often in a state of starvation, and exposed so many of them to slaughter, was the difficulty of supplying them by the modes of conveyance then in use.

But, sir, this mode of providing for war, by furnishing the means of rapid and cheap conveyance of men and supplies from one part of our extensive country to another, stands in favorable contrast with all other modes of providing for war, in several important views. Standing armies and fortifications are worse than useless in time of peace; they eat up annually millions of the industry of the people. But roads are alike useful in peace and war. In war they enable us to throw our power promptly to all places menaced with danger. In peace they furnish the means of rapid and cheap conveyance of the surplus products of industry to all the markets of the world. Money, and the means of sustaining armies, are the essential elements in modern war. Roads, by the commercial facilities which they would furnish in time of peace, would enrich the nation, and enable it to stand up under the burdens of war.

Then, sir, looking at this subject alone in its military aspect, I would reserve enough of our surplus treasure to strengthen and build up this great arm of national defence—the means of rapid transportation in war, and the means of enriching the nation in peace.

The next objection which I shall urge against the scheme of applying the whole income to the construction of ships and forts is, that it violates a great fundamental principle of public policy—a principle which has heretofore, in the administration of the finances, been disregarded, to the great injury of the Western country. The principle is this: as the public revenue is collected from all the people of the nation, in its disbursement it should be returned to the parts of the country from which it has been drawn, with as great a regard to equality as a due attention to the aggregate interest of the public will allow. I agree with my friend from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] that the duties on foreign merchandise are paid by the consumers. I agree that, in the disbursement of the public money, the preponderance of the general good, and not the incidental benefit, should be the criterion. But I disagree with him that, in the expenditure of the public money, the incidental advantages should weigh nothing. It is true that the construction of a fortification in Kentucky, merely to secure the people the incidental advantage of the expenditure, would be ridiculous. But it would be equally ridiculous to make a road along the margin of the sea for the sake of the incidental benefit. It has pleased God so to form our extensive country, so to diversify the interests of different sections, that the enlightened statesman, in the conduct of our public affairs, will never find the general and incidental advantages of the Government to come in conflict. When the improvements are made which nature indicates should be on the frontier and in the interior, the general and local interests of the whole Union will be sustained; and the preponderance of general good will be found in harmony with the incidental advantages of an enlightened administration.

Now, sir, this scheme of devoting our whole means to the navy and fortifications will perpetuate and fasten upon the country the unjust policy of expending the whole revenue of the republic on the seaboard—a policy that has long prevailed, to exhaust the West to enrich the East.

Sir, let us pause here for a moment, to consider how the flagrantly unjust and partial expenditure of the public money on one side of the Union, for the support of only part of the great national interest, first took its rise, and how it has been continued. When the constitution went into operation, all the States then in existence were situated on the Atlantic ocean. That instrument (as was natural) received such constructions, and was reduced to practice so as to suit the then existing interests of the people. They then depended on foreign commerce for the exchange of the surplus products of their industry. To facilitate this foreign commerce, the system which has since cost the nation millions on millions was commenced, of making breakwaters, piers, improvement of bays, inlets, harbors, the mouths of rivers, and light-houses, &c. But, since the adoption of the constitution, the number of the States has doubled, or will, probably, in a few days; the nation has spread over the interior of the continent; an internal commerce has grown up far more valuable than the foreign commerce; yet there are still many good people in the old States who believe that ours is a salt-water constitution, and that it would be the most unconstitutional thing in the world to spend a dollar of the public money above the ebb and flow of the tides. Such, sir, is the force of old habits of thought, especially when interest happens to run in the same channel. The clause in the constitution which has been construed to confer the power on Congress to make improvements for the benefit of foreign commerce, reads in the following words: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Although the very same words are used in regard to foreign and domestic commerce, yet many of our Atlantic brethren, while they are willing to expend millions to protect, defend, and facilitate foreign commerce, believe it would be exceedingly unconstitutional to give a cent for the security and facility of interior commerce. But, sir, the time has arrived when this salt-water exposition of the constitution must give way to the progress of the national expansion. Our constitution was formed for the continent, and not for the seaboard. Its scope is sufficiently broad to comprehend within its beneficent provisions every part of our extended and extending country.

Sir, the present unjust scheme of confining the national defences to the building of ships and the erection of fortifications, and the application of our whole means to these objects, will perpetuate this old rotten partial system of expending all the public money on one side of the country. One reason why a system so revolting to reason, and so prostrative of justice, has been so long continued, is this: "money is power;" and this mode of partial expenditure, while it has exhausted the West, has so enriched the great cities on the seacoast, that they have acquired an undue influence upon the legislation of the country.

Since the year 1791 there has been very nearly a thousand millions of dollars collected from the people of this country, and expended by this central Government. Of this vast sum, the Western country has paid its full proportion; yet the people of that country have been doomed for near a half century to see their substance flow into the national Treasury, and from thence poured out in profusion along the maritime frontier.

To conclude this branch of the subject: I am opposed to voting all our means to a navy and forts, because it would be the adoption of a radical change in the policy of our Government, upon the spur of the occasion, without consulting the people; because it would lay the foundation of a large standing army, and bring heavy charges on the country; because the building of ships and forts is not the only nor the best way to provide for the national defence; because it would perpetuate a partial system of disbursing the public treasure, by giving it all to the seaboard; and because it would lead to such a vast increase of the expenses of the Government, and consequently to such an extension of its power and patronage, that our liberty would be rendered unsafe.

Having first reasoned to show that our revenue should not be suffered to accumulate in the Treasury; and, secondly, to prove that it should not all be expended on the seacoast, in ships and fortifications; I will now, in the third and last place, attempt to prove that so much of it as has arisen, and will arise, from the sales of the public lands, ought to be divided among the States. This plan stands recommended by the fact that it has been long and deliberately considered and approved by the people, it having at a former session passed both Houses of Congress by large majorities, and has received the approbation of many of the State Legislatures.

Sir, what is the state of the case? We now have in the Treasury $20,571,125 75, which has accrued from the sales of the public domain, (which is the common property of the people of the United States,) over and above the wants of the Federal Government. Now, the great question is, whether this large sum of money shall be divided among the States, to be expended under their own councils, for the improvement of the condition of the people; or shall it be added to the swelling flood of federal expenditure, to raise still higher federal power, and extend the range of federal patronage to a broader circumference? Shall the whole of our surplus revenue be thrown into the Maelstrom, the grand whirlpool of centrifugal extravagance, where it will draw after it the remaining barriers of freedom into the same gorge? These are the weighty questions on the decision of which hangs the fate of liberty. If the division among the States should take place, the following statement will show the proportion of each State of what is already in the Treasury:

	Federal population.	Share for each State.	15 p. c. to new States.	Total to new States.

It is estimated that the annual receipts from sales of the public domain will in future be ten millions of dollars. From this data a calculation can easily be made of the proportion of each State for any given number of years. If the land bill should pass, I have no doubt but the principle of it will become the permanent policy of the country. There is yet in the limits of the United States more than a thousand millions of acres of unsold land; it would supply ample funds for the States for centuries to come. What stupendous results might be produced upon the power, the agriculture, the commerce, the wealth, the comfort, the intelligence, and happiness of the people of the United States, by this application of their great public domain! This comprehensive, this all-pervading, this equal, this magnificent plan for the disposal of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, in practice a few years, would exhibit a degree of improvement in the United States surpassing all the nations of the earth. The modern system of constructing roads and improving rivers, with the full development of the power of steam, would bring the distant parts of the country so near together, that constant intercourse, mutual interest, and commercial exchanges, would mould the discordant parts into a homogeneous national character, which would be the best guarantee for the perpetuity of the Union, and the durability of American liberty.

While the interests of the whole country would harmoniously unite in this great measure, the Western country has a right especially to call aloud for its adoption, where, for reasons already given, the constitution has never been considered in full force. The present condition of the Treasury furnishes the means to extend the fostering care of the Government to all the great interests of the whole Union, and forever to wipe out the reproach of favoritism to one portion of the country, to the oppression of another. Kentucky, although entirely neglected heretofore, though deprived of a fair participation in the benefits of the Government, has never complained at sustaining her share of its burdens. A full proportion of the taxes has always been paid, and in the two wars more than her proportion of blood was shed for the general defence. Ever since the year 1791 she has looked on at a partial administration of the public finances, by which her substance has been drawn away, and devoted to improvements in which she had only a remote and consequential interest. And while the public money has been thus disposed of, what disposition has been made of large portions of the public lands?

The following table will show the liberal grants which have been made by Congress to the new States:

State or Territory.	Number of acres for internal improvements.	Number of acres for colleges, academies, and universities.	The one thirty-sixth part of public lands appropriated for common schools.	For religious and charitable institutions.	Lands appropriated for seats of Government.	Saline reservations.	Aggregate appropriations for each State and Territory.

Kentucky led the way into the Western wilderness, and fought the battles for the conquest of the Western lands, and now sees them partitioned out among new comers, and herself excluded from all participation.

But notwithstanding the long exclusion of Kentucky from a full and fair enjoyment of the benefits of the General Government, she would disdain, and I, as one of her representatives, knowing her liberal and elevated spirit, would not venture to excite sectional feelings. She is for a policy that embraces the whole Union, and all the great interests of the Union. She is still willing, as she always has been willing, to vote money to the support of a navy, to protect our foreign commerce in peace, and to defend the country in war. Formerly, when the navy had shrunk away to nothing, under the frowns of the then ascendant party, the spell was broken, and the navy raised and called into favor by the voice of a Kentuckian—the same voice that has been heard for thirty years in all the times of national emergency. Yet some unknown person has written to the distant newspapers that myself and some of my friends had given a vote unfriendly to the navy. This unfounded slander is made manifest by the fact that I have voted, ever since I have been in Congress, for every recommendation of this administration for the benefit of the navy, and now stand ready to vote for the estimates sent in at the commencement of this session. Kentucky is still willing to contribute her proportion of the requisite millions to go on with the fortifications and all the national defences; she desires to abate nothing from the annual appropriations for the improvement of the seacoast. But while she is willing, as she always has been willing, to stand by and uphold the great interests of the other portions of the Union, she would be recreant to herself if she did not demand her rights in a tone that would no longer be patient under refusal. As we need no fortifications, no navy, no standing army, in the nature of things, the only great national interests which could be maintained by legislation in the West are education, and the construction of highways, along which the surplus products of industry could be safely, cheaply, and speedily, conveyed to market.

In former ages the interior of continents, cut off from the general intercourse of nations, remained in ignorance and poverty; but modern roads and steam power are rapidly working a revolution in human affairs. They are carrying into the most remote, interior, and secluded situations, enterprise, intelligence, and wealth, and all the improvements of civilized and cultivated man, which were in other days exclusively enjoyed by maritime countries. The great interest of the Western people is to have their roads and rivers placed in a condition to enable them to reap the advantages of the modern improvements in interior communication; and as the internal commerce of the United States has become so much more valuable than the foreign, reason, policy, and justice, unite in requiring that at least as much of the public money should be devoted to its protection. If it were not for old habits and antiquated prejudices in regard to foreign and domestic commerce, what reason could be given for the outlay of millions for the protection of the lesser, while not a cent is given for the promotion of the greater interest? If the surplus was divided, and Kentucky had the immediate use of $621,832, to which she would be entitled, and her annual proportion hereafter, she would then be on a footing with the other sections of the country; the people would be retrieved from the taxation necessary to pay the heavy debts which that State is incurring to carry on her internal improvements. She would be provided with the means to sustain a system of general education, and thus to improve the intelligence of the people, the only foundation upon which free government can securely rest. She would be replished with money; the wages of labor would be high, the prices of produce would be kept up, and the blessings of this munificent plan would be equally extended to improve the condition, and happiness, and security, of the poor and the rich, without distinction or respect of persons. Will any Kentuckian, any just man, say that Kentucky shall not enjoy her fair proportion of the price of the public lands—lands for the conquest of which her gallant sons spent their youth, their substance, and their blood—lands that they have redeemed from the forest, and made saleable and valuable by the sweat of their brow—lands that, by their enterprise, they have made to supply your Treasury with sixty millions of dollars?

Among the repugnant propositions which have been maintained by the administration, none are more striking than those relating to the disposition of the public domain. In the annual message of 1832 is to be found the following scheme of getting rid of the public lands. The President says: "It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease as soon as practicable to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts. The advantages of accurate surveys and undoubted titles, now secured to purchasers, seem to forbid the abolition of the present system, because none can be substituted which will more perfectly accomplish these important ends. It is desirable, however, that in convenient time this machinery be withdrawn from the States, and the right of soil and the future disposition of it surrendered to the States, respectively, in which it lies."

This recommendation is repeated in the veto of the land bill; yet the principal reason given for the veto is because the public lands are common property, to which all the States have an equal right, and because the land bill gives a larger proportion of the proceeds to the new States than to the old.

According to these opposite views, it would be proper to deprive the old States of any share in the public lands whatever; yet to give the new States 10 per cent. more of the proceeds would be such injustice to the old States as to constitute good cause for a veto.

We now stand upon the point of time, we are now surrounded by the circumstances favorable to that great revolution in our national policy, by which the blessings of our free institutions, and the advantages of justice, shall be made to pervade the whole Union, and be carried home to the dwelling of every citizen, by which love and confidence in the Government shall be shed abroad in every heart, and the cement of the Union be made more firm and durable; by which the authority of the General Government shall be thrown back within the pale of the constitution and laws, and the right arm of the "money power" cut off. Yes, this is the important point of time when these glorious ends are to be accomplished, or when the present corrupt and partial system is to be enlarged and doubly riveted on the country for ages to come—a system that will continue to exalt the power and patronage of this central Government; that will continue to enfeeble the power of the States; that will continue to paralyze the defences of liberty; that will finally make the tax-payers here, what they are over the face of the whole earth elsewhere, slaves to the tax-consumers; that will, under the forms of a free constitution, devote the labor of the common people to the support of an aristocracy and a throne.

Before Mr. ALLAN had concluded his speech, which is given in extenso in preceding pages,

The CHAIR announced the arrival of the hour assigned for taking up the special order of the day.

Mr. HAWES moved to suspend the rules for this day, for the purpose of proceeding in the discussion of the subject now before the House; and, should it be disposed of, to proceed to call the States for petitions.

Mr. ADAMS asked whether the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky would supersede, in order, the resolution which he had the honor to submit two months ago, (for an inquiry into the causes of the loss of the fortification bill at the last session,) and which he hoped would now be again taken up.

The CHAIR said the resolution, if the motion prevailed, would be in order for this day, and, if not disposed of, would be in order again on Monday next.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to amend the motion so as to suspend the rules for the purpose of receiving petitions and the reports of committees; which was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. HAWES, to suspend the rules, was rejected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG here called for the orders of the day.

Mr. HAWES asked the consent of the House to move that the order of the 26th January last be rescinded, so far as it makes the appropriation bills the order of the day for Monday.

Objections being made,

Mr. HAWES moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose indicated.

Mr. DAVIS moved to amend the motion, so as to suspend, for the purpose of moving that the rule be rescinded entirely. He said it was evident that the rule was embarrassing to the proceedings of the House, and that less business had been despatched in consequence of it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the gentleman might as well propose another amendment, viz: that the appropriation bills should not be passed at this session.

The motion to amend was rejected.

The motion of Mr. HAWES, to suspend the rules, was then rejected without a count.

Mr. REED moved that the rules be suspended for this day, for the purpose of receiving petitions and memorials, excluding the subject of the resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky; which was agreed to.

The remainder of the day was consumed in the reception of petitions, resolutions of inquiry, &c., till

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 22.

Mr. LANE moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which the memorial of the National Trades Union was laid on the table; which motion lies over.

UNITED STATES BANK.

The CHAIR announced, as the business first in order, the motion reported yesterday from the Committee of Ways and Means, to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the following bill:

A bill repealing the fourteenth section of the "Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," approved April 10, 1816.

Be it enacted, &c., That the fourteenth section of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," approved April 10, 1816, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The CHAIR would state (he said) in advance, that the merits of the bill were not open to discussion on this motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the reading of the fourteenth section of the bank charter, proposed to be repealed; and it was read, as follows:

H. OF R.]

United States Bank.

[MARCH 22, 1836.]

"Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the said incorporation, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the object of the Committee of Ways and Means, in instructing him to move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, was, to order it to be engrossed and read a third time. He asked the Clerk to read what took place in this House in 1812, when a similar question was presented in relation to the notes of the first Bank of the United States.

The Clerk read the following passage from a report in the National Intelligencer of February 13th, 1812:

"UNITED STATES BANK NOTES.—On motion of Mr. BACON, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKLEDGE in the chair,) on the bill to repeal the 10th section of the act establishing the Bank of the United States.

"Mr. B. said the Committee of Ways and Means had thought it necessary to bring forward this bill, in consequence of a decision which had been made in the circuit court of Virginia, that the notes issued by the Bank of the United States are still a tender in payments to the collectors and other officers of the United States. The committee do not know on what ground this opinion was given; they had conceived that, as the limitation of the law had expired, no part of it could still have force. But, as this opinion has been given by the Chief Justice of the United States, it produces great inconvenience to the officers of the United States, as the notes of the several branches, say Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, &c. will be paid only at the branches from which they issue.

"Some irregular debate took place on the propriety of passing this bill at all. It was contended that the whole law having expired, it was altogether unnecessary, not to say improper, to pass a bill to repeal a section of that law. It was replied by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and others, that, as the passing of the bill would prevent any further trouble to the public officers, and it could have no influence on any thing which had heretofore taken place, its passage was desirable.

"The committee rose, and the House ordered the bill to a third reading."

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that the provision of the old charter differed, in one respect, from this, as it did not embrace the additional clause, "unless otherwise directed by act of Congress." The old bank, when the above proceeding took place, was winding up its concerns, under the same provisions with the present bank, having two years allowed for that purpose. He would only remark, in addition, that there was a necessity for immediate action on this subject, unless it was wished to give this bank an advantage which no other had.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose to protest against the suggestion which he had understood the gentleman to make yesterday, that the committee gave their unanimous assent to this motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he did not state that he was unanimously instructed to make the motion. What he intended to state was, that when the subject was first brought before the committee, there was some objection to it; but after they had the opinion of the Chief Justice on a former occasion, on the subject, he did not hear any decided objection to it.

Mr. INGERSOLL reminded the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that when the subject was first before them, he had expressed his opinion that it would be unnecessary for Congress to act in the matter at all. It was proper, however, for him to say a word in relation to the precedent. If he understood the language of it, so far as it was a precedent, it was a precedent against the course now proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. He could conceive of no reason for action, unless the one intimated yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that the bank was still, notwithstanding it had become a State institution, issuing notes of the old bank. Mr. I. knew of no such fact, and if it had come to the knowledge of the gentleman from New York, he wished to know it.

Mr. ADAMS observed that it was the unusual course of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means yesterday that had induced him to make objection. He wished the present to have the benefit of all the discussion which important bills were entitled to in the House, and he did not know that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had assigned any reason for taking it away from the Committee of the Whole. He had, to be sure, said that the object was to have the bill brought to a third reading. Every bill must do that: it was no reason for taking it from the Committee of the Whole, because it was the only place in which subjects of importance could be fully discussed: The Committee of the Whole was the only place in that House in which subjects could be fully considered, and every other mode of proceeding should either be by unanimous consent, or for some good reason; and it appeared to him that a worse reason than that the bill should be brought to a third reading could hardly have been given. He knew of no reason why the bill should pass at all, and he was wholly unprepared to discuss it. It was totally unexpected to him, and he confessed that it was with some distrust that he had objected to it. It might be to discredit the paper of the United States Bank, or a continuation of the war on the Bank of the United States. He hoped, however, that war was at an end; he did not like stabs upon dead bodies. If that was the intention, he hoped they might have an opportunity for full deliberation upon the subject in that House. No reason had been assigned for discrediting the bills of the United States Bank. He believed their credit was of great advantage to the people of the country. They were the only currency existing that had full and complete credit; they were better than gold and silver; the best of all currencies. Well, sir, what was the necessity of passing an act of Congress discrediting those bills? Was Congress going to do all in its power to discredit the bills of that bank, to act out its little spite against that institution? He deemed it the duty of Congress rather to keep up the credit of the bank as much as possible, because there was yet seven millions of the money of the people in that institution.

[The CHAIR remarked that the merits of the question were not open for discussion.]

Mr. A. observed that he only mentioned those things to show the importance of the subject, and the great necessity for keeping it in the Committee of the Whole. He did not know but, when the subject came up, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means might find substantial reasons for the passage of the bill, but he did not think that the paper the gentleman had read was any good reason; for, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania had observed, it was against the course the gentleman was pursuing. He hoped, therefore, the House would adhere, not to the motion of the gentleman from New York, but to the precedent he had produced.

Mr. PATTON said the present was merely a question of time and of form. As to the question of time, it was simply whether they should proceed at once, and in a way to enable the House to come to a speedy conclusion, or whether they should adhere to the forms of legislation which were prescribed, which, perhaps, would detain the question from being decided for three or four weeks. He, for one, was not disposed to dispense with those forms, to precipitate and hurry legislation on that or any other subject, unless some good reasons could be shown for so doing; and, therefore, although he did not know that he should object to the passage of the bill, yet he had heard no good reason for any hurry in the matter. Were not the notes of that bank as good and as safe as the notes of any bank? Was any danger to be apprehended of the country suffering by postponing the subject three or four weeks? He could see no reason why the usual forms of proceeding should be dispensed with; and he thought they ought not to be deprived of an opportunity of discussing the present question, unless there was some good reason for dispensing with the usual forms.

Mr. BROWN said, if the 14th section of the act, which makes the bills of the Bank of the United States receivable in payment of debts due to the Government, be inoperative since the 4th of March, as had been intimated, he was at a loss to know why the present motion should be resisted. The bill to repeal that section had been committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and unless it could be brought back into the House, there was no prospect of reaching it until near the close of the session. There was a special rule making all the appropriation bills the special order for every day in the week, except Fridays and Saturdays, and those days were appropriated to the consideration of private business. He repeated, therefore, that if this bill remained in committee, it could not be reached until near the close of the session. During all this time, the bills of the bank would have a decided preference over the bills of every other institution in the country.

In payments to the Government, they were equivalent to silver and gold. He was unwilling the bank should have this advantage one moment longer. He denied that the effect of the bill would be to discredit the notes of the bank. Its effect would be to place them upon an equality with the paper of every other banking institution in the country, and nothing more. But if such should be its effect, he for one would gladly give his assent to it. A bank, such as that of the United States, renewed as it had been by a State Legislature after its condemnation had been repeatedly pronounced by the people, was not entitled to any favor from this Government, and should receive none from him. At a meeting of the stockholders of the bank the other day in Philadelphia, the president, Mr. Biddle, enumerated amongst the advantages which the new institution enjoyed over the old, "its total separation from all the officers of the General Government, an unnatural connexion, beneficial neither to the bank nor Government." He would hold him to his word, and annihilate whatever remained of this unnatural, and, he might add, odious connexion.

[Here the SPEAKER called Mr. B. to order, stating that he could not, upon a motion to discharge the committee, go into the merits of the bill which was the subject of the motion.]

Mr. B. said he would not draw the merits of the bill into controversy, as he did not wish to transgress the rules of order. He had been led to say this much in answer to some observations which had fallen from honorable gentlemen upon the other side of the House. He believed it had become essential to the best interests and to the dignity of the country that the 14th section of the bank charter should be instantly repealed. And with a view to a distinct and open expression of the opinions of honorable members, he concluded by demanding the yeas and nays upon the question.

The yeas and nays were thereupon ordered.

Mr. LANE said he had taken the floor for the purpose of giving a single reason why he should vote for the motion. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has pronounced the Bank of the United States dead, and that he was opposed to treading on its dead body. In this Mr. L. agreed with the honorable gentleman, and rejoiced at the result; and, in order to relieve that gentleman, he would vote for its burial with all due expedition and ceremony. It is objected that no reason has been given for the motion; to this it is a sufficient reply, that no reason has been given against it.

Mr. McKENNAN understood that the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported the bill, originally moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that they now moved to discharge that committee from the subject, and bring it directly before the House. He asked, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PATTON,] had done, what were the pressing reasons for immediate action on that bill? Had any thing occurred since the bill was reported and referred to the Committee of the Whole, which would make it necessary for the House to act on the subject? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had given no reason why the bill should be hurried through. It was a question of expediency entirely, and would require deliberate consideration; and the Committee of the Whole was the place where all questions of importance ought to be discussed, and where a free discussion could not be cut off by the operation of the gag-law. It was a question of expediency whether the notes of the Bank of the United States should be discredited or not; and, for his part, when the question came up, he would say it was entirely inexpedient, because he believed that no better currency could be procured.

The CHAIR remarked that this discussion would be in order when the main question came up, but was not now in order.

Mr. McKENNAN only threw out these suggestions to show the importance of the bill, and to show that it ought to remain in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPEIGHT would say that, so far as he was concerned, gentlemen might have full opportunity of discussion without the application of the previous question. The House had, however, passed a resolution making the appropriation bills the special order for every day, except private bill days; and, judging from what had passed, the greater part of the session would be taken up by the discussion of those bills; so that there would be no opportunity for getting up the present subject in Committee of the Whole. By the 1st of June, too, he hoped the majority of that House would be turning their faces homewards. Another reason why the bill should be passed, was, that the bank was literally dead, yet its notes are a lawful tender to the Government for all payments thereto. It cannot make loans to individuals; but still, by the law proposed to be repealed, it is the only bank in the country whose bills are a legal tender for payments to the Treasury. He conceived the merits of the bill could be as well discussed in the House as in the committee; and it is presumed, judging from what had passed, that they would not be able to discuss it in committee during the present session. He hoped it would be speedily brought before the House and passed.

Mr. DENNY expected to be enlightened, when the gentleman from Indiana rose to address the House, particularly as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had given no reasons for the motion which he had made, in reference to a matter of so much importance. The gentleman from Indiana had, however, wisely taken his seat and left them in the dark.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SPEIGHT] had come to the aid of his friends. Mr. D. proceeded to reply to the remarks of the last gentleman, in reference to the propriety of bringing the present measure before the House, and hastening its decision by means of the previous question.

H. OF R.]

United States Bank.

The bill was reported on the 16th of February; previous to which time other bills, perhaps of more importance, were reported by the same committee, and referred to a Committee of the Whole, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had permitted them to slumber without attempting to call them up, or to make a motion similar to the present to take them out of committee. He (Mr. D.) was opposed to a departure from the usual course, unless for special reasons. Had the Secretary of the Treasury demanded that this bill should be put in a situation to be hurried through the House? Had this course been required from any other quarter? Was the committee afraid of a full and free discussion of the subject? For his part, he desired that all the light which could be shed on the subject should be sent out to the country. If gentlemen did not wish to shrink from discussion, they would permit the bill to remain where it was, in Committee of the Whole. What, he would ask, was the situation of these bank notes? The law chartering the bank had expired. The notes of the institution, credited as they were by the legislation of the country, had gone abroad. They were in the pockets of individuals at a distance, who desired to give them in exchange for the public lands, &c. It was now proposed to discredit them, by authorizing the receivers of the customs and land offices not to receive them in payment of public dues. This course, if adopted, would compel many of the honest holders of the notes to dispose of them, at a considerable discount, to a broker, or to a Government agent, in order to pay his debt to the Government. He was opposed to such a course.

The passage of the bill would operate deceptively. These notes were redeemed in specie, when demanded. They were at par. The Government had nothing to fear by continuing to receive them. If, as had been intimated, other subjects should come up in connexion with this bill, it would form an additional reason for a full and free discussion in committee. He therefore hoped that the House would permit this bill to take the usual course, and that the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole would not prevail.

Mr. JUDSON said the proposition from the Committee of Ways and Means, under immediate discussion, was to take a bill now before the Committee of the Whole, and bring it before the House, to accelerate action upon it. The 14th section of the act creating the Bank of the United States made the bills of that bank a lawful tender to the Government. This, in its very nature, was an odious monopoly, against which the people had long since passed their decisive judgment. There were some who claimed, that although the bank itself had expired, and ceased to exist on the 4th of March last, yet this right pertained to this bank; and the bills might hereafter, by virtue of this clause, still continue to be what they were before the expiration of the bank. The object of this bill was to repeal that 14th section, and settle the question. He was in favor of the motion, and desired to see the business of that House progress; it was due to the interest of the country. Did gentlemen desire to continue a useless debate upon mere first principles, whether such an odious monopoly as was here claimed should longer exist in a free country, where the principles of legislation should be preserved on equal terms? Gentlemen say that the previous question may be applied, and cut off discussion. He did not say that he should call that question; but he did say that the people of this country would always justify the application of that rule, when useless and unimportant debate was carried on for the mere purpose of preventing the transaction of the public business. Whenever that became the case, he would always be ready to do the business of the House, instead of wasting its time.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he was very sorry that the ghost of the Bank of the United States had been exhibited here in any shape; for he had observed, while he had had the honor of a seat here, that the old lady could not be introduced here in any form, without ruffling the temper of honorable gentlemen. But he saw no good reason for much sensibility on account of the motion now under consideration. According to the charter of the Bank of the United States, the bills of the bank were a lawful tender for the debts due to your Government. Your revenue collectors and your public land receivers were obliged to accept them. The bank was dead, and we had heard that there had been a judicial decision, which rendered it at least doubtful whether the bills of this bank, after it had become a dead body, were not still a lawful tender for the debts due the Government. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGERSON], who was also a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, had told us that he did not believe that the bills of the Bank of the United States continued to be a lawful tender; that the bank had not claimed it; and he did not suppose that it would ever pretend that its bills were such tender. If so, then, certainly, no mischief could result from the motion to take this bill out of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The bank could not be prejudiced, and it was not necessary to keep the bill in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of debate. As there seemed to be doubt as to the construction of the charter, a declaratory section was necessary, and he hoped the motion would prevail.

Mr. WISE said the question arising under the present motion was not as to what mischief would result from its rejection, but what possible good would be secured by its adoption.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had the honor of starting a doubt whether the charter of a bank operated after the expiration of its term. There could be no doubt on the subject. The bank was dead, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] might bury the "monster." He could, therefore, see no necessity for speedy action on this bill. He adverted to the unsettled state of the currency, and avowed that even the Secretary of the Treasury did not know what kind of money would be received in payment of the public lands. He had applied to that officer for information on the subject. The Secretary, he repeated, could tell him nothing about it, and had referred him to the receivers for information. Mr. W. remarked, in conclusion, that there was an object, and but one object, for the repeal of this 14th section; and that was, to array the Government on the side of one set of bank capitalists. This question had all along been kept up by different and conflicting banking interests.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, said the proposition before the House was one of simple expediency. Is it, or is it not, expedient for the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill to repeal the 14th section of the bank charter? The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENNY] who last addressed the House, thinks it is not expedient, and assigns certain reasons, which are to his mind, no doubt, entirely satisfactory, for this conclusion. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] also thinks it is not expedient, and assigns for reason, as does another gentleman from Pennsylvania over the way, [Mr. McKENNA], that, if the subject be brought before the House, the previous question will be applied, and a protracted discussion of the subject, as in Committee of the Whole, will be cut off. This is probably the most important reason that influences gentlemen in opposition to the proposition before the House. Why, sir, the previous question can only be applied

United States Bank.

when a majority of the House shall think it necessary and expedient to bring the subject to a decision; and all who are opposed to the application of the previous question, or of placing the bill in question before the House, are unwilling to confide in the judgment and discretion of a majority of the House in relation to the order and disposition of business before the House. To those gentlemen who are disposed to distrust the judgment and discretion of the House—I mean of the majority—in relation to the arrangement and disposition of the business before us, to as many as are opposed to the application of the previous question to a subject, when, in the opinion of a majority, such application becomes necessary to the despatch of business, the reasons of the gentlemen from Virginia and Pennsylvania must be satisfactory. But, sir, no person having confidence in the good sense, judgment, and discretion of a majority, to control properly the business before the House, can be deterred, by any apprehension of the previous question, from giving his support for the proposition to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, in order to bring the bill directly within the reach of the House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENNY] wants light upon this proposition; he wants reasons for it. What to his mind may seem to be light, or a sufficient reason for the measure, may not be so to another mind. And what to another mind may be light, or reason, may not be so to his. But, sir, to my mind, there are sufficient reasons in support of the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means, and in favor of the expediency of discharging the Committee of the Whole from further action upon the repealing bill. It is expedient to bring the bill out of committee, because thirty-four days have elapsed since it was reported to the House and referred to the Committee of the Whole, and such has been its position before that committee, as not to have been reached at all during the whole period. Such has been the arrangement of the business before the committee, it has been and still is impossible to reach the bill there for action, or to have it taken up. This, sir, to my mind, is one good and sufficient reason for the proposition now before the House, and for a change of the position of the bill.

Another reason, in support of the expediency of bringing the bill out of the committee, is derived from the fact that the charter of the Bank of the United States expired, for most of the purposes of its creation, some eighteen or twenty days since; and this bill, relating to the operation of that charter, remains undisposed of. The bill was reported to the House seasonably, before the expiration of the bank charter, to have been acted upon, if the arrangement of the business before the Committee of the Whole had been such as to have admitted of the bill being taken up. But it is well known that it has been impossible to reach the bill there.

The order of the House, giving precedence to the principal appropriation bills on every day at one o'clock, is another reason in support of the expediency of the proposition before the House. The debate which has already taken place, and is still pending, on one of the appropriation bills, (the navy appropriation,) and the debate that is yet to take place, judging from what has passed, on that and each of the other appropriation bills, shuts out all prospect of reaching this bill, relating to the bank charter, for weeks and weeks to come, if it is to remain in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it now is. Unless the committee be discharged from the further consideration of it, and it be brought within the range and control of the House, no one can tell when it will come up for consideration. This, sir, to my mind, is a substantial reason for the measure proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Again: doubts exist in the community relative to the character of the 14th section of the bank charter proposed to be repealed. It is true, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] says no doubts exist upon this subject; that the friends of the bank do not consider the 14th section as longer operative. But, sir, before the gentleman concluded his remarks, he informed the House that the Secretary of the Treasury himself was unable to tell whether the bills of the Bank of the United States are or are not receivable in payment of the public lands. One would think that this fact was evidence enough of existing doubts in relation to the 14th section of the charter. It is true, again, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] who is also a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, is quoted for the opinion that the 14th section of the bank charter, making the United States Bank bills a tender in payment of the demands of the Government, is no longer in force; that it expired with the bank charter.

But another gentleman from Pennsylvania, who last addressed the House, [Mr. DENNY,] entertains the opposite opinion, and thinks the section still to be in force; and offers as a reason against the repeal of the charter, that many citizens have at this time pockets full of the United States Bank money wherewith to make payments to the Government for public lands. Now, sir, I think we have evidence enough before us that doubts do actually exist in the community, and serious doubts too, as to the force and operation of the section of the bank charter proposed to be repealed. Two opinions are evidently abroad upon the subject; and these adverse opinions, to my mind, constitute the best of reasons for an early action of the House upon the subject; they are substantial reasons in support of the expediency of the measure proposed; they are reasons for the earliest possible action of the House, which cannot be had unless the bill be brought out of the Committee of the Whole.

Sir, the proposition is to bring the bill before the House for examination and discussion, not to apply to it the previous question without examination. My object is to take it from a position where it cannot be examined or discussed for weeks to come, and place it within the range of the House for examination and discussion at once. If, after discussion, to the satisfaction of the House, the House, or a majority of the House, in the exercise of their discretion, shall desire the previous question, then a different proposition from the present one will be presented. The expediency of the previous question will then be considered. The expediency of bringing the subject before the House at once is the simple proposition now to be considered. I am satisfied, for one, on this question of expediency, and for the reasons stated. If, after discussion of the subject in the House, the previous question shall be desired, and there shall be evidence enough to my mind to support its expediency, as on the present question, then, sir, I will vote for the previous question.

Mr. REED remarked that the gentleman last up had inquired if they could not trust the majority. Most assuredly; but, at the same time, he was in favor of pursuing the forms adopted by the majority for disposing of the public business, which were to consider, in the first instance, particular measures in Committee of the Whole. This course was due to the majority itself, in order to guard against hasty and inconsiderate action on questions involving difficult points. He admitted that there was much useless debate in that body; but he could see no reason, in this instance, for departing from the rules and usages of the House; and he was opposed to discharging the Committee of the Whole from the bill under consideration.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said that a single reason operated with him to favor the motion to discharge the

H. OF R.]

Naval Service Bill—United States Bank.

Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and bring this bill into the House, and to a prompt decision. This reason had not, he believed, been alluded to by gentlemen. The charter of the bank has expired; but it is too well known that it had run into a State bank, by the power of one of the States of this Union. It had "inherited," to use the language of the high priest of its oracle, "the circulation of its noble progenitor." Now, if this 14th section of its charter, making the notes of what was the Bank of the United States receivable in all payments to the United States, is now operative as the law of the land, (and Mr. M. said, whatever other gentlemen might think on this point, for himself, he had very little doubt,) then it would happen that, in virtue of this "inheritance," the United States Bank of the State of Pennsylvania would have preference over all the other State banks of the several States of the Union, and that, too, by the laws of the Union. Are gentlemen, friends of the Bank of the United States, prepared to prefer by our laws one State bank over all others, and those of their own States? And for what reason? I trust, sir, that by "inheritance" the Bank of the United States of the State of Pennsylvania is not to obtain an advantage over all other banks in the credit and currency of its old notes, used by this inheritance. Why should the Government receive the notes of this bank, merely because of its name, which now indicates any thing else than truth?

Mr. M. had intimated his opinion, or rather fear, that this 14th section, making the notes of the bank receivable by the United States, had not expired with the general attributes of the corporation. This was grounded upon the doctrine expressed by a maxim, in the quaint language of Lord Coke, "that corporations have no souls; albeit they have immortality." They do not die so easily as gentlemen imagine, in respect to all their attributes. Other clauses of the charter are now operative, by their own terms; they have not expired. This 14th section is in general terms. If a citizen had held the notes of the bank in good faith on the 3d March, and had offered them in payment of the revenue on the 5th, will it be contended that the Government would not have been bound to receive them, although the bank might have failed in the mean time? Mr. M. said he presumed not.

Mr. HAWES said that, whenever any proposition came up which looked to expediting the public business, there were certain gentlemen who uniformly opposed it; and the same persons were always the first to charge others with neglecting the necessary business of the country, and of lengthening the session. They were yesterday told that the majority would be held responsible to the country for the action or the want of action on the part of the House; and, upon the present occasion, the party friends of the gentleman who made the remark to which he referred were the very same who had again interposed to prevent the despatch of the business of the session.

If, as had been admitted by the friends of the bank, the operation of this 14th section of its charter had ceased and expired on the 4th of March, why should any person object to its repeal? There could be none. There were doubts on the subject. As a Kentuckian, he felt bound to urge the repeal of this section. He would never consent to give privileges and immunities to a State bank in Pennsylvania, which were not possessed by the banks in his own State. Gentlemen were afraid of the previous question. He had moved it, and would again, if by so doing he could facilitate the transaction of public business.

Mr. BOND said such a charge could not properly be brought against the minority, for all they asked was action according to the rules established in the House, and according to the usual forms of legislation. The minority did not make the rules: and he referred especially to the rule adopted the 26th of January, assigning one o'clock each day for the consideration of the appropriation bills, as a rule adopted by the party in power, and calculated to embarrass and delay the business of the House.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, took the floor for the purpose of addressing the House, but he was interrupted by

The CHAIR, who announced the arrival of the hour of one o'clock, assigned for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. RIPLEY moved that the special order be suspended for this day, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of this subject; which motion was lost.

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

The House, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the year 1836,

The question being on the motion of Mr. BELL to strike out the following clause:

"For improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, sixty-seven thousand dollars."

Mr. BELL resumed and continued his remarks, as given entire heretofore; and, without having concluded, gave way for a motion that the committee rise; which motion prevailed, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion made on Monday by Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill to repeal the 14th section of the "act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," approved April 10, 1816—the object being to bring the bill before the House for a third reading.

The section proposed to be repealed is as follows:

"Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the said corporation, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress."

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House:

It would be improper, on a question which required the speedy action of the House, to consume much time in its discussion; and if there was to be as much discussion in Committee of the Whole as there was a prospect of being, it was one of the best reasons why the committee should be discharged from the present subject. It was one of those bills which, according to his motion, might have been acted on without going to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because it was not a bill involving any appropriation of money. It was merely one with regard to the expediency of repealing a section of the charter of the Bank of the United States, or not acting at all on the subject. It was proper enough that it should have been referred to the Committee of the Whole, although it was not absolutely necessary; and it having been so referred, the question now was whether that committee should be discharged from the consideration of the subject, and let it come back into the House, and be speedily acted on. If it should remain where it now was, could any one tell when it could be acted on? He conceived that no one was prepared to say that it could receive the action of the House during the present session. Then if it was a subject of such importance, which to his mind it was, and perhaps none more so, it should be brought before the House for speedy action. Suppose it remained where it then was, could they act upon it? Four months had already elapsed, and they had not moved an inch in regard to one of the important appropriation bills. Four days had already been consumed by one distinguished gentleman, [Mr. BELL,] in debating not only the items of the bill, but in reviewing the Presidential question.

[The CHAIR said it was not in order on the present question to refer to what was taking place on another subject before the House.]

Mr. P. resumed. He had only done so for the purpose of showing the improbability of getting the present subject up in the Committee of the Whole during the present session. He had said that four days were consumed discussing one item of the bill; and if two other gentlemen should take the same range, who stood in different relation to that gentleman, there would be four more days consumed by each; and if it was lawful for one gentleman to consume four days, it certainly was lawful for another to consume the same number; and they had but three working days in each week: then there would be four weeks consumed by those gentlemen. When, then, would they get through with the appropriation bills, and when would they get an opportunity to take up the bill now before the House in Committee of the Whole? To his mind, they ought to settle the question immediately. Was the bank dead? Certainly not. Then they ought to act most efficiently and expeditiously. Suppose the clause to be in operation, not only authorizing but commanding the receiving officers of the Government to take those notes—

[The CHAIR was of opinion that the gentleman was discussing the merits of the bill, which could not be done on a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the subject.]

Mr. P. resumed. He had merely made the reference for the purpose of showing the importance of immediate action, and to show that unless the Committee of the Whole was discharged, no action at all could be had during the present session. He would further state that, if there be any doubt on this question, it was necessary that the House should decide and dissipate it. It was singular, however, that gentlemen who had contended that there was no doubt but that the section expired with the bill, should still be so unwilling for action. He would state another thing, to show the necessity of action. Suppose Congress was to rise without action, the Treasury Department might refuse to receive those notes, lawsuits would arise from the very circumstance of the bill lying over, and no one could tell the number of litigations which might so arise. No one was prepared to say what the decision of the courts might be on the subject; then, if there was doubt in regard to it, hence arises the necessity of deciding it at once. Without pretending to go into the merits of the question, he had submitted these remarks to show the necessity for action, and to show that if the question remained where it now was, it could never be reached this session. The question then was, shall the subject remain where it cannot be reached this session, or shall the committee be discharged, and let it receive the immediate action of the House?

Upon the motion reported from the Committee of Ways and Means to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill repealing the 14th section of the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, of April, 1816,

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, said that, the yeas and noys being now about to be called, he could not forego the opportunity of saying a few words in explanation of the vote which he expected to give upon this question. Much time has been already consumed in the debate upon this question, and he would not occupy any further the time of the House, were it not that he differed from some of his friends who had spoken upon the propriety of the disposition which was to be given to this proposition. The question is, whether you will discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of a bill proposing to repeal the 14th section of the act of Congress, of the year 1816, incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, so that it may come directly into the House for their action; or whether you will keep the subject, to be deliberated upon and discussed, first in the committee, and afterwards leave it to be discussed and acted upon a second time in the House. Sir, I am in favor of this proposition. It has been indicated from the Chair that it is not in order to go into the merits of this question, further than to show the reasons for the proper direction of this simple proposition. I am in favor of the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole, first, and principally, to the end that it may facilitate the despatch of the business of this House. He said we have now been in session between three and four months, and he had yet to learn what important bills of a general import had received the final action of this House. The time is rapidly approaching when it has been more than once declared upon this floor, and when it is expected, according to the custom of the House, that Congress will adjourn; and he could not, by his vote, consent that the time of the House should be exhausted upon this motion, to the exclusion of other more important business, interesting to the nation at large. If, said he, we can form an opinion of the time which the prolonged discussion of the subject in the Committee of the Whole would occupy, from the readiness, and, if he might be allowed to say so, the eagerness, which was already manifested to go into the whole merits of the vexed question connected with the bank, it was impossible to foresee to what extent the debate may be carried out.

But again. Where is the pressing necessity for refusing to bring this bill immediately into the House for their deliberation? There is a rule, that all proceedings touching the appropriation of money shall be first discussed in Committee of the Whole, in order that the greatest latitude may be given to the consideration of that class of subjects; but there is another rule, that the proceedings of the committee shall be subject to the government of the same rules that the House is, except so far as they relate to the limitation of the time of speaking, and except that the previous question cannot be called in the committee.

The operation of these rules will give to the House, as I apprehend, the benefit of all the discussion and explanation which will be necessary to the full and proper understanding of the bearings and merits of the bill in question. Various opinions are entertained as to the importance of the bill to be acted on; some gentlemen being of opinion that the passage of it is altogether unnecessary. That is a matter which I waive for the present; but whether important or not, there is not a member who may not be able to form his opinion, and to give his vote, from a brief examination of the matter, and from the discussion to be given in the House. The 14th section of the act proposed to be repealed is in the following words: "That the bills or notes of the said incorporation (the bank) originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress." The bank charter having expired on the 3d of March last, it is supposed that those bills of the old Bank of the United States ought not to be considered any longer a legal tender to the Government for debts which may be due and owing from individuals, but that those bills should remain upon the same footing with the notes of other banks as to the legality of the tender; and, in order to remove all doubts which may exist as to the effect of that section, the bill under consideration is introduced, providing that the said 14th section shall be repealed. Believing that the merits of this bill will be reached, and that ample opportunity be afforded in the House, with some economy of time, to understand and deliberate upon the subject, and not being at liberty to examine and discuss further the use or propriety of the bill itself, in this stage of its consideration, I leave it, with the short explanation of my views upon the immediate question before the House.

Mr. BRIGGS had thought of voting against the proposition before the House, but a little reflection had brought him to the conclusion that he should vote the other way. He was of opinion that it was not a matter of so much consequence, because he did not think the bills of the late Bank of the United States a legal tender by virtue of the 14th section of the bank charter. So believing, he thought it of no sort of consequence whether they passed the bill or not. On the other hand, if the officers of the Government were in doubt, and it was likely to create any confusion, it might be necessary to pass it. He had not heard any particular reasons urged why it should be taken from the Committee of the Whole, and no very strong one in favor of its remaining with them. Various reasons which had been urged were of very little consequence; and the hard names which had been urged against the bank had as little influence with him now as heretofore. Some had said that the bank was a monster; others, that it was not dead; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] had quoted a very high authority to prove that it could not die because it had no soul. This was the first time he had been informed that a body could not die without being possessed of a soul. Another gentleman had told them that the ghost of the old monster had returned. What! the ghost of a being who had no soul? The bank could not die, says one gentleman, because it had no soul; but, says another, it is dead, and its ghost is here in this hall. But, says one, the old lady is here again. Why, this bank had only been chartered twenty years, and he hoped no gentleman would be so uncourteous as to apply that odious word "old lady," to a being who had not existed over twenty years. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. JUDSON] had told them that the bank was an odious monopoly, and it ought to be put down. Yes, it was dead, and its ghost here; and it was an odious monopoly, and gentlemen wished still to put it down, because it was in accordance with the people's will. It was true, the people had willed its death, but it was not permitted to rest at peace in its grave, but was still pursued by its desperate persecutors. But the people willed its death, it was true, and the people also willed its life; yet so much respect had he for the will of the people, that he would not now vote to recharter another bank, however favorable he might be to one, because the public voice was against it. But, sir, this thing which was killed by the voice of the people, was made by it.

[The CHAIR remarked that the present was simply a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the subject, and that the gentleman was evidently taking too wide a range in his remarks.]

Mr. B. resumed. Well, sir, the monster was dead, and the charter expired, and he held that the section which made these bills a legal tender had expired with the other provisions of the charter, and there was no reason why the bill should have a preference over other bills; but, as there were some doubts on the subject, it might be as well to act on the question, and settle these doubts, and it might as well be acted on now as at any other time. He had, therefore, come to the conclusion to vote to take it out of Committee of the Whole; but he hoped that those who might differ from him in opinion, and those who might differ in opinion from other gentlemen, might be permitted to express their views on the bill, without being cut off by that familiar monster, more dangerous to the freedom of debate than the old bank ever could be to the freedom of the country. He was somewhat surprised to hear gentlemen say they were ready and willing to move the previous question. When the previous question was perverted by the power of party, it was one of the most odious and detestable instruments ever introduced into any deliberative body on earth.

Mr. HARPER wished merely to state his reasons, as the yeas and nays had been ordered, for voting against bringing the subject out of the Committee of the Whole. It was this eternal attempt to ride one portion of the business over another, which created so much confusion, and consumed so much of the time of the House. As to the present subject, he conceived that the law had been dead for a month, and he could see no reason why the notes should be offered as a legal tender for any thing. Believing that the public could sustain no loss, he could see no necessity for speedy action on the question. A bill of the utmost importance was now before them; and yet it was desired to make this bill ride over that. He repeated that this sort of procedure was calculated to delay the business of the House, and to create confusion; and hence the reason that the House had done nothing; and so long as that system continued, the House would do nothing. This dead monster, who had called forth the whole influence of one party to wage war against it, could not be permitted to rest in its grave; it must have the last kick.

[The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that he could not enter into the merits of the question.]

Mr. H. resumed. Would the country sustain any injury? It could sustain none; and all that could be done was to give a few additional blows to the bank. But his principal objection was, that the business of the House ought to go on in regular order; the interests of the country called for it. He had voted against all motions to suspend the rules of the House. He was anxious that the House should go on regularly with its business. For these reasons he should vote against taking the subject out of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALBRAITH wished to give one or two reasons for the vote he should give. He thought they ought to act on the subject immediately. One of his colleagues [Mr. INGENSOHL] had said that the 14th section was entirely inoperative; yet he argued that the present bill ought not to pass. But Mr. G. thought, as there was doubt about it, the bill should pass. Some had said that the bank was dead, but others thought differently; and the people of the country might collect up the notes of that bank under the impression that they were a legal tender, and might in consequence suffer inconvenience. This being the case, he thought the bill ought to pass, and without delay. The different arguments of gentlemen had made it satisfactory to him that the bill should be taken up and passed speedily; and, also, as it could do no harm, and might do a great deal of good, it ought to pass.

Mr. DAVIS regretted that this debate had taken so wide a range; for it did seem to him to be a simple question whether the subject should be taken from the Committee of the Whole and brought into the House. The bill could be acted on just as well in the House as in

United States Bank.

[H. OF R.]

Committee of the Whole, and would be subject to the very same rules. If it was necessary to act at all, they should act speedily. There appeared to be a great disposition with some gentlemen to debate in that House, and a great dread of the gag-law, the previous question. Now, if those gentlemen would turn their eyes to their own side of the House, they would find that at least two thirds of the time of the House was occupied by opposition speakers; yet the majority were accused of springing the previous question, and also of allowing no business to be done. This was a strange contradiction. He understood the nature of the previous question to be to cut off useless debate; because, even the freedom of debate might be abused; and whenever it was, in the deliberate opinion of the House, then it should be applied. The present bill was necessary, so that the United States Bank should have no other corporate powers than that of any other bank; therefore, he should vote for bringing the subject immediately before the House, and acting on it.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said that the fourteenth section of the bank charter made the notes of the Bank of the United States a legal tender, in all payments to the Government. The charter had expired, and perhaps the operation of that section expired with it; but upon that subject doubts seemed to exist, in consequence of a decision, said to have been made by Judge Marshall. There seemed to be some reason to doubt, then, whether the section had expired with the bill; therefore, it was necessary to pass a law, to clear up those doubts. The House should not leave the country under the supposition that these bills were a legal tender, and that they would be received by the collectors and receivers. There should be no hesitation; the doubts should be dissipated, and the public officers should know what to do; and if these notes were not entitled to a preference, the subject ought to be disposed of by a vote of Congress. It was said a great principle was involved in the fourteenth section, and that it ought to be kept in a place where it could have full discussion.

[Mr. REED rose to a point of order. He said if the gentleman went on with his remarks, the whole subject would be opened up for discussion.]

The CHAIR said he was just about informing the gentleman that the merits of the question could not be discussed.]

Mr. B. did not intend to violate the rules. He intended merely to suggest what seemed to him good reasons why they should act on the subject promptly, and dissipate those doubts in relation to the construction of the 14th section. If the subject remained in committee, there was no opportunity to get it speedily passed. He had heard complaints there of the application of the previous question. In relation to that, he had only to remark that those who had been in the House for a few years would recollect that there was not so much dread of the previous question when those gentlemen who now complained of it were in the majority. All would recollect that the bill to recharter this very same bank was passed under the previous question; and by the very same gentlemen who now complain of the operation of the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, warned a certain interest in that House of the danger to be apprehended from the adoption of this precedent. It would be the entering wedge for similar motions upon questions of vital importance, and the rights of the minority would be subverted by the exercise of that engine of tyranny, the previous question.

What good, he would ask, could possibly result from the adoption of the motion? The only reason given was that the passage of the bill might be expedited. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the gentleman who last addressed the House, had not explained how and in what manner this bill was to be carried through. Why did they not tell the whole tale? Why did they not show their hands, and admit the real intention in moving to discharge the committee? He repeated that the object contemplated was to hurry this bill through by calling that odious engine of tyranny, the previous question, which operated as an abridgment of the constitutional rights of the minority. The previous question could not be moved in Committee of the Whole. It was there, and there alone, that free discussion could be had, and it was intended very properly as a check upon the caprice of the House; and it was there that all important measures should be first deliberately considered, and prepared for the final action of the House.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SPEIGHT] had asked what reason there was to suppose that the previous question would be demanded upon this occasion. He would ask that gentleman why they expected that the sun would shine to-morrow? Why, simply because it had shone to-day and yesterday. Upon a former occasion, a pledge had been made in committee that the previous question would not be moved in the House on a particular bill. That pledge had been violated. A gentleman, when the bill came into the House, after having spoken an hour, and declared that the question was very plain, concluded by very politely moving the previous question.

After a few additional remarks in opposition to the principle of the previous question, and the manner in which it had been exercised, he concluded by expressing the hope that the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole would not prevail.

Mr. BOON remarked, that notwithstanding the lecture which had just been delivered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE,] he, Mr. B., was a previous question man; and as to the pledges to which reference was made, that the previous question should not be demanded upon a particular bill, he knew nothing of it, and desired to be excluded from all such pledges. There never was, in his opinion, a more fit occasion than the present for enforcing the previous question. If the people of the country could be present, and witness the useless debates in that House, they would themselves demand the previous question more often than it was done by members on that floor. The motion before the House was a preliminary one. It was simply whether a measure should be discussed, if at all, in committee or in the House. He was for coming up to the point; he would toe the mark; and, in order at once to settle this unimportant preliminary question, which was occupying unnecessarily the time of the House, he moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded: Ayes 115, noes 66.

Mr. ROBERTSON called for the yeas and nays on the previous question; which were ordered, and were:

So the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill referred to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked that the Clerk should read a letter which he sent to the Chair from the cashier of one of the deposit banks in Boston to the Secretary of the Treasury. It would be seen that the branch bank at Boston had refused to redeem the notes of the other branches of the Bank of the United States, while the deposit banks were compelled to receive them in payment of bonds. He said he had not been permitted under the rule to go into this explanation before, but he would now state that, if other branches should act in the same way, the notes of the interior branches must soon be in the hands of the brokers, from whom they would be purchased at a discount, and merely for the purpose of paying bonds. If the other branches followed this example, the notes of the United States issued in the interior would be employed entirely for this purpose. If such may be the condition of things on the Atlantic, it might well be imagined what embarrassments would exist at our land offices in the interior. But if all the branches act as the branch in Boston is represented to have done, and refuse to redeem all notes, except those issued at their offices, where, he asked of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] where were the notes of branches no longer in existence to be redeemed? He was surprised at the opposition to this measure: a similar one was adopted in 1812, almost, he might even say quite, unanimously; but he hoped that, when the question was properly understood, the House would see the propriety of acting promptly in repealing the section, and removing all doubt upon the subject.

The following is the letter referred to:

Copy of a letter from the cashier of the Commonwealth Bank of Boston to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated Boston, March 18, 1836.

SIR: Yours of the 14th instant is at hand. In answer to the last paragraph, viz: "I will thank you to inform me how, and in what case, the question can arise in your bank, as it has been presumed that the payments for duties have been and will be paid chiefly, if not entirely, by checks on your own, or other city banks."

Heretofore, the branch bank in this city has redeemed the bills of the United States Bank, drawn here by regular course of business, consequently making them equal to the city bank bills; being, therefore, no difference in value, the payments to Government have been made generally in checks and bills of the city banks. But this branch of the United States Bank now refused to redeem any bill but of their own issue, and consequently every other city bank refuses to receive them. This depreciates in value all the United States bills issued elsewhere, and they must be negotiated by brokers, and purchased for the purpose of paying debts due to the Government. The rate of exchange will probably cause them to be remitted from one city to another, when money is scarce, and to be placed in the hands of the bond payers, to whom they will be equal to specie, although payable at a distant part of the country, and for all other purposes of less value. It was to guard, if possible, against this probable contingency, that I addressed the Department.

Respectfully,

After some conversation between Messrs. ADAMS, CAMBRELENG, and the CHAIR, as to the position which the bill occupied, since the vote discharging the Committee of the Whole from its consideration, the hour arrived for proceeding with the special order of the day.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

The question being on the motion of Mr. BELL to strike out the following clause:

"For improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, sixty-seven thousand dollars."

Contested Election.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BELL resumed his remarks on the subject, and, after speaking about three hours, concluded by thanking the committee for the indulgence which they had extended to him during his protracted remarks.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, then obtained the floor, and the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 24.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then, pursuant to the resolution adopted on Saturday, the 19th of March, proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election for the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina.

The report of the majority of the committee was in favor of the petitioner, David Newland, and concluded by the following resolution:

Resolved, That James Graham is not entitled to a seat in this House, and that David Newland is entitled to a seat in this House."

Mr. GRAHAM moved the following amendment thereto: Strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

"That the depositions which have been communicated to the House by the Speaker, and laid on the table, since the report of the Committee of Elections was made, wherever taken upon due notice, may be received by the House as testimony in this case," (concluding by the names of the voters.)

Mr. NEWLAND (the petitioner) hoped his honorable opponent would furnish some reasons why the resolution should be stricken out. He did not rise to make a speech, but merely to invoke the House not to adopt the resolution of the sitting member, unless some good and sufficient reasons could be given by him for so doing.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. McKAY inquired if those depositions had all been taken since the committee refused the application for further time, because if they were taken subsequently to that refusal, he should think the House would not be disposed to consider them as part of the evidence in the case. He should also be glad to know whether the notices for taking that testimony were given before the decision of the committee, or subsequently.

Mr. GRAHAM (the sitting member) stated that the notice was given after the committee had refused further time. The committee refused time about the middle of January. The committee said the application for time must be made in writing. He gave it in writing; but during the time it was under consideration, he (Mr. G.) was taken sick, and remained sick about ten days or two weeks; and about the last of January he was informed that no more depositions would be received by the committee. He considered it an act of gross injustice, not only to himself, but to the people of his district, and he resolved on taking further depositions, and gave notice accordingly to his agents; and he was ready and willing to prove that the petitioner not only had ample notice, but that he instructed his agents not to cross-examine the witnesses. He asked nothing but strict justice. He did not ask any testimony to be received, unless the petitioner had full, ample, and satisfactory notice of the time and place of taking it. The testimony was there full and complete, and he did hope that, under those circumstances, the House would not reject the testimony of the people speaking in their own behalf.

Mr. NEWLAND said the notice that the sitting member had served on him in this case was received about the 24th of January, a full half month after the committee had decided that they would not receive any further testimony, and that notice called upon him to be at home in eleven days from that time, for the purpose of cross-examining those witnesses. The sitting member had told the committee and the House that a paramount duty called him to Washington at the first of the session. He (the petitioner) came on also, expecting that no further testimony would be taken; the subject came up in committee, and not a word was said by the sitting member about further time; but after the gentleman had examined the testimony, he objected to it, and Mr. N. never knew a lawyer to object to testimony unless it was against him. The committee told the gentleman he could not have further time; but after a half month had elapsed, the sitting member gave him notice that he intended to take further depositions, and to take depositions, too, at places some hundred miles apart on the same day. He thought no precedent could be found for this kind of procedure. The gentleman had referred to depositions on your table, (which was to Mr. N. perfectly strange, for he never had seen them,) by which he was going to prove that the petitioner had not only ample notice, but that he had instructed his agents not to cross-examine the witnesses. Now, the truth was, when the committee decided that they would receive no further testimony, Mr. N. had received a letter from a friend of his, who said he had discovered several illegal votes which were given to the sitting member, and asked to be authorized to take depositions to prove the fact; but Mr. N. frankly informed him that he could not authorize him to take further testimony. This was the truth, and the whole truth; and if he was to be censured for acting honestly, it was his misfortune, not his fault.

Mr. MAURY feared that gentlemen labored under a misapprehension in regard to the point decided by the committee. The application made for further time to take depositions was decided against the sitting member; but to receive the depositions now before them was a distinct proposition. The sitting member asked to be allowed further time, and the committee refused to grant that specific application. They did not decide that additional testimony would not be received, but that further time to the 1st of March would not be allowed, because it would be doing injustice to the petitioner to keep him on expenses. They did not decide, that if testimony came forward in the mean time, taken under the laws of North Carolina, that it would be rejected. Some time in January, he did not know whether before or after the decision of the committee, depositions taken in behalf of the petitioner were received by the committee. But suppose the committee decided that no further time would be allowed; the committee was not the ultimate arbiter of questions of that kind; the House of Representatives was the tribunal before whom the question was to be decided. Sir, there are depositions which had been lying three or four weeks on your table, which were communicated from the Speaker's chair, and the House had ordered them to be printed; there was testimony which the sitting member had asserted was taken in conformity to the laws of North Carolina, and with due notice given, depositions of men of character, not to be impeached, asserting positive facts, and facts in which themselves were concerned; and would the House refuse to receive it? Would the House sanction a thing of this kind? He asked, why had the petitioner written to his agents not to attend to cross-examine the witnesses? Was he apprehensive that he might be estopped? If the petitioner came there, claiming a seat, he must think he was legally entitled to it; then he ought to be in favor of giving ample range to the taking of depositions.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, said, if the present amendment was adopted, it would cut off the conclusion

H. OF R.]

Contested Election.

to which the committee had come. He wanted to hear all the testimony he possibly could, to come to a correct conclusion; but he was not in favor of cutting off the conclusion to which the committee had come by this amendment. He hoped a separate proposition would be made, so as to leave the committee's report as it was. He wanted to vote that all the depositions be taken which could be taken; but he wanted to vote on a separate proposition, so that they would have something left after that vote was taken. The subject ought certainly to be left in some tangible manner, so that they might refer it back to the committee if necessary.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said it seemed to him that the resolution now offered by the honorable sitting member could not be adopted, consistently with the decision made by the House a few days ago. The resolution proposed that we should receive testimony taken after the Committee of Elections had decided that they would not receive any additional testimony. It would be recollected that, shortly after the commencement of the session of Congress, the petitioner addressed his petition here, claiming his right to a seat in this House. The petition, with the depositions in the case, were referred to the Committee of Elections. The parties proceeded to try their cause before the committee; and about the middle of January, after six weeks of the session had elapsed, the sitting member applied for time to take further testimony. The committee denied, and, as he thought, very properly denied, this application. Whether the sitting member was induced to make this application at that late day from a presentiment that the report of the committee would be unfavorable to him, he would not undertake to say, as he did not know the fact. A report was made to the House, adverse to the sitting member, and then the honorable sitting member, or some other gentleman, by way of appeal from the decision of that committee, refusing to give him further time, moved to recommit the whole subject to the Committee of Elections, to the end that the sitting member might have further time to take testimony.

The justice and injustice, the reasonableness and unreasonableness, of recommitting the case, for the purpose of receiving supplemental testimony, was here debated for several days, and the House, by a large majority, refused to recommit the case for the purpose of hearing new testimony, and thus most clearly and emphatically confirmed the previous decision of the committee. The case was then set down as a special order for this day. The reports and the evidence of the parties, as adduced before the committee and received by them, together with such extracts from the constitution and laws of North Carolina as relate to the matter, were ordered to be printed and laid upon our tables; and gentlemen, when they came here this morning, had a right to suppose that they were to try the case under the law and the testimony before them; when, all at once, the honorable sitting member introduced the resolution now under consideration.

Mr. V. said he could not see how, if we had any regard to consistency, we could adopt the resolution. It proposed that certain depositions should here be received, which were not only taken after the decision of the committee, (which had thus been sanctioned by the House,) that no further testimony should be received, but had been promulgated; but the notice for taking which was served upon the petitioner after the decision of the committee against taking further testimony was made public. The notice then was given, and the depositions were taken, in the very teeth of the decision of the committee—a decision, too, which this House had held to be just and proper. What would we say by adopting the resolution under consideration? Why, sir, we would exhibit ourselves in the most inconsistent and unenviable position of first declaring that the parties should not have further time after the middle of January to take additional testimony, and then deciding that if the parties, after the middle of January, and in defiance of a decision of the committee, which we had confirmed, proceeded to take additional testimony, we would here receive it! He hardly supposed that a majority of this House was prepared to exhibit such a spectacle of instability and inconsistency to the nation. He could not conceive how any gentleman who voted with the majority on the motion to recommit, could, with the least semblance of consistency, vote for the resolution now before the House.

He knew that many arguments, popular at first blush, would be urged against the view he was taking. Some had already been urged by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAURY,] who said it was hard, very hard, that depositions which told the truth should be excluded. If this argument, in the naked abstract form in which it is urged here, should be deemed sound in contests, either here or in courts of justice, it would be more than idle longer to talk about the existence of salutary rules of practice and proceedings, which promote the great ends of justice. Every consideration of justice and expediency required that there should be some time in every controversy, when testimony should be considered as closed; otherwise a party might enter upon trial, calculate upon the weakness of his adversary's cause, and then, when disappointed as to the strength of it, he might move for further time to take testimony, in order to atone for the too sanguine temperament with which he commenced the trial. The argument of hardship, however forcible in some cases, had not much force here, when we recurred to the prominent circumstances of the case, so far as they regarded this question.

The sitting member had had more than sixty days for taking testimony, before the session of Congress. He had had six weeks here before he expressed a desire to take other evidence, and all that time proceeding with his case before the committee. He waited until the matter should, in justice to the electors of the district, have been decided. His laches were entirely inexcusable. Reason and justice protested against the new movement made by him after such a lapse of time. It was the policy of all intelligent equity tribunals to guard against the mischievous protraction of controversies which would ensue, if parties could, in the last stages of a cause, be permitted to go back and take evidence according to the exigency of the case. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. CLAIRBORNE] had, a few days ago, told us what a court of chancery would do in such a case as this. He knew not what such courts would do in Virginia, but he could say, that in the State which he had the honor in part to represent, a party in chancery was obliged, before he commenced taking his testimony, to serve his adversary with a notice containing the names of all his witnesses, so as to prevent him from speculating upon the chance of getting along with one portion of testimony before he resorted to another, and to prevent the delay consequent upon the practice of hunting, at a late stage, new testimony, according as the case pinches. He certainly could not see that the committee had made a hard or oppressive decision to the sitting member, when they refused to receive new testimony, or give time to take new testimony after the middle of January; and he would, in conclusion, repeat, that he could not perceive how we could, consistently with our former decision, receive these depositions, thus taken, after the decision of the committee was announced.

Mr. HARDIN said, if he understood the question, it was whether the depositions printed by order of the House, and on every gentleman's table, were to be considered by each member as evidence now before him, and as evidence to make up an opinion by. He, for one, would receive evidence from any quarter he could obtain it, if he believed in its truth; and whether he got it from the arguments of gentlemen, or from evidence legally taken, he was willing to receive it. Before they decided, it would be necessary to call attention to the facts. The notice for taking testimony, served by the petitioner on the sitting member, was on the 2d of October, which left about two months for taking testimony, up to the meeting of Congress. It was not certainly to be expected that the sitting member should take depositions until the petitioner began to take them. Now, he would ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERFOEL,] whose State had a more enlightened judiciary than any other, whether it was incumbent on a defendant to take any depositions until the complainant should take rule. The first notice the sitting member received for taking depositions was on the 19th of October, and on the 29th of that month the first depositions were taken, leaving but a little over a month for taking all the depositions necessary. The next notice was for the 4th of November, and the next for the 23d day of November, and the fourth notice was for the 27th day of November. If gentlemen would examine, they would discover the situation of the sitting member. He would ask the House, where was the time the sitting member had for taking testimony, when the first notice for taking evidence was not given until a month before the meeting of Congress?

Mr. H. said these facts proved the hardship of the case of the sitting member; for he was compelled to set out for Washington at a given time, whereas the petitioner might have remained as long as he pleased, so long as he came here any time within the two years. Of this advantage he availed himself; for he continued to take testimony after the sitting member left home. He hoped they should find the gentleman from New York carrying out the principle he had laid down, which was a correct one, and then all the testimony under the head of "sundries," or "sundry other persons," in the petitioner's notices, would be excluded. Each witness, the gentleman laid down, must be specified; so said Mr. H., and that was sound doctrine. Apply it, and all the petitioner's depositions but four must then be struck out. He again repeated that, from the large extent of the district, and his being compelled to leave home to take his seat in Congress, the sitting member had not been allowed sufficient time.

He denied that the House had, by its vote to refuse further time, or to recommit for further time, indicated its indisposition to receive the depositions sent in and laid on the table since the report of the committee was made. On the contrary, if any thing was indicated by that vote, it was that they would receive it, and such was the express tenor of the remarks made at the time (on Saturday last) by a gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GLASCOCK,] who said he was prepared to receive and consider all the depositions since sent in, provided they had been taken agreeably to the constitution and laws of North Carolina. He hoped the House would receive the testimony, and, in deciding upon the merits of the controversy, would bear in mind that it was a question with the people of North Carolina, rather than between the two gentlemen contesting for the seat.

Mr. HAWES replied, by contending that the notice given by the petitioner to the sitting member was sufficient. He thought this the plainest proposition ever submitted to a deliberative body. The whole subject had been referred to an organized standing committee of the House, whose decision he felt bound to respect. Besides, the sitting member made no application for further time to take additional depositions, until he had ascertained that the testimony already before the committee would give his opponent the seat. He contrasted the conduct of the two candidates. While one disapproved the decision of the committee, the other (the petitioner) submitted to it, and immediately wrote off to his agents to take no more testimony for him. These were the facts; on the 14th January, the committee informed both gentlemen that they should take no further testimony; and sixteen days after that, on the 30th January, the sitting member gave notice that he should proceed to take further testimony, eleven days afterwards, in North Carolina. Mr. H. should vote against the reception of this testimony by the House, and sustain the report of the committee, which he believed was founded on the strictest justice.

Mr. GRAHAM explained, that he made his application to the committee for an extension of time before he had made a review of the testimony.

Mr. LANE adverted to the decision of the committee, which, according to his understanding of it, was this: not that the sitting member should not take additional depositions, but that no further time should be allowed by the committee, upon which they would act. The committee had not decided that further testimony should not be taken, but that they would give no further time, and that the party would run the hazard of taking it without having the action of the committee thereon. He should be glad to know from some one of the committee if he was correct or not.

Mr. MAURY confirmed his interpretation of the committee's decision, and referred to the report of the minority, as indicative of that sense of it.

Mr. SPEIGHT adverted to the equity practice in North Carolina; which was, that whenever a cause was set down for hearing, each party was thereafter barred from taking further testimony, without leave of court. He also stated the fact that the petitioner had, in consequence of the committee's decision, replied to, and rejected, the tender of additional depositions which had been offered to him.

Mr. NEWLAND gave a statement of the fact, that a gentleman of Haywood county had written to him, and informed him that he could procure evidence of bad votes in the sitting member's poll, but Mr. N. had replied, that in consequence of the committee's decision that the case was closed, he refused it. He had left no agents to act for him, as had been stated, except in one instance. The letter in question was a spontaneous offer.

Mr. SPEIGHT hoped the House would not delay the main question by a lengthy discussion on a mere incidental one; or if a decision of the House was required, that it would be considered as a substantive proposition, and not mixed up with the other and more material question.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, could not assent to the interpretation of the vote of the House made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERFOEL,] nor to that gentleman's view of the decision of the committee; for the refusal to give further time did not reject the consideration of additional testimony, and he was in favor of receiving it.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, would ask if any court ever did admit testimony taken under such circumstances as this? He cared not so much what the law or practice of North Carolina or any other State might be; but, judging it by common law, or by the rules of common sense, no other construction could be put upon the decision of the committee, than that their rejection of the application for further time closed the case, and no testimony taken after that ought to be received. A contrary interpretation would keep open this investigation to an unlimited extent, and it could never be decided at all; for, as it stood, the additional testimony was purely of an ex parte character, and opportunity would have to be given to the petitioner to rebut it. The decision that no further time would be given to take additional testimony inevitably carried with it the decision that no further testimony would be received. They were, in fact, in one and the same decision.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD thought the additional testimony should be considered with the report itself. He should have preferred a different course to what the House was taking, namely, to have considered and decided upon each deposition, without being trammelled by the resolutions; and also, if possible, to have avoided all technical points. Mr. S. argued the point at some length, that the additional testimony ought to be allowed to come in, and that it would be an act of great injustice to the sitting member to reject it. He also referred to the depositions, and the informal character of the notices served on the sitting member by the petitioner.

Mr. UNDERWOOD remarked, that there being no law of Congress, and the constitution of the United States being silent on the subject, the House was bound by a fair construction of the constitution and laws of the State wherein a contested election occurred. They referred the matter, as they did all others, to one of their own committees, who were directed to examine the testimony and report upon it. But where was the law or rule of the House in which such a doctrine was laid down as that the House must be bound by any decision of the committee? There was none, neither express, by implication, nor by practice. But upon what ground had the committee decided? Upon mere technical grounds only. He was at a loss to see upon what just ground the subsequent testimony should be rejected, for it had not only all the solemnities of an oath, sworn also before a competent tribunal, but had been taken, so far as he believed, agreeably to the requisitions of the law of the State interested in the controversy. Mr. U. cited various supposed cases applicable to the point in question, and in support of the argument that the testimony ought to be received.

He said he considered that the committee had departed from its duty in not reporting the application of the sitting member for further time to the House, and that they had gone beyond their powers in deciding the question. He could, however, never consent to the doctrine that the House were to be bound and tied up by the action of its own committees, all of whose proceedings were, at most, only of a recommendatory or incipient character.

Mr. LINCOLN considered the amendment of Mr. GRAHAM to be entirely out of order, as an amendment to the resolution of the committee, because it might prevent the action of the House altogether on the latter. Mr. L. referred, at considerable length, to the practice of Congress in cases of contested elections, where the power of the House was different than in all other matters, since their power was not a delegated legislation on the subject, the constitution making them the sole judges. Assuming the fact that the additional testimony was unexceptionable in point of form, and in conformity with the laws of North Carolina, he had heard no reason, nor could he conceive any, why it should be excluded. If the petitioner had not investigated it, the fault was his own, for there was nothing to show that he had not had every opportunity that he could desire. The question then arose, when was the commencement of the trial? It was not in the investigation before the committee, but in that House. The committee were not the triers, but the House. The opponents to this argument would make the House a mere court of errors, instead of possessing the original and sole jurisdiction. The proceedings before the committee were merely preliminary, growing out of the order of business; but the only tribunal before which the matter could be fully and finally acted on was the House. So said the constitution. That instrument said not a word about the committee, but that the House should be the judge. Why, the House might have taken up the subject at any moment, or have discharged the committee from its further consideration, and taken the subject into their own hands. Every thing that took place in the committee was strictly and constitutionally prior to the commencement of the trial, which began for the first time when it was taken up in that House.

Mr. LANE had yet heard no argument by which this testimony should be received, according to the known rules of evidence: If it could not be so received, then it ought to be rejected. He contended that this testimony had not been taken in pursuance of those rules, and cited the practice of the courts of Kentucky and other States in proof of that fact, entering also into a review of the circumstances under which it was taken. Mr. L. was opposed to the reception of this testimony, because it would be in violation of all the known rules of law, at variance with the judgment of the committee, and contrary to the decision of the House a few days ago.

Mr. GRAVES then obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment; which was carried, and

The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 25.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. HALL, of Vermont, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, asked leave to make a report on behalf of the minority of that committee, on that part of the President's message relative to incendiary publications.

On rising, Mr. HALL said it was proper he should precede the report he was about to submit with a brief statement. About the first or second week of the session, when the President's message was dissected by the resolutions of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] so much of it as related to the Post Office Department, including the subject of incendiary publications, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The committee took the subject into immediate consideration, and in the course of some two or three weeks came to the conclusion, by a vote of 6 to 3, in favor of the constitutionality and expediency of legislation, to restrain the mail circulation of these publications. The committee then proceeded to discuss various bills proposed by different members of the committee, and continued the discussion from week to week, and time to time, until about three weeks since, when a majority not being able to agree on any mode of legislation, the whole subject was, by vote of the majority, laid on the table of the committee, with the view, as he (Mr. H.) understood, of waiting the action of the Senate, and getting further light on the subject.

Mr. H. said he did not complain of this decision of the committee, and he was ready to accord to the majority the same upright motives which he would claim for himself. They doubtless supposed there was a reasonable probability of their eventually coming to an agreement. But, believing as he did that the more light gentlemen got, the more difficulty they would find in agreeing on a bill, he could not help considering the subject as disposed of for the session. Whether that were the case or not, the minority of the committee, having come to the conclusion that Congress possessed no constitutional power to pass any law on the subject, were through with their inquiries, had completed their investigation, and were ready to report; and the nature of their report could not be affected by any further action, or want of action, of the majority. This report of the minority was now, and must continue to be, that Congress had no power to act on the subject.

Mr. H. said the position of the minority was very peculiar. The subject referred to the committee was one of much interest. The President, in his message, had recommended legislation to Congress; his argument, the argument of the Postmaster General, and that of a distinguished Senator, the chairman of a committee of another body, all in favor of legislation, had been printed, laid on our tables, and read by every member. In this hall not a word, not a whisper, had been heard in opposition to the principles thus promulgated. In the face of this official array of ingenious argument, the minority, acting under the oath they had taken to support the constitution of the United States, had felt it to be their imperious duty to oppose in committee every form of legislation which had been proposed. Under these circumstances, they felt that their position was one of much responsibility; that their course of action, and perhaps their motives, were liable to misapprehension, misconception, possibly to unjust imputation. It was for the purpose of justifying themselves to the House for the course they had felt it their duty to take, that he sent to the Chair a statement of their views, and would ask permission of the House that it be laid on the table and printed. Mr. H. said he only desired further to say that the report of the minority did not go into an examination of the character of the publications specified in the message, but was an argument to show that, whatever might be their character, Congress had no constitutional power over them.

Mr. SPEIGHT inquired of his colleague, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. CONNOR], if the majority of the committee had determined to make a report on this subject, or whether any action had taken place in committee which would authorize the report proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. CONNOR (chairman of the committee) was not aware, until the gentleman from Vermont had got half through his remarks, that it was the intention of the minority of the committee to present their views to the House. He did not object individually to this course, however much it might be out of order. The important subject alluded to had occupied much of the time and attention of the committee. He did not desire to go into a minute detail of the proceedings of the committee. He would say, however, that about two weeks since the subject had been laid on the table; and although he could not say certainly, yet he trusted that the majority would shortly be able to make a report. It had required but one vote, for weeks and months past, to enable them to report. He repeated that the course which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HALL] had taken was unknown to him until he had heard a part of his remarks that day. He believed it was also unknown to the other members of the committee, with perhaps two or three exceptions. Nothing had been said in the committee about a report from the minority. He was desirous that something should be done. Six of the nine members of the committee were of the opinion that the constitution warranted legislation on the subject; and the only difficulty which had occurred was as to the details of the bill which should be reported. The course of the gentleman from Vermont was novel and unprecedented in legislation, so far as his experience went. In conclusion, he repeated the hope that a majority of the committee would ere long be able to unite upon some specific measure, and report the same to the House.

Mr. SPEIGHT had accomplished his object. The course of the gentleman from Vermont was most unprecedented. A minority, before any final action on the part of the committee, had stepped forth with a report, not only in advance of any report from the majority, but before any decision of the committee upon the subject before it. He therefore objected to the reception of this paper.

Mr. BRIGGS, being a member of the committee, desired to say a few words, in order to remove any false impressions as to the action of the committee on this subject. There had been no collisions, no discord, nothing to interrupt the good feelings which had existed in the committee. He was proceeding to state particularly the course of the committee upon the subject to which reference had been made, when

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, rose to a question of order. He desired to know what was the question before the House.

The CHAIR said that no question could be debated unless in possession of the House; and this document, not having been received, could not be discussed. The paper, not being in the character of a report from a committee, could only be received by leave of the House.

Mr. BRIGGS asked leave to proceed in his remarks; which was objected to.

Mr. HALL moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to submit the paper to which he had referred; which was negatived.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then, pursuant to the resolution adopted on Saturday, the 19th of March, proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election for the 12th congressional district of North Carolina.

The report of a majority of the committee was in favor of the petitioner, David Newland, and concluded by the following resolution:

Resolved, That James Graham is not entitled to a seat in this House, and that David Newland is entitled to a seat in this House."

Mr. GRAHAM moved the following amendment thereto: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

"That the depositions which have been communicated to the House by the Speaker, and laid on the table, since the report of the Committee of Elections was made, wherever taken upon due notice, shall be received by the House as testimony in this case," (concluding with the names of the voters.)

Mr. G. modified his motion, by moving the foregoing amendment as an addition to the resolution of the committee.

Mr. GRAVES was entitled to the floor, but gave way to

Mr. HARD, who moved that the report be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. H. said the motion he had just submitted he hoped would be adopted by the unanimous assent of the House. He could not but believe that every gentleman who desired a speedy legal decision of this contested election would, when he understood the design of the motion, yield it his cordial support. It is intended to bring directly before the House, and for its immediate action, the whole case, not only the additional testimony on our tables, but the several points and propositions which were decided in committee, but which do not appear in the majority report.

Hitherto the House has been exclusively engaged in fruitless debates upon preliminary questions, without advancing one step towards a final decision. The greatest portion of the time, since the report was made, has been consumed in the extraordinary and unusual attempt, by the petitioner's friends, to introduce counsel on this floor. By the kindness of the majority in this House

Contested Election.

we have had three days allowed us, by special appointment, to examine and settle all the important and constitutional questions involved in this contest, and one of these has already been consumed in the thus far unsuccessful appeal to the liberality and justice of the House for the adoption, upon their legal merits, of the new depositions before us. From what has occurred during the debate yesterday, and from what may be gathered from the signs of events that are passing, there appears no probability that the appeal will be sustained. The sitting member must prepare himself to rest his defence upon the evidence already reported, and leave the justice of the denial to the decision of the people of the district, unless the House can be prevailed on to adopt the course recommended in this motion. To the rights of the sitting member our time is precious, if we may credit report; report, too, emanating from the highest political authority in this House—authority which we dare not question. The day of debate on this important and interesting subject is about to be closed. Yes, sir, to-morrow evening, we are informed, the previous question will be sprung upon us. The threat has been made by some of the most influential personages in this hall, gentlemen who control the destinies of legislation here, that to-morrow evening will have completed the last day of grace in this matter; that then this debate must and shall be concluded. I do not allude to this menace with an intention of complaining or of entering my protest. It would ill become me, humble as my influence is here, to act the censor over the movements or policy of the majority. They have the power in their own hands; the rules of this House have placed it there; they have the right to use it at discretion, and they must bear the responsibility of its abuse. The previous question was designed to arrest debate, only when an abuse of its rights and privileges was threatened. It never was intended to prohibit its liberal and reasonable exercise. The freedom of debate is a sacred constitutional prerogative, guaranteed to every member upon this floor, and cannot be abridged by a wanton execution of the rules and orders of this House. I have alluded to these threats by way of admonition to the minority, and to urge the necessity of redeeming time that is ours by grace, in bringing this matter immediately before the House in the manner proposed by the motion, in order to take its sense upon every distinct proposition separately, that we may know, and the people of North Carolina may know, upon what principle this case has been decided.

What is the question before us? It is not one whose decision is confined to the interests of one or two individuals. It is not one that is circumscribed in its operation by the sole interests of the two individuals who are the unfortunate instruments of this controversy. If it were, then the error that might result from haste and precipitate action, though it might inflict personal injustice, would be far less pernicious in its consequences than is now apprehended. It is not a question of ordinary moment; it regards the elective franchise of the sovereign State of North Carolina. Its decision will touch the rights and immunities of the whole American people. It will affect not only the rights and honor of a seat on this floor, but the constitutional rights and powers of a sovereign State, and the constitutional rights and powers of Congress itself.

While sitting in judgment upon the qualifications and election of one of our peers, each individual occupies a high and fearfully responsible station; and when deciding the question, we are acting in the capacity of the highest judicial tribunal known to the constitution; and in settling all such disputes we are required to give construction to the constitution and laws of the State immediately interested, the constitution and laws of the United States, and the duties and powers of the body to which we belong. How important, then, fearfully important, does it become, that every decision we make should be stamped with caution, candor, and patient deliberation. I have been at a loss to comprehend the meaning of some honorable gentlemen who have denounced, with seeming triumph, all legal forms and legal rules; I have been shocked, too, with the haste and precipitation with which some have endeavored to force this case through. If there are any questions which are referred to us, that require more care and more thorough and cautious examination than others, they are those which call in question the validity of elections; if there are any questions which require distinctiveness and certainty in our decisions, they are those which arise on an appeal from the people's decision in the election of their representatives. A proper regard to the records of our own body, and a laudable desire to bestow clearness and intelligence on our proceedings, and a duty we owe to those who may succeed us, in giving enlightened authority to our decisions, should prompt all of us to aim at judicial order and system. To those who esteem so lightly legal forms, I would cite the views of one of the ablest jurists and constitutional lawyers of this or any other age; one whom I am proud to say presided, with distinguished credit to himself and honor to the nation, over the highest judicial department of the proud State I have the honor in part to represent. I allude, sir, to that distinguished personage, James Kent, late Chancellor of the State of New York.

In his elementary discourse upon the constitutional privileges and powers of the two Houses of Congress, in that part which relates to the power which each House possesses over the election, return, and qualifications of its own members, he says: "It is requisite to preserve a pure and genuine representation, and to control the evils of irregular, corrupt, and tumultuous elections; and as each House acts in these cases in a judicial character, its decision, like the decisions in any other court of justice, ought to be regulated by known principles of law, and strictly adhered to, for the sake of uniformity and certainty." This is indeed high authority, clearly expressed. But, sir, we needed no higher authority than the experience of the past, to admonish us, by the most solemn regard to our constitutional duties, to act dispassionately and decide intelligibly on all questions whose decisions will form precedents and become laws for those that may succeed us.

The question before us, then, is one of a judicial character. It is an appeal, taken from the decision of the people of the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina. By that decision, in August last, they declared, through their legalized board of canvassers, selected for their intelligence and integrity, and sworn to fidelity and fairness in collecting the suffrages and declaring the result, that James Graham, the sitting member, was duly elected to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. They have furnished him with the highest legal and constitutional evidence of such election. They have been duly presented to you, sir, and you have approved of them, and admitted him to a seat on this floor.

From this decision the petitioner has appealed, alleging that he is entitled to the seat, as having received a majority of the legal votes in the district. To establish this, he charges that injustice has been done him: 1st, by allowing illegal votes to be given to the sitting member; and, 2d, by rejecting legal votes given and intended for him. The sitting member denies his right, and contends that a greater number of illegal votes has been given for the petitioner than for him. This is the issue before us.

To sustain his complaint, the petitioner has furnished

MARCH 25, 1856.]

Contested Election.

evidence, in form of depositions, of three irregularities, as is alleged, in conducting the elections: 1st. Illegal votes given the sitting member; 2d. Legal votes rejected, which were tendered for the petitioner; and, 3d. Votes given for him, illegally stricken from the polls; making, in all, as the majority of the committee has said, twenty-eight votes, which should be deducted from the sitting member's polls.

On the contrary, the sitting member answers these objections, as he thinks, by denying the illegality of these votes, or most of them; and alleges that the petitioner has received illegal votes greater in number than himself, and that the judges at one of the precincts allowed five votes to the petitioner that were given to a candidate for the State Legislature, and comes to this result: that thirty-three illegal votes were given to the petitioner, which, if deducted, would leave him a majority increased above that declared by the board of canvassers. In receiving this evidence, and deciding the several legal points which necessarily arise from this issue, frequent reference must be had to the constitution and election laws of North Carolina and the constitution of the United States. And here, sir, I ask, what are the powers of this House over this subject? The fifth section of the first article of the constitution of the United States declares "that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members." In the case before us there is no allegation of a want of constitutional qualification in the sitting member, nor is the legality of the return questioned. It is the regularity of the election that is brought in question; and in this character the case addresses itself to the more delicate and important, while it is the more doubtful, branch of our constitutional powers. Had the qualification of the sitting member been put in issue, or the validity of his return questioned, they might have presented a question which we could have disposed of without interfering with the immediate acts of the electors, or disturbing the freedom or quiet of the elective franchise. But when we dispute the election of the incumbent, we enter upon a fearful task—we take issue with the people themselves; and when we declare void the election, then, sir, do we reverse the decision of freemen, acting under high constitutional guarantees; and, unless our decisions are based upon sound and known principles of law, we act in defiance of their expressed will, and in violation of our constitutional guides.

The second section of the first article of the same constitution further provides "that the qualification of electors for a Representative in Congress shall be the same as is required for the electors of a member of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." What shall constitute, therefore, the specific qualifications for electors for a member of Congress in North Carolina, it is left to the constitution and laws of that State to regulate. By the eighth section of the constitution of the State of North Carolina, it is provided "that all freemen of twenty-one years of age, who have been inhabitants of any one county within the State twelve months immediately preceding the day of election, and shall have paid public taxes, shall be entitled to vote for a member of the House of Commons in the county where he resides," the House of Commons being the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. In this section will be found enumerated all the qualifications necessary to constitute a legal voter in that State, viz: 1st. Residence in the county at the time of voting; 2d. Residence in the State twelve months preceding the election; 3d. He must be twenty-one years of age; and, 4th. He must have paid public taxes. A difference of opinion exists among gentlemen of the delegation from North Carolina, on this floor, in regard to the constitutional import of that clause requiring residence in any county in the State twelve months immediately preceding the day of election. Some contend that it requires the voter to have resided in the State, and in the county where he votes, twelve months prior to the day of election; while others hold him a legal voter if he has resided in any county in the State, though he may not have resided in the county where he tenders his vote but one day. This last construction was assumed by the committee, and, I have no doubt, correctly. The phraseology is, to say the most of it, equivocal, and is open to judicial construction; and it is a well-settled and salutary rule, in the construction of laws touching the elective franchise, that, where two constructions may be applied, the one in restriction and the other in extension of the right of suffrage, the latter shall prevail. This, undoubtedly, furnishes a case in point. But whichever of the constructions be adopted, it makes a difference in regard to the evidence before us, in the actual majority, otherwise computed, of but two votes, so that the result would not be changed. In order to prepare this issue for a speedy, clear, and just decision, a decision that would be warranted by the law and the facts, and to aid the House in its deliberation and facilitate its action, you have sent out your committee, the Committee of Elections, to inquire of the truth of the facts in the case, and to settle the various questions of law that might arise; and you have required of them to report, in as clear and intelligible form as may be, a true and faithful history of their deliberations, and the various legal points connected with the case, together with a final result of their labors. The committee did take the case under advisement at an early period of the session. They had all the law and the facts before they came to a result, and a majority of the committee have found the issue in favor of the petitioner. A large minority of the committee have, however, come to a different result from the same facts, and have found the issue for the sitting member.

Now, sir, every gentleman is aware that a majority of members of this House are disposed to receive the regular report of a committee, made by a majority, as prima facie evidence of the truth of the facts stated in them, and are ready to adopt, without much investigation, the conclusion or resolution which they recommend. In general, or in many cases, this confidence would not be misplaced. Your committees are, or ought to be, the faithful organs of the House, in arranging facts and collecting information on the subjects submitted to them. In cases of contested elections, they act as your judicial commissioners, sent out to inquire of the truth of the matter of the petitions, and the evidence connected with it. When the report is made, it carries upon its face the character of a high and authoritative document, and, as such, should always set forth clearly, truly, and in judicial order, a history of their inquiries, so far as to embrace the points decided, and the law and the facts upon which the report is founded. If it do this, it will furnish every member with a brief, upon which he can found his own arguments, and from which he can draw his own conclusions, without being compelled to travel through the whole case. The committee who brought in the report before you were in possession of a few legal points upon which the whole case turned, and upon which distinctive decisions were made in committee; and yet, sir, I have searched this report in vain for a clear statement of these points, or the decisions made upon them. On the contrary, I find some misstatements of some of the decisions made there. In saying this, I trust I shall not be understood as imputing improper motives to the majority of the committee, or a single member of it. Such misstatements could not have otherwise arisen than through inadvertence and haste. I know, by personal knowledge, that the labor of the whole committee was perplexing. A mass of testimony was thrown before them, consisting of depositions, hastily drawn up, in manuscript form, embracing the affidavits of various persons to the same fact, scattered through every part of the voluminous mass, from which to collect, arrange, and apply to their appropriate subject each class of testimony, required the greatest care and patience. It could not have been expected, therefore, that clear, satisfactory, and intelligible conclusions could be attained without much toil and careful examination. How, then, sir, can it be hoped, without such a clear statement of the history of their deliberations, that this House, in three days' time, can arrive at truth which it has cost the committee three months' labor to discover?

What is the conclusion which the majority have reported? Why, that the sitting member is not entitled to his seat! and the petitioner is entitled to his seat. What reason do they assign for this conclusion? That nineteen illegal votes are given for the sitting member which should be deducted from his poll, and that six legal votes were tendered for the petitioner, and rejected by the judges, and that three votes had been wrongfully struck off from the Henderson polls. Have they told us upon what law or authority these votes are declared illegal? Have they referred you to, or stated, the evidence that established these facts? They have, indeed, referred you to the mass of documents before you. They have left you to hunt up your own proof, and then we are called upon to decide in three days, or the previous question shall be sprung upon us, when we shall be called upon to adopt these conclusions in gross, and adopt them, too, "by faith, and not by sight." Let us briefly examine the report before us.

The committee have said, in the majority report, that the sitting member had made an objection to the depositions, as inadmissible evidence of the facts stated in them; that the question was taken up and considered; that "the committee, being of opinion that the depositions were taken according to the laws of North Carolina upon the subject of contested elections, and there being no laws of Congress on the subject, and the usage being well established to allow depositions to be read, which had been taken and sworn to according to the laws of the State where the election had been held, decided they should be received."

In this short statement there are a number of errors and deficiencies, which, in what purports to be a documentary history of the proceedings in committee, are calculated to blind and mislead the House in arriving at the truth of the point in issue. In attempting to state, here, the objections raised by the sitting member to the admission of the depositions before us, the report is entirely silent on the most important point. The principal reason assigned by the sitting member for rejecting the depositions was not that they were inadmissible evidence of the facts stated in them, but that they had been taken in pursuance of notices insufficient and defective. The objection went to the validity of the proceedings in taking the evidence, not to the legality of the evidence itself. The report presents to the House an issue quite different from that tried in committee. It states a point on which the committee were unanimous, and has altogether omitted the main point. The strong objection which was brought against the proceedings was, that the notices which the petitioner served on the sitting member for taking the depositions were defective in form and substance, viz: they did not give him time enough; they neither set forth the names of the witnesses who were to be examined, nor did they set forth the names and residence of the electors whose votes were to be excluded, nor their particular disqualifications. These were important points in the case; they laid the foundation of all that protracted controversy about further time, which occupied so much of the time of the committee, and which has so long detained the House.

The report continues: "The committee were of opinion that, as the depositions were taken in conformity to the laws of North Carolina upon the subject of contested elections, and there being no laws of Congress on the subject," &c. Now, sir, what are the laws of North Carolina, conformably to which these depositions were taken? All the laws of North Carolina, which regulate the forms of proceedings in cases of contested elections, are comprised in one section, (Laws North Carolina, vol. 2, p. 826,) which reads thus: "That, from and after the passing of this act, it shall not be lawful for any person to vacate the seat of any member of the General Assembly, who has taken his seat, in consequence of the return of the sheriff of his county, certifying that he is duly elected, unless the person or persons who may intend to dispute such election shall give to the member or members whose election he or they intend to dispute, thirty days' notice, prior to the meeting of the General Assembly, of such his intention, with the grounds upon which the same will be disputed; and the same notice of the time and place, now required in taking depositions at law, shall also be required and proven on such investigation; and all affidavits taken without due notice as aforesaid, shall be deemed improper evidence, and not suffered to be read in such investigation."

While this section prescribes the length of time the notice shall allow, which, by referring to the other laws of North Carolina, we find is ten days, it is wholly silent as to those forms referred to in the objections of the sitting member. Where, then, are we to look for guides in regulating the forms and substance of these proceedings? Why, sir, I suppose, in the absence of any other express provisions, all will agree that we must look to this House for laws.

But the report informs us there are no laws of Congress. In one sense of the term law, this is true; but in the other more material and important sense, it is not true. It is true that Congress has no legislative existing law on these subjects, but it is not true that it has no law of its own, growing out of its parliamentary practice. This House has a number of adjudicated cases, which have arisen during the different periods of its history, in which these questions of specifications have been discussed and settled on a firm and uniform principle, viz: that before any testimony shall be taken to disqualify any elector that has given his vote, the name and residence of such electors, with the particular disqualification, shall be inserted in the notice, and served on the return member.

As early as the year 1796, in the case of Varnum, this House took the first step towards settling the forms it would require in notices for taking depositions in such cases. In that case (page 112, Clark and Hall) the petitioner prayed the House to vacate the seat of Varnum, on the ground of illegality of certain votes given to the sitting member. It alleged that certain persons voted for him by proxy. The petitioner did not set forth the names of the electors who voted by proxy; the committee to whom the matter of the petition was referred, applied to the House for instruction as to what kind of specifications were necessary to put the sitting member upon his answer. They reported the following resolution: "Resolved, That the allegation of Aaron Brown [the petitioner] as to persons not qualified to vote, is not sufficiently certain, and that the names of the persons objected to for want of sufficient qualifications ought to be set forth prior to the time of taking testimony." The report of this case comes to us in a form so meager, that it does not give the final action of the House upon this resolution; but the sequel affords us a presumption that it was sustained, as the petitioner failed to sustain his petition, and the sitting member retained his seat. This was among the earliest efforts of this House to establish rules of steady and uniform application in the mode of conducting contested cases. Since this decision, the principle has been adhered to as a fixed and unwavering rule, from which it has not permitted a solitary departure.

Contested Election.

A number of other cases might be cited to the same point, were it necessary, as the case of Eaton & Scott, Rutherford vs. Morgan, and Biddle vs. Richards. With these cases before us, with what propriety can we say that Congress has no law to regulate such proceedings? By overlooking these principles, the committee were led to a decision by which the sitting member was deprived of his legal and unquestionable right to an extension of time to prepare himself for his defence. It was one of the most unfortunate decisions to the sitting member that has been made in the whole case, and involves the greatest injustice, and yet nothing of it appears in the report.

But, sir, there is another misstatement, unintentional no doubt, in the report, which has had a tendency to embarrass investigation, and produce injustice to the sitting member. The report proceeds to give the views of the committee on the application of the sitting member for further time. After the committee had overruled the objections as to the informality of the proceedings, he applied for further time to take his defensive evidence. This application was denied by a majority of the committee, and they say "they could find no precedent in which an application of a similar kind, if made at an earlier period, had been granted. It has been my good fortune to have found, among the reported cases of this House, five or six decisions where an extension of time was allowed on grounds much less meritorious than the present, and that, too, where the application was made at a much later period than the present. In some cases two, and in others three, months have been allowed the parties for collecting evidence after the committee had commenced the examination; while, in some cases, they have been allowed a whole vacation where good cause was shown. Applications for further time in these cases are analogous to motions to postpone a trial at law for the absence of material witnesses; it is addressed to the discretion of the court, and, on reasonable cause shown, is seldom denied. The only difference that I can perceive between the two cases is, the case before us presents the stronger claim. We are sitting here endeavoring to purge the polls of illegal votes, and it would ill become us, as judges, to shut out light or withhold evidence. The sitting member should have been allowed further time.

The next error in the report is contained in that part which professes to state the circumstances connected with the three votes which the judges at Asheville deducted from the petitioner's polls. The report wholly fails to afford us the law or the facts in the case. The committee (the majority) content themselves by giving a negative reason why the judges ought not to have made the deduction. They do not tell what was, but what was not, the law of North Carolina, and are wholly silent about the facts. That the House may perceive the mystery which the report throws over the case, I beg to give a brief sketch of that transaction, and the law of North Carolina upon which these proceedings were had.

By the law of North Carolina, one of the qualifications of a legal voter is actual residence in the county where he resides, as I have before stated, (2 sec. 2 vol. N. C. L., p. 1224.) At the Henderson precincts, in Buncombe county, three persons presented themselves at the polls, and tendered their votes. They resided in Yancey county, in the same congressional district. As it had been the practice in some parts of the State to permit a person to vote in any county in the district, provided he resided in the district, it was agreed by the judges that they might vote, and they would note opposite their names "Yancey," and certify the facts upon the scrolls, or poll lists, and return them to the central judges at Asheville; and if they adjudged that a person could vote out of the county of his residence, then the three votes were to remain good; but if they adjudged otherwise, then the votes were to be deducted. The certificate was made on the scrolls, and signed by the judges, that the three persons lived in Yancey. This was sent to the judges at Asheville, and, on further explanation by one of the recording clerks, N. Blackstock, who attended the Henderson precincts, where the votes were received, the judges deducted the three votes. These facts all appear by the depositions taken by the petitioner. The committee say this deduction was unauthorized by the laws of North Carolina. Suppose they had not the power to strike out these votes: still, if we are satisfied by the evidence that these three persons did vote illegally, we should be bound, by the same rule that has governed the committee in striking out all non-resident votes, to deduct them here, if the judges had not done so. These are the facts in the case, yet the committee say the votes ought to be counted. I shall state but two more errors, and close the review.

The next class of voters referred to in the report are six, which are said to have been tendered to the inspectors or judges, for the petitioner, and by them rejected. This case presents one of the extraordinary claims, and involves the most singular and novel principle in the whole case; and yet the report has devoted two lines only upon it. They are in these words: "To this [the before-mentioned three votes] the committee have added five votes (in list A) as having been legally offered for the petitioner, and illegally refused." The law of North Carolina provides that "before any person shall be allowed to vote, he shall, if required, make oath that he is qualified according to the constitution, and has not voted before at the same election." By this provision it is made the duty of the judges to refuse the vote of any individual of doubtful qualifications. In this they act judicially, and may persist in their refusal unless the elector shall tender the legal oath. The duties and rights of both the judges and electors are made plain. If the latter desires to vote, and the former doubts his legal qualification, the elector has only to tender his oath, and then it is peremptory on the judge to receive his vote, provided his oath will establish his qualification.

At the Franklin precinct, in Macon county, on canvassing the votes there, five votes were found in the Commons box with the name of David Newland, the petitioner, on each, but nothing to designate for what office they were intended. The witness states that there were a number of votes for members of the State Legislature found in the Congress box. The judges changed these votes, placing the five votes with the name of David Newland in the Congress box, and counted them for the petitioner. The report attempts to give the evidence in this case, but has clearly mistaken it, or misstated the facts. It charges the judges with the mistake in placing Newland's votes in the wrong box. This charge is not correct, as is shown by the same report. It states that the ballot-boxes for members of Congress and State officers were seven or eight feet apart. In North Carolina each ballot-box is kept by separate sets of judges. The voter presents his vote rolled up so as to conceal the name, and, I am informed, there is no designation of office on the vote. How, then, was it possible for the judges to make the mistake? He puts into his box (and there is only one within eight feet of him) the vote which is given him. It is not the judge who puts the vote in the box, but the person who hands him the vote, that must make the mistake. The report says: "In this case, then, the mistake having been made by one of the judges, and not by the voter, who had done every thing in his power toward a fair exercise of his privilege, the judges have considered it their duty to correct their mistake, and give the voter his vote." In this case the judges no doubt acted in good faith, and with honest and fair motives, but they were clearly wrong. This House has said in two of its reported cases that, where votes are given by ballot, the intention of the voter is known only by the box where he deposes his vote. In the case of Washburn vs. Ripley, (Clarke and Hall, page 679,) this principle is clearly settled, and, indeed, no other rule could be adopted with any prospect of preserving the elective franchise pure and incorruptible. If the course pursued by these judges were sanctioned, it would put it in the power of the ill-disposed to give as many votes for one candidate as there are ballot-boxes at the precincts where he votes. This House never will sanction such a practice.

Contested Election.

I have been thus minute in the review of this report, not so much with a view of discussing directly the merits of the main question, as of calling the attention of the House to the great danger it would incur of doing injustice, by adopting in gross the conclusions of the report, without examining in detail the various propositions upon which the real merits of the case depend, and of making a clear and distinctive decision of them by a direct vote of this House. Sir, if this course should be adopted, I have but little doubt the final vote of the House would confirm the right of the sitting member. But, if we are to labor on in this uncertain mode of general debate, until the last sand of our measured time shall have passed out, and the previous question sprung upon us, and all debate and amendments prohibited, I should then have as little doubt that the decision of the people would be reversed, and the petitioner admitted to a seat.

The remarks and comments which I have made on the report of the majority have been dictated by none other than the kindest feelings of personal regard for the members of that branch of the committee. I have avoided, as in justice I should have done, any imputation of improper motives; on the contrary, I have felt disposed to sympathize in the perplexities of their laborious task. I have been ready to ascribe all error and mistake to the numberless difficulties the committee had to encounter; but, as it had been remarked frequently in debate, that the report carried with it high authority, and fearing that many might, as is common, take it as conclusive as to the truth of the statements it contained, I felt called upon by a duty I owed to myself as a member of the minority of the committee, and by a sense of duty to this House and the people of North Carolina, to speak out, and warn the House of the danger of the course they were pursuing, by adopting in gross the conclusions of a report involving so many inaccuracies.

Before I sit down, I would direct the attention of the House to the conclusion which seems to me the necessary result of the consideration of the legal points and facts to which I have alluded in the remarks I have just submitted.

The majority contend that they have found evidence to establish the illegality of nineteen votes, which were given to Graham, and which ought to be deducted, viz: thirteen given by non-residents of the county, five non-residents of the State, and one minor, making 19. They also claim that the three Yancey votes, given at Henderson, Buncombe county, and rejected by the judges at Asheville, should be restored to the petitioner's polls; and,

lastly, six votes which were tendered to the board, and rejected, should be added to his polls; which, in all, would make 28 votes to be credited to him, thus:

19 votes, non-residents and minors,	19
3 Yancey votes tendered and rejected,	3
6 votes tendered and rejected,	6	— 28
They also credit to Graham—
8 bad votes given to Newland,	8
7 original majority,	7	— 15
Difference, and majority for petitioner,

Among the nineteen illegal votes alleged to have been given to Mr. Graham, the sitting member, four are supposed to be given by persons whose names do not appear upon the scrolls. These scrolls, in some States called poll lists, are made out and certified by the sheriff of the county, under the provisions of the laws of North Carolina; one copy of which he is required to file in the clerk's office of the county, after "the same is certified by the sheriff." These scrolls, duly authenticated under the seal of the clerk of the county, are the highest and most solemn evidence of the matters contained in them. They are especially the highest evidence of the truth as to who did vote, and how many. As the names of these four individuals do not appear upon the polls certified to us, and furnished us, too, by the petitioner himself, a question arises whether he (the petitioner) shall be permitted to give parol evidence of third persons that these four persons did vote. The manner in which the polls are kept, by a sheriff and two inspectors, sworn to conduct the elections fairly and honestly, and who are required to keep each a separate list of all who vote, which lists are to be compared and certified by them to the sheriff, furnishes the most solemn and veritable evidence of the correctness of the registry as to who did vote; and by permitting third persons to give evidence by parol to contradict this, would be a gross departure from the oldest and most salutary rules of legal evidence. The proof, therefore, that these four votes were given to Graham, must fail. This will reduce their number to twenty-four, or, in other words will reduce the nineteen illegal votes to fifteen. If the view which I have taken of the propriety of allowing the six votes tendered and rejected be correct, there must be deducted six votes more; and if the view which I have taken of the three votes given for the petitioner at Henderson, Buncombe county, by the three citizens of "Yancey," be correct, then three more must be deducted from the number of illegal votes, which the petitioner alleges should be deducted from Graham's polls, leaving of the twenty-eight alleged illegal votes, but fifteen, which, in any event, should be deducted from the sitting member's polls. Bad votes for Graham, in all, fifteen. Now, sir, let us consider the votes which Mr. Graham contends are illegal, and which, having been given to the petitioner, he claims should be deducted.

There were eight votes which are clearly proven to have been illegally given to Newland, which should be deducted from his polls. On them the committee were unanimous. They are illegal beyond contradiction. To these should be added the five votes which were improperly exchanged from the Commons to the Congressional box for Newland, for the reasons which I have just stated; which would make thirteen illegal votes given to Newland, and to be credited to Graham. If to this you add the seven votes, his original majority, the sitting member's polls will stand thus:

1st, 8 bad votes, by agreement of committee,	8
2d, 5 votes, illegally exchanged,	5
3d, 7 votes, original majority,	7
Total,	20	—

Contested Election.

[H. OF R.]

If from these 20 you take votes credited to New-land, say, - 15
 We have five votes majority still for Graham, - 5

Sir, I sincerely believe, if this case were presented to a jury, acting under a solemn oath to find a true verdict from the law and facts before us, they could not come to a result more favorable to the petitioner.

But, sir, the sitting member claims to have allowed him ten more votes, which are proved to have been illegally given for the petitioner, by the documents which have been laid on our tables since this report came in; and this forms the last point with which I shall trouble the House.

It is clearly right that these should be allowed. They have been taken under notice duly served according to the laws and practices adopted by the petitioner himself; they have been printed by consent, and laid before us. The proofs are clear and conclusive, consisting in most cases, of the oaths of the voters themselves, that ten more illegal votes were given to the petitioner, which, according to the clearest estimates, would swell the sitting member's majority to fifteen votes. Sir, we dare not reject this evidence; it is before us; it is legal; it tells us, in audible words, that the sitting member has a majority of the legal votes of the twelfth congressional district in North Carolina; and if we refuse them, and thereby the sitting member loses his seat, we do nothing less than take the election from the people, and controul it in this House. Sir, North Carolina will never submit to it. She is too jealous of her State rights. She is too republican to submit patiently to so high and flagrant an assumption of unauthorized power. It would be establishing a precedent in this House that would strike at the root of the right of free and unrestrained elections. This evidence must be admitted; we dare not reject it. If it be admitted, then the sitting member will have a majority of fifteen votes over the petitioner.

Among the reasons that have been assigned why these depositions should not be admitted, negligence on the part of the sitting member, in not collecting his evidence in season, forms a prominent one; he is said to have waived his right by gross delay. With a view of testing the soundness of these reasons, and of exposing the great injustice of the charge, I must tax the patience of the House with a brief statement of the proceedings in the case before it reached the committee.

The election for members of Congress was held in North Carolina on the 13th day of August last, when, of all the votes given in the district, the sitting member received seven more than the petitioner. On the 2d day of October thereafter the latter served the former with a notice of his intentions to contest his election, without inserting the names of witnesses or names or residences of the voters challenged. On the 19th, he followed this notice with another, apprizing the sitting member that on the 29th he should take the depositions of "James D. Justin and others," at Asheville, in Buncombe county, a distance of 40 miles. The same notice also apprized the sitting member that on the Saturday following, the 31st, he should take the depositions of individuals at Barnesville, in Yancey county, 38 miles further. They were detained at the first place two days, examining their witnesses, which brought them to the 31st, the day they were required to be at the latter place. On the 26th day of October another notice had been served for taking depositions at Frontston precinct, in Mason county, on the 4th day of November, 106 miles from Barnesville. They were detained at Barnesville three days, taking depositions; this left them one day to prepare and travel over a rough country, on horseback, 106 miles. In this same notice he was required on the 7th to appear at another place in the same county, and on the 9th, two days after, at Waynesville, Haywood county, 63 miles. In the same way were these notices crowded upon him, until, from the 29th October to the 30th of November, he was summoned to attend the examination of witnesses in twelve different places, at an average distance from each other of sixty-three miles. This would allow the sitting member, for travel, attendance and preparation, an average of two days and a half; and yet he is charged with "negligence" and gross delay in not preparing himself before the first day of the term for trial. Sir, in justice, perhaps, to those gentlemen who charge delay in this case, I ought in charity to say that the charge has been inadvertently made, without due reflection, and with but a slight knowledge of the case. All this time, from the service of the first notice to the 2d day of December, the sitting member was employed in cross-examining and resisting the evidence of the petitioner, without an allowance of a single day to take depositions in his own defence, unless he chose to take them by a forced employment of the time already pre-occupied by the other party. The gentlemen who have debated this point, in estimating the time actually allowed, have commenced with the 1st October, the day when the notice of intention to contest the election was served. In this they have fallen into an error. This was simply a notice of an intention to contest the seat. Although by the laws of North Carolina such a notice is made a prerequisite, it has never been considered by this House the commencement of judicial proceedings. It has been decided, in an adjudicated case arising in this House, that, although such a previous notice intimated a disposition to contest the seat, it did not evince a fixed determination to do so; and that the returned member was not bound to take any active measures of defence until some judicial notice, such as to apprise him of taking depositions, was served, or some other active and efficient step in the case. In that case it was very aptly remarked by the committee who made the report, that "it was very easy for a person to threaten such a contest, though he never intended to prosecute;" that, in such a case, "it would be injustice and folly to require the sitting member to enter upon his defence, and incur the expense and trouble of preparation, under the bare possibility that a contest might be waged. If we adopt that principle here, which is but just and reasonable, then must we adjudge the first judicial proceedings to have commenced on the 19th day of October.

But it is said, if the notices did not afford sufficient time for the parties to appear in person, they ought to have employed agents to appear for them at places where they could not. There is no legal substance in this plea. The employment of an agent is a measure the sitting member might adopt or not, at his own option; it is not one that the petitioner could dictate, either expressly or by implication. The law, indeed, recognises but does not create such agencies; in contemplation of legal notices, every person is supposed to transact his own business. The right to employ an agent in such cases is a personal privilege that no law can either dictate or deny. The true question here is, whether the sitting member was allowed sufficient time to appear in his own person at these several places to examine witnesses.

There is another manifest error, into which some gentlemen who have discussed this question of time have fallen, which should not be overlooked. It is said it would lead to an unsound and dangerous practice, if we were to permit this evidence to come in, since it was taken after the committee had decided that no other evidence should be taken. The error consists in a misapprehension of the decision of the committee: it was not that they would not receive any more testimony, but that they would not suspend their deliberations with a view of granting further time. If their decision had said they would receive no more evidence, it would have shut out some of the most important depositions which the petitioner produced. These were received, considered, and adopted, after the decision denying further time was made. If these depositions had been received before the report was made, I have no doubt they would have been received. Is there any assignable reason why they might not as well be received now as then?

Contested Election.

The question was asked by one of the majority of the committee, why the sitting member had not applied to the House for further time in the first instance. This question has come from a quarter I should least have suspected. That gentleman should have recollected that the sitting member submitted to the committee, at their first meeting, a preliminary question of great force, which, if sustained, would have dismissed the whole case, and dispensed with the necessity of further time; that this question the committee had under advisement until the 15th day of January before they decided it. When it was decided, he applied to the committee for further time. About the last of January they decided this question against him; immediately after this, the 30th January, he gave his notices for taking depositions; and these very depositions which he asks to be allowed were taken under these notices. Now, what time had he to apply to the House, after the decision of the committee was made, for further time, that he did not improve in taking depositions? The question is a singular one, and, coming from such a quarter, is calculated to mislead the House in relation to this question. But, sir, I have detained the House much longer than I intended to have done. I shall close my remarks by saying that the subject ought to be committed to the Committee of the Whole, for the reasons I have before intimated. This has been the usual course. I have examined all the cases which have been reported, and I cannot find a solitary one, where the report of the committee was contested and disputed, that the case has not been committed to a Committee of the Whole House. In this case, such a course is more especially demanded, as the report is required to be amended in very important matters of substance, and additional evidence is to be received and considered. Besides, such a course would better comport with the character in which the House is acting; we are sitting here as judges, as a court of appeal, and not as a legislative body.

Mr. BOYD rose to reply to some matters of fact. The gentleman had stated that mention was not made in the committee's report of a decision that no votes would be received of a person voting out of the county in which he resided. Now, Mr. B. believed it was in the report, with the reference to the laws of North Carolina on the subject. In relation to the hearsay testimony, the petitioner wished to have stricken from the sitting member's poll certain voters of this description, but the committee refused this as inadmissible. The committee set aside all testimony that came before them in the character of hearsay evidence, and received none except such as was positive. The gentleman had complained of a discrepancy in relation to the protest of the sitting member. Mr. B. had only to remark that, if the majority of the committee had not done the sitting member greater injustice than in relation to this, he should feel gratified indeed. The gentleman had also said the majority had appended to their report a statement from the petitioner of a number of votes which he claimed ought to be stricken from the sitting member's poll, under hearsay testimony. Mr. B. said the list was appended, and he wished to be permitted to state that not only the list, but every other document which they could get hold of, was inserted into the report, both for and against the petitioner. In the committee they went on with their examination from the commencement under the rule laid down, that none but positive testimony should be received, leaving out all other; they went on taking notes, but not deciding in the case, until at length it was agreed that the documents should be submitted to the parties, for the purpose of their making out an abstract of such testimony as they could rely upon. Before that, nothing was heard about further time; but, after they had investigated the testimony, the sitting member came forward and asked further time. The object in submitting the testimony to them was to have them make out an abstract of the case. The petitioner furnished an abstract, but the sitting member was taken sick; and the committee waited upon him in the hope of getting an abstract; he was too weak at that time to make it out, and it was delayed ten days or two weeks, the committee still waiting. The sitting member came in eventually with another protest, instead of an abstract, and this protest was the one the gentleman had complained of as not being added to the report. They had searched for that and some other testimony at the time the report was made up, but it was nowhere to be found. Mr. B. wanted to append that very document to the report, but could not find it.

[Mr. HARD wished to call the attention of the House to another fact. The committee had received some five or six votes as legal votes which were not on the poll book at all.]

Mr. BOYD resumed. The gentleman had complained about hearsay testimony. Now, it was well known that the committee did not investigate hearsay testimony at all. The committee had decided against every description of hearsay evidence. At the time the petitioner presented his abstract, the sitting member, instead of presenting an abstract, presented another protest against the receivability of some of the evidence; and he had said that that protest could not be gotten hold of by him, or it would have been appended to his report. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARD] had informed him afterwards, that he had it, and would append it to the report of the minority.

[Mr. HARD said he recollected the papers were in his possession. He had taken them to his room, for the purpose of examining them, but did not recollect of the gentleman's inquiry of him in regard to them.]

The gentleman [Mr. HARD] had complained of the majority of the committee having recognised the polls as evidence of the highest authority. These, said Mr. B., were the register of the votes, called scrolls; and, being imperfect, had not been regarded alone as the highest description of authority.

Mr. B. hoped the subject would not be committed; for such a course was only designed to cause delay. He desired the fullest and strictest investigation into the testimony relied upon by the committee; and he was well assured that but one result would ensue: a confirmation of their report. If it were committed to the Committee of the Whole House, it never would be terminated, neither that session nor in the ensuing one.

Mr. B. was about, he said, to go into a brief history of the case, when

Mr. MAURY interposed, and raised a question of order: whether a motion to commit, which was the pending one, opened the whole merits of the question.

Mr. SPEIGHT remarked that the gentleman was probably not aware that the motion was to commit with sundry instructions, and these instructions probably opened the whole merits of the case.

The CHAIR so decided that the instructions did open the merits of the case.

Mr. BOYD proceeded, and entered into a brief statement of the acts of both parties, from the time the petitioner gave the sitting member notice of his intention to contest his seat, on the 2d of October, up to the time of the testimony being submitted to the committee. With regard to the admissibility of the testimony taken subsequently to the report, he was opposed to it, and was further of opinion that no testimony should have been considered which was taken after the meeting of Congress; but no application was made for further time till about the middle of January. This application was made, it should be borne in mind, after the party making it had had an opportunity of examining all the testimony, and knowing that it was insufficient to enable him to retain his seat. This was one act of the committee, which Mr. B. thought they were censurable for; for his opinion was that neither party should have been made acquainted with what the report would be. The sitting member had suffered upwards of sixty days to elapse before he made his application for further time, until he discovered what the report of the committee would be. His request was then unreasonable, and ought not to have been complied with. The case having been, therefore, closed, he thought the additional testimony ought not now to be received. That motion had for its object, and was in effect nothing else than, to procure further time to hunt up testimony—an application the House had refused by its vote of Saturday last.

Mr. HOAR desired further information on certain points he had not heard touched upon, before he was able to give a reason for his vote. He confessed that he was unable to perceive any good ground on which the question, from the facts before the House, could be settled. What were they? The election took place on the 13th of August, and on the 29th of October the petitioner gave notice that he should contest the sitting member's seat.

Mr. BOYD said, the 2d of October.

Mr. HOAR. Well, he gave notice on the 2d that he should proceed on the 29th of October. Look at the character of this notice. It stated neither the reason nor the grounds for the contest; nor did it contain the names of the witnesses, or the kind of testimony expected from them. Upon referring to the report, he found that the petitioner had continued taking depositions up to the 2d day of December, after the sitting member must have left for Washington. Again: the election taking place on the 13th of August, the petitioner had the advantage of all the interval of time between the day of election and the close (the 29th) of the month of October. With all these disadvantages, the sitting member entered into the investigation, and presented a protest against the admission of certain testimony, which was not decided upon by the committee till the 14th of January, and then that gentleman asked for further time. Mr. H. would then ask the committee whether, without a physical possibility of knowing the evidence against him, the sitting member should be debarred from producing all the testimony he could in his own favor? He was at a loss to understand the principle upon which the majority of the committee had come to the conclusion they had; and until he did, he could not sustain it. Testimony had been taken by the petitioner since the sitting member left home, and some opportunity should be afforded to rebut it; otherwise great injustice would be done him.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said there might be great force in the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the sitting member's case had suffered by the petitioner having taken evidence since he (the sitting member) left home, if that gentleman had rested his defence upon that ground. If he had come to the House and stated that he was taken by surprise by the evidence taken since he left home, that would have presented a different case. But the sitting member was asked, when the subject of time was up some time ago for discussion, whether he desired time to take new evidence of which he had knowledge, or to hunt up evidence; and the gentleman distinctly answered that he did not ask time to discover new evidence, but to take evidence of which he was privy. No complaint had ever been heard from the gentleman, that he was taken by surprise at the depositions taken since his departure from home. No complaint of this nature had been heard from him in the House, nor, as far as the report showed, in the committee.

Mr. WISE remarked that politicians were not good judges of contested elections; but when lawyer politicians became judges, then there was no expectation of either truth or justice. He was himself not swayed by party in this case; indeed, he could not be, for he understood that both gentlemen came out before the people for the same candidate he supported, (Judge White.) He complained that the most material party in this case was forgotten—the people; and the whole had been treated as a case of meum and tuum, between A B and C D. Now, the question was not one between Graham and Newland, but whom had the people elected. He understood the object of the motion then pending to be, to bring in the testimony taken since the report of the committee was made. These depositions were understood to vary, materially vary, the report of the majority of the committee, and he could conceive no reason why they should not be admitted. Could a decision of the Committee of Elections set aside the constitution and laws of North Carolina? That would be the effect of affirming the decision of the committee, if the additional testimony were taken pursuant to those laws. But the decision of the committee, that these gentlemen should not have further time did not assert that they should take no further depositions. He asked the gentleman at the head of the majority of the committee, if such were not the fact?

Mr. BOYD admitted that the decision of the committee applied only to the application for further time.

Mr. WISE then proceeded at length to contend for the admissibility of the subsequent testimony, and referred to the practice of law and equity courts, which, under analogous circumstances, would, he contended, decide in its favor. Justice to the people of North Carolina required that the House should not pronounce a decision in which their rights and interests were involved, without having all the evidence before them. Mr. W. stated that he had heard from good authority that there were tens and fifties of bad votes, not reported either by the majority or minority of the committee; and this was another reason why the House should have every tittle of the testimony before them. He reiterated that that House was an unfit place to try the case of a contested election, especially in view of a presidential election; and he could already foresee and prophecy how every vote would be recorded in the present case. He referred to the case of Moore and Letcher, as having been debated exclusively on party grounds. He admitted that he was himself unfit to decide the question, and it was from that consciousness, and from the scenes he witnessed around him on that occasion, that he had voted to refer it back to the people. What he did in that case, he should do in the present, vote to refer it back to the people, and let them decide.

Mr. ANTHONY remarked that it had been evident, for some time, that there was a continued and labored attempt to make this a party question by some gentlemen there; and he need only refer to the various motions that had been made from time to time in proof of the fact; but he earnestly appealed to the House to set aside party feelings on this question.

Mr. A. went into a history of the proceedings, as detailed in the report of the committee, at some length, to show that there was no necessity to commit or recommit the subject, and entered into an elaborate argument in support of the views of the majority.

Pensacola and Perdido Railroad.

Mr. PEYTON appealed to the gentleman from New York to withdraw his motion, and thus bring the question on the additional testimony immediately before the House.

Mr. HARD accordingly withdrew it.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. GRAHAM, to add the resolution before indicated, to admit the additional testimony.

Mr. GRAVES moved an adjournment, but withdrew it to enable the Chair to present a communication from the Secretary of War; after which,

The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26.

PENSACOLA AND PERDIDO RAILROAD.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate to authorize the Pensacola and Perdido Railroad and Canal Company to construct a railroad through the public lands; the motion pending being that of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said that, having had some conversation with the gentleman who had reported the bill from the Committee on the Public Lands, [Mr. CHAPMAN,] he had come to the conclusion to withdraw his motion to commit.

The CHAIR then announced the question to be on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. PARKER inquired if there was a quorum in the House.

The CHAIR counted the members, when it appeared that 117 were within the bar—no quorum.

Mr. PARKER moved a call of the House; which was negatived.

Upon a second count, 122 members, being a quorum, were found to be in attendance.

The bill above referred to was then read, for information.

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the bill by striking out 180 feet, as the width granted for the construction of the road, and inserting 80 feet in lieu thereof. Mr. H. stated that the amendment which he had proposed was assented to by the Delegate from Florida, [Mr. WHITE,] who was not then present.

Mr. CHAPMAN should have objected to the amendment, as calculated to defeat the objects of the bill; but, as the Delegate from Florida was understood to acquiesce in the amendment, he would be disposed to yield his own opinion on the subject. He repeated, however, that he considered the amendment as fatal to the objects of the company.

Mr. MERCER remarked that the charter of the company required that the road should be only 80 feet in width. The argument of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CHAPMAN] would only go to show that the company had accepted an impracticable charter. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company occupied a width of only twenty feet. It was proposed to give the company, under the bill before the House, eighty feet, which he deemed amply sufficient.

Mr. RIPLEY said, as there were several similar applications from Louisiana, for the privilege of constructing railroads through the public lands, he hoped that the present question would not be decided in a manner to make it an injurious precedent. Experience had shown that considerable more space than the mere width of the railways was necessary, in order to erect depots, &c. The committee had reported in favor of granting a width of two hundred feet to the Carrollton railroad, in Louisiana. This, he contended, was not too much. The lands in the vicinity of the Perdido were comparatively worthless; and to stickle about a proposition which looked to the construction of a great thoroughfare, like the one proposed, was unworthy of Congress. Mr. R. adverted to the enhanced value of the adjacent public lands, owing to the construction of railroads. The lands in the vicinity of the Atchafalaya railroad were not previously worth one dollar per acre; since the location of the road they had risen to fifteen or twenty dollars. He would not say that there was any jealousy on the part of members, but particular scruples seemed to exist on this subject. He was decidedly opposed to the proposed amendment, unless the Delegate from Florida preferred that it should prevail.

Mr. HARDIN remarked that the bill gave to this company, in the character of an "incorporated hereditament," a tract of country sixty yards in width, and perhaps two or three hundred miles in length. If there was only one project of the kind, it might not be an object of so much importance; but there were numerous applications for similar grants. In this case, the charter gave a width of eighty feet, when twenty were enough. The Delegate from Florida was content with eighty feet. Mr. H. desired to see this charter. He wished to know if it afforded the United States a fair chance to transmit the mails, munitions of war, &c. He did not want these to be carried free, but upon reasonable terms, and without the power of extortion. This was a charter, not of that House, but was granted by the Legislative Council of Florida. Perhaps not five members in the House had ever seen this charter, and they ought not to act without knowing whether it sufficiently guarded the interests of the United States. He concluded by calling for the yeas and nays on his motion to amend.

Mr. MERCER was authorized by the Delegate from Florida to move the same amendment as the one which had been proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. RIPLEY was perfectly satisfied, after the declaration of the gentleman last up.

Mr. HARDIN withdrew the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PARKER thought that time had been wasted in discussing a bill which had never been before the committee to which it rightly belonged. He would, therefore, move that the bill be committed to the Committee on Roads and Canals. There was another bill on the same subject, which he should also move be committed to the same committee.

Mr. CHAPMAN opposed the commitment. He had not seen the charter of this company, but presumed it was properly guarded, so far as the rights of those immediately interested were concerned. He entered into a defence of the system of improvements, by means of railroads, in the South, which he considered had been assailed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] and also into the propriety of complying with the applications for right of way through the public domain.

Mr. MERCER was opposed to the commitment. He believed the subject should not originally have been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands; but to send it now to a different one would be a reflection upon the committee which heretofore had charge of it.

Mr. BOON (chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands) had no pride in reference to the cognizance of this bill. He felt particular interest in regard to the precedent which might be made in this case. Mr. B. adverted to the large appropriations for railroads and other improvements which had been made by the Legislature of Indiana. If the views of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDIN] were to prevail, it would be tantamount to denying to the new States the privilege of opening such communications as were demanded by the commercial operations and the growing prosperity of that portion of the country. The committee had, in several cases, reported bills granting a width of one hundred and fifty feet for these thoroughfares. This, he contended, was not too much, particularly when it was recollected that the value of the lands in the vicinity were greatly enhanced by the improvement.

MARCH 26, 1836.]

Contested Election.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. GRENELL said that the bill involved important interests, and should not be passed in a hurry, without such information as to enable them to vote intelligently. He adverted to the large grant which was proposed in the bill, as a reason why they should act understandingly on the subject. He desired to know from the chairman of the committee whether the charter of this company was before the committee; and if so, what were its provisions, as it was to form the basis of legislation.

Mr. BOON, in reply, said that the charter was not before the committee. The bill had, in committee, been given in charge to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CHAPMAN,] who was best acquainted with the proposition.

Mr. DAVIS moved to commit the bill to the Committee on Roads and Canals, with instructions to provide for the transportation of the United States mail on the proposed railroad, by an amendment not contravening the rights of the company.

Mr. RIPLEY felt considerable solicitude on this subject, representing, as he did, a part of the country where three of these companies had been incorporated, and had made similar applications for the privilege of constructing their roads through the public lands. Railroads were now the order of the day in the South. He contended that two hundred feet in width was not too much in that section, when it was recollected that the products transported upon those roads were of a bulky description. He again adverted to the enhanced value of the public lands on account of the opening of railroads, and the unprecedented amount of revenue now derived from that source. He apprehended it was believed by many of the members, that a part of these grants would be applied to other objects: for the erection of houses, laying off towns, or other speculating purposes. This could be easily remedied by an amendment, prohibiting the use of the lands granted for any other than public purposes.

After a few suggestions by Messrs. PARKER and DICKERSON, the bill was, on motion of Mr. CASEY, committed to the same Committee of the Whole to which a similar bill from the Senate had been committed.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then, pursuant to the resolution adopted on Saturday, the 19th of March, proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the report of the Committee of Elections, on the contested election for the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina.

The report of a majority of the committee was in favor of the petitioner, David Newland, and concluded by the following resolution:

Resolved, That James Graham is not entitled to a seat in this House, and that David Newland is entitled to a seat in this House."

Mr. GRAHAM moved the following amendment thereto: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

"That the depositions which have been communicated to the House by the Speaker, and laid on the table, since the report of the Committee of Elections was made, wherever taken upon due notice, shall be received by the House as testimony in this case," (concluding with the names of the voters.)

Mr. G. having modified his motion by moving the foregoing amendment as an addition to the resolution of the committee, and

Mr. HARD having withdrawn his motion to commit the two reports and the additional testimony to a Committee of the Whole House,

Mr. GRAVES, who was entitled to the floor, gave way to

Mr. RENCHER, who said he had a series of resolutions to propose as an amendment to the resolution of the committee, which would bring the whole subject substantially and in detail before the House; and he asked his colleague [Mr. GRAHAM] to withdraw his amendment, as the propositions he (Mr. R.) intended to submit would embrace it.

Mr. GRAHAM accordingly withdrew his amendment, and

Mr. RENCHER submitted the following:

1. Resolved, That the depositions which have been communicated to the House by the Speaker, and laid on the table, since the report of the Committee of Elections was made, whenever taken upon due notice, will be received by the House as testimony in this case.

2. Resolved, That the five votes taken from the Commons box at the Franklin precinct in Buncombe county, and counted for the petitioner, ought not to be counted.

3. Resolved, That the three votes which were stricken from the petitioner's roll by the judges at Asheville, in Buncombe county, because it appeared, by the return of the judges from the Henderson precinct, that those of the votes given the petitioner were given by voters living in Yancey county, and which have now been added to his poll by the committee, ought not to be allowed.

4. Resolved, That two votes (to wit: Robert Lankford and George Barkley) stricken from the roll of the sitting member by the committee, on the ground that they voted out of their proper county, ought to be restored, because there is no proof that they lived out of the county in which they voted.

5. Resolved, That two votes (to wit: Moses Pace and Andrew Morrison) which were proven by parol testimony to have been given for James Graham, out of the county in which they reside, and on that account have been stricken from his poll by the committee, ought to be restored, because it does not appear from the poll-books themselves that either of these men voted at the election.

6. Resolved, That Wm. H. Milton ought to be stricken from the poll of the petitioner, because it appears that he had not paid a public tax.

7. Resolved, That the five votes, found on page 6 of the report, which have been counted for the petitioner, but which were not given in at the polls, ought not to be counted.

8. Resolved, That there is no evidence that these men were qualified to vote, not having lived in the county where they offered to vote twelve months immediately preceding the day of election, as required by the constitution of North Carolina, or that they tendered their votes as required by the law of that State.

9. Resolved, therefore, That — is entitled to a seat upon this floor as a Representative from the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina.

Mr. R. did not submit these resolutions for the purpose of making a speech thereon, but simply for the purpose of bringing the subject before the House in such manner as they might vote on each separate proposition. He therefore asked a division of the question, so as to take the sense of the House on each of the resolutions; and by the time they came to the ninth resolution it would be decided who was entitled to the seat. He hoped that the House would take each proposition by yeas and nays, so that the country might know the opinion of the House on each of the propositions submitted.

Mr. BYNUM hoped the House would not receive an individual one of the propositions submitted by his colleague, [Mr. RENCHER.] If the House had any regard for its own dignity or the interests of the country, it would not consent to receive those propositions. If gentlemen look but one moment, they would perceive that the case presented a striking similitude to one of the most extraordinary cases ever before the House; he meant the case of Moore and Letcher. It was within the recollection of the members of that House what were the consequences of departing from the known rules of parliamentary precedents. He asked what committees were formed for, if not to examine subjects of that kind in detail, and after examining the various details to come to one general result, to report the facts to the House, and then call upon the House to sanction or reject their report? He asked if the House would attempt to deviate from that rule? If they did, they would find it perfectly impracticable to get through with the subject. If the House had commenced examining the subject in detail, he ventured to predict that two thirds of the session would have been consumed in the consideration of that one single subject. If those propositions were to be kept before the House, and each one in the House was to consume as much time in arguments thereon as had already been consumed in committee, they would not adjourn before the meeting of the next Congress. Every one must recollect the immense time consumed in the committee, where there were only nine members to raise arguments; and if the subject was to be examined in detail in the House: where there were two hundred and forty, he asked what the consequence would be? Much had been said about responsibility in the House, and he now called on gentlemen to come up and meet the responsibility. He hoped the House would not attempt to sanction a proposition, with a view of merely calling off attention from the main question.

The CHAIR said it was not in order to impugn the motives of the gentleman who submitted the motion.

Mr. BYNUM said he merely spoke of the proposition, without reference to the motives of the gentleman.

Mr. RENCHER inquired if his motion to amend was out of order?

The CHAIR said it was not out of order.

Mr. BYNUM resumed. He knew the gentleman had a precedent for his motion, but that precedent had met the universal disapprobation of every impartial member of that House. The House had set the precedent, which it was proposed they should follow, by attempting to examine, in detail, the Moore and Letcher case; and, after taking the yeas and nays some half a dozen or a dozen times, they found themselves involved in an inextricable difficulty, and their proceedings a perfect medley of inconsistency. What was the result? In order to get clear of the whole subject, they agreed to ward off the responsibility, and refer the subject back to the people of Kentucky. He hoped this would not be the case on the present occasion. He hoped the House would decide, as a body of its character ought to decide, upon the validity or invalidity of these reports. If the majority in their report had drawn wrong conclusions, let the minority show that the majority's report was erroneous, and the House would have independence enough to decide that it was erroneous; but he hoped the House would not go back, and retrace the grounds the committee had just passed over. He said he was prepared to show some of the most extraordinary inconsistencies of the minority of the committee, ever committed by any set of men; then, if they intended to act, let them compare the reports, and judge of them; and if the report of the majority could be substantiated, then they could strike out the majority's report. He anticipated a motion to draw them off from the general conclusion, and render action on the reports nugatory. Such a course might be adopted, when the House thought the committee had done wrong; but he hoped the House would not sanction this proceeding in this instance.

Mr. B. inquired if the question could be further divided?

The CHAIR said the motion to strike out and insert was indivisible.

Mr. HARDIN said the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] seemed to be apprehensive that the dignity of the House would be compromised by adopting the propositions then before them. Now, there seemed to be five votes which the committee had given to the petitioner, not because these persons did actually vote for him, but because they intended to vote for him, and were refused the privilege by the judges of the election. Would the dignity of the House be compromised by considering a proposition to strike them off? He thought not. Again: at one of the election precincts, it appeared there were five votes received for the petitioner, which were not on the poll-book at all. There were only one hundred and forty-five votes polled, yet there were counted one hundred and fifty, in consequence of there being five votes in the Commons box for the petitioner. These votes were admitted by the committee. But he contended, if such votes were to be received, that almost every man might vote twice. Another was, that the committee had set out with the intention of receiving no hearsay testimony, yet some of their most material facts were decided upon hearsay evidence; and it was necessary for the House to have some such propositions as those then before them, to come to a correct conclusion. They had the right to make such propositions, and they would claim the right to have a vote of the House upon them, unless cut off by the previous question; and they were all equally mindful of the honor and dignity of the House and the nation. Mr. H. referred to the case of the Moore and Letcher contested election of the last year, stating that some gentlemen had voted inconsistently.

Mr. HAWES rose to a point of order. He did not consider the gentleman in order in alluding to votes of gentlemen on a former occasion; and he took down and sent to the Chair the words of the gentleman.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman had a right to refer to the case of Moore and Letcher, if by so doing he intended to apply it to the present case.

Mr. HARDIN was glad to hear that he was not out of order. He was merely replying to the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM.] Mr. H. then went on to state several instances in the Moore and Letcher case, in which the committee had stricken out votes given for Mr. Letcher, but the House afterwards inserted them; after which it was found that Mr. Letcher was ahead. After this, Mr. H. said, some gentlemen who were on that committee voted that they could not decide which of the gentlemen were entitled to the seat.

The CHAIR said if it was the gentleman's purpose to apply the former to the present case, it would be in order; but that it would not be in order to re-examine the case of Moore and Letcher.

Mr. HARDIN resumed. It did seem to him that it was utterly impossible to decide the present case in any way, unless in the manner proposed. Some of the propositions he would vote for, and perhaps some of them he could not vote for. It appeared that there were several grave legal questions settled by the committee, and it was necessary that the House should examine them, and see if they were correctly settled; besides, he did not want any evidence taken, except such as was of the most positive character.

Mr. MERCER said they were then sitting as a court of justice, for the purpose of deciding an important cause; a cause in which not only the rights of the people of North Carolina, but the rights and dignity of the people of the United States, were involved. He considered the propositions before the House as the best that could be adopted. He did not consider that they could arrive at just conclusions in any other way than by considering and deciding upon independent propositions. He alluded to the Virginia Legislature, in which similar propositions were brought forward in similar cases; and there they never had any difficulty in coming to just conclusions, and in coming to them speedily. He wished for the present to have distinct propositions laid down and settled, that in after times some correct principles might be left to be referred to by those who might succeed them.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON would be glad if the House should take the course indicated by the resolutions then before them. He wished to have an opportunity of voting on those propositions separately; on some of them he might vote for the petitioner, but on others he could not; and, therefore, he desired to have the opportunity of voting on them separately. He was astonished that any gentleman should object to the first resolution, for it appeared to him that they ought to receive all the evidence legally taken. He compared the report of the committee to the report of a commissioner in chancery, and argued that the better manner would have been to refer it back to the committee. It was not the parties there which were concerned, but the people of the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina who were interested; and, on these grounds, he argued that no matter how great the laches of the sitting member might have been, yet they ought to grant further time. But the sitting member had shown that he had written to some of his agents, and that he was disappointed in getting their services; therefore, he would receive the indulgence of any righteous judge upon earth. But the application was that the testimony now on your tables be received, so that every man might make up his mind understandingly and justly. This he considered a most just and reasonable proposition. The committee, no doubt, had done their duty, with all the information in their power; but here was new testimony, which had come in since the report had been made, and he wanted all the evidence which could be procured. The evidence might make him decide in favor of the petitioner, or it might make him decide in favor of the sitting member. However that that might be, he wanted to receive it. He also wanted to vote separately on the five votes spoken of; and if the final result was to be affected by those five votes, he should be in favor of sending the election back to the people.

Mr. McKAY was glad these distinct propositions had been presented, for he supposed he might infer that they presented the points upon which the sitting member's case relied. Mr. McK. referred to a brief of the testimony distributed by the sitting member, and to various depositions in the report of the committee, into a minute examination of which he went; and produced the original poll-book, or scroll, of Buncombe county. It appeared that the latter was imperfect, and that persons had voted whose names were not now found on it. The returns show that Graham received 120 at Flat Rock, Newland 95; whereas the poll-book contained only 214 names. He also pointed out some other discrepancies or hiatus therein.

Mr. RENCHER asked if that was the original poll-book, or a mere copy?

Mr. McKAY replied, that he understood it was the original.

Mr. RENCHER thought they were the sheriff's copies.

Mr. GRAHAM remarked that they had protested against the admissibility of those poll-books.

Mr. McKAY replied that they were the original records, taken out of the clerk's office. He remarked that these records were not of the value or authenticity some gentlemen seemed to think, for they were never preserved by the clerks. Mr. McK. then proceeded into a minute examination of several cases embraced in the report, and the depositions relating to Moses Pace, Samuel Blackwell, Thomas Dorton, Robert Lankford, George Barklay, Andrew Morrison, and William H. Runion.

Mr. WISE, having examined the poll of Flat Rock, interposed and remarked there was a still more material variation which the gentleman had overlooked. It stated that Graham had received 120 votes, and Newland 95, making 215; but the sum total at the end stated the number of votes to be 214, being one less than the number returned. But this was not all; Mr. W. had counted over the names, and found there were only 114; the numbers opposite the names were correct up to 56; but the next number began with 157, and so ran on, making the return 100 or 101 more than it should have been.

Mr. McKAY proceeded. That made no difference in the result. He agreed with one of the propositions of his colleague, [Mr. RENCHER], and that was, that the five votes found in the Commons box, having the name of David Newland on them, which were taken therefrom, placed in the Congressional box, and counted for Newland, should be stricken off the petitioner's poll. He had no doubt the judges had done it innocently and conscientiously, but they had done wrong, and were not authorized to do so by the constitution and laws of North Carolina.

He also concurred with his colleague that the constitution required a residence in the county twelve months preceding the day of election. He agreed, in sum, with his colleague, [Mr. RENCHER], that the above-named five votes should be stricken from the petitioner's poll; also, the three votes for Newland in Yancey county, stricken off by the judges at Asheville; and that a twelve months' residence in the county was indispensable. Mr. McK. then entered into a detailed reference to the depositions, applying the principles of the foregoing propositions of Mr. RENCHER, which brought out a majority for the petitioner, testing it by one rule of four, and by another of two, votes. If, however, the subsequent testimony should be held admissible by the House, the sitting member would then have a majority, and be entitled to the seat.

Mr. HAMER addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: A number of gentlemen in the course of this discussion have expressed their surprise at the sentiments which have been advanced by others, in reference to the points involved in this controversy. I must be permitted to express my surprise at the sentiments which those gentlemen have themselves maintained. We are gravely told that we are sitting in a judicial capacity, performing a solemn duty, and bound to decide according to right and justice. Why, we are all aware of that, sir. One gentleman, however, informs us that he does not consider himself qualified to decide this question. I believe I am not misrepresenting the gentleman. I so understood him at the time, and I find it so reported in one of the morning papers.

[Mr. WISE rose to explain. What he had said was this: he did not consider himself "fit" to decide this question, nor did he consider the gentleman from Ohio "fit" to decide it.]

Mr. H. said he had not then misunderstood the gentleman; he understood him at the time to include all the members of the House as unfit to decide the question. A great deal had been said by that gentleman and others about party influence upon a case like the present. It is thought that we cannot adjudge between the respective claimants without being governed by this influence. It seemed, from the opinions expressed by some gentlemen, that this party influence, too, was all on one side. He would ask any gentleman to look over the yeas and nays taken in this case, or in the case of Moore and Letcher, or in any other case of a contested election in high party times, and he would then appeal to his candor to say whether party considerations influenced the dominant party alone. Sir, said he, if any one attempts to sustain that position, I apprehend he will find every important fact upon record to be decidedly against him. It would be sufficient to satisfy any one on this point, to turn to the votes given last week upon the proposition to fix Thursday for the discussion of this report of the Committee of Elections. If gentlemen would talk about party, they might there see which political party it was that voted, to a man, upon one side of a party line, and which one it was that crossed that line. He held that we ought not to be governed by party considerations in such cases; and in that sentiment we all seemed to agree. But, unfortunately, there were parties in this, as well as in every other free country, who professed one thing and practised another. It did appear strange, however, that after so much had been said upon the influence of party, we should be informed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] that both these individuals, the sitting member and the petitioner, are of one and the same political party.

[Mr. WISE explained. He had spoken cautiously and guardedly. He had understood that, in their canvass before the people, both gentlemen had avowed the same principles, but he knew not what might have been the effect of the magician's wand since then.]

Mr. H. continued. He did not know, personally, what these gentlemen's political opinions might be with regard to the approaching presidential election. He could only know from what he had heard, that they were both of the same party, and both opposed to him. If so, he (Mr. H.) could have no party considerations to govern him; nor could any other member of the House. Both of them belonging to one party, their political friends in the House would be voting between two friends; and those who differed in sentiment would be deciding between two political opponents. So that, on all sides of the House, every gentleman would be perfectly unbiassed and impartial.

The constitution of the United States, he remarked, made it our duty to decide this question. By that instrument, this House is made the judge of the election and qualification of its own members. And whether we were "fit" or unfit, in the language of the gentleman from Virginia, he would say to that gentleman, and to every other, that it was our duty to examine ourselves and prepare our minds, as far as poor human nature would admit, to investigate this case fully, and to determine it impartially. We owed it to ourselves, to the parties interested, and to the country at large.

All who had spoken in debate had taken occasion to comment upon the importance of this case. In the views thus expressed he entirely concurred. But whilst its importance to the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina, as well as to the whole country, had been conceded on all hands, some gentlemen had contended that the individuals claiming the seat have no interest here. He dissented from this doctrine. They had a deep interest; one of minor importance, to be sure, to the interest which the people of the district have; but still a deep and abiding interest. Sir, said he, has not every member on this floor an interest in the seat he has here? Is it not one of the most honorable positions that can be occupied by mortal man? If not, why do gentlemen encounter so much trouble, anxiety, abuse, and privation, to obtain the privilege to sit here and deliberate upon the welfare of our countrymen? Each one has a right to his seat, derived from the suffrages of his fellow-citizens; and each of these claimants has an interest in this question, which he estimates in proportion to the actual value of the station which he claims, and his supposed chance of success. We have a duty to discharge, then, towards these gentlemen themselves, as well as to the people of the district which they both aspire to represent.

He said there had been unreasonable delay in the decision of this controversy. If we did not proceed to dispose of such subjects with greater despatch, no one would be willing to contest an election in this House. Contests of this description were always unpopular; there was a strong feeling in the community against them; and this was shown by the fact, that very generally, when the question had been referred back to the people, they had decided against the contestor. This consideration, in connexion with the great expense of collecting testimony, the time lost in arranging the case for presentation, the suspense and anxiety attending the trial, and the delay and expense of four or five months in Washington, must necessarily deter almost any man hereafter from a contest. We were, therefore, setting a bad precedent; for if an individual obtained a certificate of election, no matter whether by fraud or accident, either in himself or others, he would hold his seat, and wrongfully represent the district for two years, although, upon a fair and full examination of the polls, all might be perfectly satisfied that he was not entitled to a place on that floor. It was wrong to throw any such obstacles in the way of obtaining justice; and he was sure no gentleman would knowingly contribute to produce such a result.

It was certain, however, that there seemed to be an unwillingness on the part of the House to hear discussions of this kind. It interfered with public business of much importance, which it was supposed ought to take precedence of it; and it frequently interfered with private bills, which gentlemen were anxious to have passed. Besides these difficulties, it required a study of dry details of law and fact, which were exceedingly uninteresting, and which many members were disinclined to read, because they resided in other States of the Union, and could feel no particular interest in the points presented by these details. In addition to all these considerations, a contest like the present crowds out certain party debates, connected with the presidential question, in which some of us are anxious to engage, or are very willing to hear. Under the influence of so many unpropitious causes, it is almost impossible for an individual to obtain a thorough, patient, and early investigation of his claims to a seat on this floor.

This was wrong. It was a question that related to the organization of the House itself—to its very existence. It was in fact a question whether we had a House of Representatives; and, if so, who composed it. It ought, therefore, to be promptly acted upon and determined. No one should be permitted to sit there and vote, unless he had really been elected, and sent to do so by the people of the district. Without such election, his acts were not binding upon the country; and the community would not acquiesce in the legislation of unauthorized agents. A case might be easily imagined, where a law of the greatest consequence should be carried through the House by the single vote of one member, whose seat might on the day following be declared vacant, because he had not been duly elected, and had in truth never been a member of that body. The necessity, therefore, of speedy action, must, he thought, be apparent to all, and he trusted no further delay would be allowed. Already had four months elapsed since the subject was presented. The committee had reported some time in February, and we had been one or two weeks engaged in the discussion of preliminary points. Had we decided a single question, or progressed a single step in the investigation? We had not. He was astonished that gentlemen should occupy so much time in fighting upon the borders, and skirmishing along the frontiers. Why not come up to the main question? Why not advance to the merits of the controversy, and not consume week after week in debates about mere incidental points, that could lead to no practical results?

On this morning there had been presented a series of resolutions, by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RENCHER,] which it was said would facilitate our investigations, and, if adopted, would show the country and posterity upon what principles this case is decided. He denied that such would be their effect. A part of these propositions were mere truisms. Take, for example, the first one, that "testimony taken upon due notice will be received by the House." All agree to this. But what is "due notice?" When we have adopted the resolution, we shall be as far from a conclusion as we were before. Every gentleman will have to determine for himself, when a deposition is presented, whether it has been taken upon "due notice;" and one will determine that question in the affirmative, and another in the negative, according to their respective opinions of what is legal and reasonable notice; so that nothing is gained by the adoption of the gentleman's resolution. Why then discuss what nobody denies, or adopt that which cannot furnish us the slightest assistance in the investigation before us?

Others of these resolutions were sufficiently definite as distinct propositions, but, as regarded the final result of the contest, they were wholly vague and indefinite. He could not, therefore, vote for them. They were calculated to mislead the public mind as to the principles upon which this case might be decided. He did not attribute any such intention to the gentleman who moved them, he only spoke of the character and effect of the resolutions themselves; he would show why they were thus deceptive.

Upon the face of these resolutions, if they were adopted by the House, and the first one should be so construed as to let in the new testimony now offered by the sitting member, he [Mr. GRAHAM] would seem to be clearly and fairly elected by a majority of the qualified voters of the district; and yet he may not be so elected; and a member of this House, who votes for all these propositions, may honestly and properly vote to admit the petitioner to a seat here, in place of the gentleman who now occupies it. This might seem strange; but it was, nevertheless, true.

For the sake of illustration, he would suppose a case. A and B have difficulties of a pecuniary character, which they cannot settle themselves, and they refer them to three of their neighbors, as arbitrators. A's account consists of three items, of one thousand dollars each. The first is a balance of a book account, the second a balance on a promissory note, and the third a balance of the purchase-money of a tract of land, sold to B; all of which, he contends, are justly due him. B, on his part, denies the validity of these claims; alleges they have all been paid, and claims a balance of five thousand dollars, as justly due him, on a fair settlement with A.

The arbitrators, after hearing all the testimony and arguments, unanimously decide that B's accounts are not established, and must be rejected. They then take a vote separately upon A's three items. The first one is rejected, C voting for and D and E against it; the second one is rejected, D voting for and C and E against it; the third is rejected, E voting for and C and D against it. Here would appear to be an end of the case; but it is not so. A vote is then taken upon the whole of A's claim, and he is unanimously allowed and awarded one thousand dollars against B. C allows him one thousand dollars on his book account, D a like sum on the note, and E the same amount upon the contract for land. Each one is perfectly satisfied that A is entitled to the one thousand dollars; upon this point they are unanimous; but each one has his own particular reason for thinking so; and each one arrives at the conclusion by his own course of examination and comparison. This, he said, was a case perfectly analogous to the one before the House, and it was stated in such a simple and concise form that a child might comprehend it.

But apply the same process to a contested election. A, the sitting member, has a majority of one vote; and B claims a majority of fifteen, in this way: he alleges that two of A's votes were given by aliens, two by minors, and two by non-residents; and that the returns from a precinct or township where A got a majority of ten votes ought to be rejected, on account of the illegal manner in which the election was conducted. The subject is referred to a committee, and they report that B's allegations are sustained, except as to the precinct; the votes of which, in their opinion, ought to be retained. They conclude their report with resolutions, declaring that A is not entitled to a seat, and that B is, having a majority of five of the whole number of qualified votes given in the congressional district.

The House, composed of two hundred and forty members, then proceeds to act upon the separate propositions involved in the contest. The first forty members called sustain the committee as to the aliens, but the remaining two hundred decide the votes to be good; the second class of forty members sustain the committee as to the minors, but the first forty and the remaining one hundred and sixty reverse the decision of the committee on that point; the third class of forty members called decide with the committee as to the non-residents, but the first eighty and the remaining one hundred and twenty are of a different opinion; the fourth class of forty vote that the precinct returns ought to be retained; but the first one hundred and twenty and the remaining eighty decide that it should be rejected. Thus, every decision of the committee upon these several points is reversed; and there would seem to be a large majority of the House in favor of the sitting member. But a vote would then be taken upon the main question: the resolutions of the committee, which were the results of their investigation. The classes of members who had been in the minority upon each several proposition were all composed of different and distinct individuals. The first class of forty would believe A to be in a minority of one, on account of the two aliens, and would vote against him; the second class of forty would believe him to be in a minority of one, on account of the two minors; the third class of forty would believe him to be in a minority of one, on account of the two non-residents; and the fourth class of forty would believe him to be in a minority of nine, on account of the illegal votes counted for him in the precinct or township, which ought to be rejected. These four classes of forty each, making a majority of two thirds of the House, would vote against the sitting member, and thereby sustain the result at which the committee had arrived; although the same House, by votes of two hundred to forty, had reversed all the different preliminary propositions which were to be found in the report. The House would arrive at the same conclusion as the committee; but they did so by another mode of reasoning, precisely as a judge or juror often decides a cause in favor of a party, but for reasons altogether variant from those assigned by his advocate. We might all meet at the same point at the same time; but, in travelling thither, each one would take the path that his own judgment or his own fancy might dictate to him. Was not this proper? Must not each gentleman be allowed to examine and decide for himself? Is he not bound to do so? And is not the common result of all these examinations and decisions, when thrown together, the judgment of the House?

H. of R.]

Contested Election.

From this simple statement it must be apparent to every gentleman that all attempts to place upon record our reasons for deciding this or any other case must be utterly vain and fruitless. It would involve members in seeming inconsistencies, which would require continual explanations to satisfy those who did not understand the whole case. No plan could be devised by the wit of man, which would show precisely upon what principle the House acted in coming to a conclusion, except to allow each member to make a speech, giving his views of the case at large, or to offer a string of resolutions, presenting the entire process of reasoning by which he arrived at the result that his final vote might indicate to his constituents. This would be utterly impossible. It would, in the one case, consume the whole year in making speeches; and in the other increase the journal to an enormous bulk; for no reason could be assigned why we should vote upon separate propositions in contested elections, that did not equally apply to all the other business of the House. To carry out the principle, we should occupy the whole session in writing and printing what nobody would read, to the exclusion of all the important business of the country. Were gentlemen prepared for this? If not, why did they urge these doctrines upon the House with so much zeal? How could this case be distinguished from any other? And yet, who ever thought of asking us to vote in that manner, upon an appropriation for a particular harbor, light-house, or fortification? Who has ever required us so to vote, upon a bill to increase or diminish the duties upon a particular article of commerce, to increase the army or navy, upon the admission of new States into the Union, or upon the allowance or rejection of a claim presented by an individual? Such demands had never been heard of, and yet they were as applicable to the one case as to the other. He was against them, because they did not give a fair and impartial view of the case. They were unjust in their operation. They might be true as far as they went, and yet they did not tell the whole truth. Whilst they showed why some members voted in a particular manner, they grossly misrepresented others, not only by not showing why they voted differently, but by implying reasons for their action which did not exist. All this was manifested by the argument of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. McKAY], who had just addressed the House. He disagreed both with the majority and with the minority of the committee upon several points involved in this controversy. He also differed with his colleague, who submitted these resolutions. He took a view of the case which varied in some respects from any heretofore taken, yet he had come to the conclusion that Mr. Newland was entitled to a seat. So it was with every member on the floor. Each one would have his own peculiar views and mode of reasoning, to arrive at a result upon this subject. Some would think one party elected, and some the other; and some might believe that neither was entitled to a seat, and that the whole matter should be sent back to the people. To do justice to all alike, we must allow each one to present his own views, and have them recorded. He was therefore in favor of voting directly upon the main question, without requiring each member to evince, in detail, to the country, what might be his opinions upon all the questions of law and fact involved either in this or any similar controversy.

The first point before the House for consideration, after disposing of these resolutions, is, shall the sitting member be allowed longer time to take testimony? To answer this inquiry, we must ascertain why he is not ready now. Unless some good reason can be given why he is unprepared, we ought not to admit a further delay. What are the reasons? The principal one seems to be, that between the period of his receiving notice that the election would be contested, and the commencement of the session, there was not sufficient time to take his testimony; that he was under a "moral obligation" to come here as a member of Congress; that he was not bound to employ an agent to take depositions during the session, because he has a right to be personally present when they are taken; and therefore his testimony has not been procured. Now, if this be a correct view of the subject, longer time should be allowed. Let us see if it is so.

If he were under a "moral obligation" to come here at the commencement of the session, he is under a "moral obligation" to stay here now. The obligation has not diminished. It is as strong at one period of the session as at another. Yet he now asks the privilege of violating this supposed obligation, to go home and take depositions. This is a singular position. Or does he intend to remain here and transact the business through agents? If so, this could have been done as well at the commencement of the session as at present. Why did he not leave agents, when he came on here, to proceed in the collection of evidence and the cross-examination of the petitioner's witnesses? If that had been done, he might have had all the evidence that could have been obtained in the district, and would now be perfectly prepared, according to his own views of the case, to come to a final hearing. Whose fault is it that he did not do so? Not Mr. Newland's. Is the latter to suffer on account of the other's neglect? This is not just. Whilst we are so cautious about the rights of one of the parties, we must remember that the other has rights too. Each one has an equal claim to our protection; and before an order is made to the prejudice of the one, we must be satisfied that the other is fairly entitled to it upon principles of equity.

But I deny that there was any such "moral obligation" upon the sitting member, as is alleged. We often deceive ourselves in discussing a subject, by taking things for granted which cannot be proved, and which are not conceded by our adversaries. It is said he was morally bound to come here at the commencement of the session, and therefore did not stay to take testimony in the district. Why was he so bound? Was it because he was a member of Congress? That is denied, and is the very question we are about to try. The petitioner says he is the member from that district, and offers the proof to convince us that such is the fact. How can gentlemen talk about a moral obligation upon one of the parties that does not rest upon the other? They stand precisely upon the same ground with regard to the seat; each one claiming it, and calling upon the House so say who has the best title. True, the sitting member has temporary possession of the place, because he held a certificate of election; but a certificate is only prima facie evidence, as the lawyers call it, of a man's right to a seat. It is not conclusive. Better evidence can be presented than the certificate, and the petitioner informs us he has that evidence. The fact, then, that the sitting member had a certificate, created no "moral obligation" to come here. He knew his right to the seat was contested, that evidence would be presented here to overthrow his certificate, and he was bound, if he intended to make a defence, to stay himself or appoint an agent, and have his proof collected to sustain his claim. If he did not choose to do this, and should now lose by it, he has no one to blame but himself. He cannot set up a distinction between the rights of himself and the petitioner, to produce delay. It is a petitio principii, a begging of the question, to assume this distinction, when the point thus assumed is not only not admitted, but is peremptorily denied. If he must be considered a member of Congress at the commencement of the session, and therefore not bound to defend his claim, merely because he has a certificate, he ought, upon the same principle, to be considered a member through every period of the session; and he might claim to remain here, notwithstanding the testimony may prove that he ought never to have had a certificate.

Again: it is urged that time shall be allowed, because he relied upon his protest, and expected the petitioner's testimony would be rejected. This is not a tenable position. Gentlemen are continually reminding us of the rules which prevail in courts of law. In those tribunals every man is bound to know what the law is; and if a party makes an issue upon a legal point, and relies upon it for his defence, if the court should decide it against him, he will not be allowed on that account to delay the opposite party in a trial upon the merits. If this principle were adopted, a continuance of the cause could at any time be obtained by making a legal issue. Upon gentlemen's own principles, then, this is not a good reason for delay. The sitting member chose to make a legal question, protesting against the legality of the proceedings, and asking the committee to overrule all the petitioner's testimony; but in the mean time he should have prepared for trial. When the legal principle is decided against him, he cannot expect the petitioner to wait until he can go five or six hundred miles to procure evidence to sustain his claims. This would be unreasonable, and cannot therefore be granted. All judicial tribunals must have a time when the doors are closed to the admission of further evidence. Without such a rule, a trial could never be had. Litigants would grow grey during the pendency of their lawsuits, and the proceeding would in fact amount to a denial of justice. If the sitting member were dissatisfied with the decision of the committee upon any point, he should have appealed to the House. We have the right to instruct our committees. They are always under our control. A decision made by them, overruling his protest, or refusing him longer time to procure evidence, could have been reviewed here and reversed, if we thought proper to reverse it, the next day after it was made, as well as now.

He made no such appeal, but submitted to the decision; and there is no reason why we should now interpose for his relief. It will not do to say it is a hard case; that justice will be done by our refusal of time. The same may be said in every case in court where the party wants time granted, but has used no diligence to get ready for trial. Neither will it do to say that the people of the district demand longer time, as some gentlemen have said during the discussion. Who speaks the sentiments of the people? Who is the true representative of the people? That is what we are about to decide. Whilst one party alleges that the people want more time, the other says the people do not want it. We must decide, therefore, according to all the circumstances, without reference to either of these declarations.

We come now to the next point in this controversy, which is the admissibility of the depositions which have arrived here since the decision and report of the committee. To judge from the zeal displayed by gentlemen to bring in these depositions as proof, we might conclude that the whole case turned upon this hinge. Indeed, it seems to be tacitly admitted that, without their reception, taking the case upon the testimony before the committee, there is a majority of the legally qualified votes in favor of the petitioner. If this be so, we should examine and decide the proposition to admit this new proof with the greater care and caution. If its effect were only to swell or diminish the majority of one of the parties over the other, its admission or rejection would be of comparatively little importance.

It has been rightly remarked, that we are acting now as a judicial tribunal, and, as such, must be governed by the rules adopted in those tribunals, for the administration of justice. We are not bound by the inflexible rules of any particular court; nor are we restrained or guided by any law of Congress upon this subject; it is matter of serious regret that there is no law to regulate these contests. Still, no one will deny that we ought to be governed by the general principles observed in all judicial bodies, which secure fairness in the proceedings, and accomplish the ends of justice in the result. The taking of depositions is regulated in all the States, either by positive statute, or by the rules and practice of the courts. One great principle will be found to prevail universally: which is, that no undue advantage is to be gained by either party over the other. In every court, it will be found that the opposite party must either be notified of the time and place of taking the depositions, so that he may be present to cross-examine the witnesses, or else he has time allowed him after they come in, to take testimony to explain, rebut, or discredit the evidence. The experience of succeeding ages has shown the wisdom of these rules, and they ought not to be lightly departed from, even in this enlightened assembly. Depositions, to be legal, must be taken before some person authorized to administer oaths; and, as a general rule, they must be taken on sufficient notice; allowing something like twenty-five miles a day to the adverse party, Sundays excepted, to travel to the place of taking them. In some places he is only required to travel twenty miles per day. These general rules, applied to the depositions before us, will readily determine their admissibility.

They consist of two parcels: the first dated on the 30th day of November, purporting to be taken before L. Fullom and Charles Greer, at Buncombe county; but what part of it is not known.

There was no cross-examination of these witnesses by the petitioner or his counsel; no proof that they were present. To render them admissible, therefore, proof must be adduced that due notice was given, and that the depositions were taken pursuant to the notice, before some person authorized to swear the witnesses. Both these are wanting. There is no certificate or seal of a clerk of the court, to show that the persons before whom the examinations took place were justices of the peace. Without this, the testimony could not be admitted in any court, in another State or district. This is a fatal objection. The depositions do not show, upon their face, where they were taken, except that it was in Buncombe county. This is also a fatal objection. Such papers could not be admitted as proof any where, in a well-ordered community. In fact, they are not only no depositions, but they are not even affidavits; and yet we are urged to hear them, for the purpose of depriving an individual of one of his dearest privileges, and of excluding from this House a man said to be elected by the people as their representative.

How is it with the second parcel of depositions? They purport to have been taken in February last, during the progress of this investigation, and after the committee had decided against giving the parties longer time to take depositions.

These depositions are inadmissible, because taken ex parte; that is to say, without sufficient notice to the adversary. A notice may be given of the intention to take depositions; yet, if it do not allow a reasonable time to go to the place of taking them, or if it be given under circumstances which excuse the opposite party from attending, the depositions cannot be used as evidence. There is no better rule can be adopted than that which a man has himself prescribed in relation to others. The sitting member has laid down a rule on the subject of admissibility of evidence, in his protest, to which I will refer for the purpose of showing what he considers ex parte depositions. It may be found on pages 21 and 22 of the report of the committee, and is as follows: "I object particularly to all the depositions taken by the petitioner at Morgantown, Burke county, North Carolina, because: 1st. They were taken ex parte; 2d. They were taken within a few days before the meeting of Congress, and after I was obliged to leave home to attend to my public duties." Such is his view of the question. By reference to page 18 of the same document, it will be seen that the minority of the committee agree with him in opinion. Speaking of the depositions taken at Morgantown, they say: "A reference to the testimony will show that the sitting member was not present, either in person or by counsel; or, in other words, that the depositions are ex parte. The sitting member acknowledges that notice was served on him, but he alleges that a moral obligation, growing out of the relations in which he stood to his constituents, called him to Washington, distant from his residence five hundred miles; and that the friend on whom he relied, and to whom he had written, to act for him on that occasion, was unavoidably absent. He further alleges that, inasmuch as it was physically impossible for him to have been at Morgantown on the 1st of December, and at Washington on the 7th, points six hundred miles apart, and as paramount duties called him to the latter place, the option of attending either in person or by attorney was virtually denied him; which option, he contends, ought to have been afforded him, in order to stamp the depositions there taken with the character of legal evidence. The consequence of the non-attendance of his agent was, that no cross-examination was had in the cases above referred to; and as the undersigned have no just cause to impute laches to the sitting member, in not attending himself, or being represented by counsel, they have come to the conclusion that the depositions thus taken ought to be rejected."

Here, then, is the rule laid down by the sitting member, and by the minority, who advocate his claim to a seat on this floor. Neither he nor they can complain, if his testimony shall be tried by the same rule. It may be replied, that the majority of the committee decided against them, and admitted the depositions taken at Morgantown. No matter; that does not change the case at all. Truth is inflexible. If the rule were good against the petitioner, it is good for him. But, besides this, the minority and the sitting member still adhere to their position. If they have changed their ground, why do they not say so? If they are for equal justice, why not contend for the admission of these depositions in the alternative? Why not say, that if the depositions at Morgantown are admitted, then these ought to be; but if not, then they should be excluded? I have heard no such argument. On the contrary, gentlemen are insisting absolutely upon receiving these depositions, and expressing great astonishment that any one should object to them. But to the rule.

I have already shown that, so far as "moral obligation" was concerned, these persons are upon a perfect equality. If the depositions taken at Morgantown were inadmissible, because the sitting member was obliged to come here and take his seat, then the depositions taken by him at Haywood county, in February last, during the time the petitioner was compelled to stay here, (if he did his duty,) are equally inadmissible. The sitting member insists that he was not bound to regard the notice served upon him to take depositions on the 1st of December, because he had to be here, under a paramount obligation, on the 7th of the same month. By the same principle, the petitioner was not bound to regard the notice served upon him to take depositions at Haywood, in February, when he was compelled, under a paramount obligation, to remain here, prosecuting his claims to the seat which he believes is his right, and to which his antagonist is not properly entitled. Each one presents the proof of his claim; the sitting member a certificate of his election, and the petitioner offers evidence to show that the certificate ought to have been given to him, he having a majority of the votes of the district. The one creates just as strong a "moral obligation" as the other; for from the moment a notice is given that an election is to be contested, a certificate becomes valueless. This House cares not who has the certificate; they inquire who has a majority of the legal votes. Whoever shows this in his favor, is entitled to be the representative. So that the notice was given in this case under circumstances which, according to the reasoning of the minority and the sitting member, excused the petitioner from attendance, and consequently the depositions are ex parte and inadmissible.

But the notice was insufficient in other respects. A reasonable time must be allowed the party to travel to the place of taking the depositions. Here the distance is fixed by the sitting member at six hundred miles from this place to the district in which the testimony was taken. What time was allowed to travel it? The notice given was eleven days.

[Here some gentleman remarked that it was seventeen days. A copy of the notice was handed to Mr. H., from which it appeared that depositions were to be taken at various places on different days, commencing at the end of eleven or twelve days, and going on to seventeen or twenty days; and it was remarked that none of these depositions were taken on the days first named.]

Mr. H. continued. For the purposes of his argument, it was perfectly immaterial whether the depositions were taken on the first day named or not. They were all to be taken in the same region; and the party had a right to be present at the taking of them all, first as well as last. As a sufficient time had not been allowed him to travel to the district before the commencement of the examination, he was not bound to go at all. How could he know that the sitting member would not take testimony on the day first named? He was bound to suppose he would take it, because the notice so declared. But even seventeen or twenty days were not sufficient notice. Twenty-five miles a day for seventeen days, not deducting Sundays, would only have taken him four hundred and twenty-five miles. He would still be one hundred miles from the district. The sitting member ought not to have asked a man to travel five or six hundred miles in the dead of winter in twelve days, when he complained of a notice given to him in the district on the 2d day of November, to take depositions on the 1st of December. The testimony was illegal, therefore, and must be rejected for this defect, if there were no other.

But, Mr. H. said, he took a still higher ground with regard to it. The notice was given in open violation of the decision of the committee, that no longer time should be allowed to collect proofs. Gentlemen had contended that the committee did not decide that no more proofs should be taken; they only declared that no more time should be allowed to take it. He said he meant no disrespect to gentlemen, in denouncing this distinction as a mere sophism. When the committee determined that no more time should be given, they determined that the parties should commence the trial—should begin the investigation immediately, with the proofs they had. How could they progress with the trial, and be absent at the same time, taking testimony? Did they mean to allow one party to entrap the other, by sending off runners or agents for testimony, whilst the other rested quietly with what he had, making out his case before the committee? No such thing. The door was closed. No more proof was to be admitted. This is the only reasonable or sensible construction to be given to the decision. If either party was dissatisfied, an appeal lay to the House, and the committee would have been instructed, either to allow longer time, or to progress with the investigation. The decision was submitted to; and, from that moment, no proof obtained by either party is legitimate.

Various cases have been quoted from the proceedings of courts, to show that this evidence ought to be received. We have been told of a motion to continue a cause on account of an absent witness; the motion overruled, the trial commenced, and the witness unexpectedly appearing; and we are asked, with an air of triumph, whether the court would refuse to hear the witness? I answer, no. Another case is stated of a similar motion for continuance, made on account of the absence of depositions regularly taken, which were to be forwarded by mail, but had not arrived. The motion is overruled, the trial commences, and during its progress the depositions arrive; the inquiry is made again, whether the court would not allow them to be read? My answer is, that in some courts they might be received, and in others not. It would depend upon the rules and practice of the court, and the effect the introduction of the testimony would have, to take the opposite party by surprise, and prevent him from having a fair hearing. In some courts, depositions are required to be filed a certain number of days before the commencement of the term. But my principal answer to both these, and to all the cases I have heard, is, that there is not the slightest analogy between them and the case before the House.

I will put a case which I think is analogous. A motion is made by the defendant for the continuance of a cause, alleging the absence of witnesses, at the distance of one hundred miles, whose testimony is necessary to him in the attainment of justice. The court refuse his application, and the trial commences, which is to last a week. The next evening the defendant serves a notice upon the plaintiff to attend at the residence of the witnesses, two days thereafter, (travelling fifty miles a day,) to hear their examination. Is there a lawyer in this House, or a man of common sense in the country, who would advise the plaintiff to go? Not one. But suppose the defendant, by his agents, were to procure the depositions, and bring them in during the trial, would the court receive them? Is there a lawyer here who would risk his professional reputation by rising and asking the court to receive such testimony? Sir, there is not one. If he would, there is no court in the United States who would listen to him for a moment. Such, in my estimation, is the case now before the House, and the same principles which would reject the one set of depositions would equally reject the other.

What would be the effect of admitting this testimony? It would be ruinous to the petitioner. If the sitting member had intended to entrap him, he could not have devised a surer plan to accomplish his object. I do not charge him with any such design; nor do I intend in anything I say upon the present occasion to impugn his motives; personally he has my respect. I speak only of the effect of his measures. In the first instance, he refuses to continue the taking of depositions, on account of a moral obligation to come here. When the petitioner has followed him here, he asks leave to go or send back to take more testimony. This is refused; and he then leaps over the moral obligation, the decision of the committee and the distance of six hundred miles, and requires the petitioner to recommence the examination of witnesses. If testimony thus taken can be received, the petitioner will be completely overreached, and subjected to the greatest injustice.

Yet, after all this, we are told that the objections against these depositions are "mere technicalities!" The sitting member and his friends say this, too, when all of us who look at the papers must see that he has been making technical objections from the commencement. He objected to the notice of contest, because it was not specific; it did not set out the names of the witnesses, what they would swear, and the points on which the petitioner would rely in the contest. This no man could do; for it was impossible to know beforehand what the witnesses would prove, or what new facts might leak out during the contest. Again: he objected and protested against receiving the depositions taken at Morgantown, because he had to come to Washington, and could not be there "in person," although an agent might have attended then as well as now. Timely notice was given to him of taking them, and no advantage sought for or obtained by the petitioner. He could not anticipate that the sitting member would not remain in the district to take depositions in December. Indeed, he was bound to believe the contrary, for a notice had been served upon him by the sitting member to attend at Franklin on the 7th of December, to cross-examine witnesses. After such a course, it does not seem kind in him and his friends to talk so much about "technicalities." But I have shown that the defects in this testimony are not formal and technical, they are substantial, and such as no change of mere forms could possibly remove.

Gentlemen ask if we are afraid of light. I answer, no! but let the light shine upon both sides; let it come down direct from above, and not be forced to shine upon one side, whilst the other is left in total darkness. We are asked if we fear justice. No! it is the very thing we seek; but we do not think it attainable by disregarding all the rules heretofore observed in its administration; rules which are founded upon the wisdom and experience of successive generations of men, and implicitly followed in all similar investigations in the judicial tribunals of the country. Again: gentlemen inquire if we do not believe the freemen of North Carolina will speak the truth? I answer, yes! I have no doubt of it. My regard for the freemen of North Carolina is as high as that of any gentleman upon this floor; and I would as soon receive their testimony as the testimony of my own constituents, who, in point of all that constitutes good citizens and good patriots, are equal to any like number of men in the United States. But I do not believe that I ought to violate the constitution or laws of my country to receive any man's testimony. When it has been legally and properly taken, let it be received; when illegally and improperly taken, let it be rejected. This question is to be settled without reference to the character of the witness, whether good or bad, or the State or district in which he may reside. In this sentiment I am sure the freemen of North Carolina will most heartily concur.

There is another question connected with these depositions, which ought not to be overlooked. Some gentlemen are of opinion that, if a majority of the House should reject the testimony, yet those who differ with the majority may read it, and be influenced by it in coming to their conclusions as to the contest between the parties. This is an erroneous opinion. As a judicial body we must decide upon the admissibility of proof when offered; and if it should be excluded, it cannot be heard by any member of the court. Suppose a court of justice to be composed of three judges, and two of them overrule a deposition because it has not been properly taken, can the other judge, when he comes to give an opinion upon the merits of the case, be governed by what was contained in such deposition? Clearly not. It has not been before the court during the discussion. Neither the parties nor their counsel have commented upon or noticed it. The decision is made in reference to what has been before the court. The majority of the judges themselves would decide the case differently, perhaps, if the deposition had been admitted. A majority must rule as well in deciding preliminaries and incidental points, as in determining the main question; and when testimony is once rejected, it is no longer in court, and cannot be regarded by any member of the court, no matter how much he may be dissatisfied with the decision of the majority. The same principles apply here; and, if a majority should reject these depositions, no member of this court will have a right to consider them in making a final decision between the sitting member and the petitioner.

Mr. Speaker, I had thought of examining the facts of the case, and showing, as I think the truth is, that the petitioner is entitled to a seat, by having a clear and decided majority of the legal votes given at the election. But, as the evidence has all been upon our tables for several weeks, giving each one an opportunity to examine for himself; as the honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. McKAY] has gone into it at large, and as I have already detained the House a considerable time, I shall decline doing so. I ought not to close, however, without saying a word or two in reference to the case of Moore and Letcher, so often adverted to in this debate.

Some gentlemen quote it as good authority upon various points, whilst others think it ought not to be regarded as deciding any thing. It has been said that the majority of the committee reported that Mr. Moore was entitled to the seat, and then turned round and voted to send the contest back to the people, because they could not tell who was elected. Now, sir, I was a member of the committee, and one of the majority who made that report. I believed then, as I do now, that upon a fair and impartial investigation of all the facts of the case, and a proper application of the constitution and law to those facts, Thomas P. Moore was duly elected. We reported accordingly. But, after the subject had been discussed in the House for many days; after various decisions of the House—some for and some against the decisions of the committee—after seeing a majority of the House declaring one vote to be good upon certain testimony, and another bad, upon the same state of facts, we voted for the resolution which referred the subject back to the people. What was that resolution? Did it declare that we could not tell who was elected? No, sir; it did no such thing. If it had been so worded as to contain that sentiment, I never would have voted for it; and I believe I am authorized, from conversations held both then and since, to say for my colleagues who were on the committee, that not one of them would have voted for it.

It speaks of what the House can do; not what particular individuals in the House believed. It speaks of the House as a body, and not of individual members. We voted for that resolution, because we believed the House, by its decisions, had thrown the case into such confusion; had crossed its own track, and made such erroneous and contradictory decisions, that it was just as likely to decide the case wrong as right. We believed it better, therefore, to send it directly back to the people at once, and let them do what they pleased with it; and we voted for the resolution under these impressions. So much for that case.

I rose chiefly to discuss three points: the propriety of voting upon separate propositions, the motion to grant the sitting member longer time to take depositions, and the admissibility of the new testimony which has come in since the report of the committee. Having shown, I think conclusively, that we ought not to vote on these separate propositions; that no more time should be given, and that the depositions are wholly inadmissible, I cheerfully give way to other gentlemen who are so anxious to obtain the floor.

Mr. GRAVES said there were party considerations brought into this question, and he had it from good authority that the sitting member was for Judge White's and the petitioner for Mr. Van Buren's pretensions to the presidential chair. He did not question the petitioner's motives, but it was well known that the friends of the gentleman there had the majority, and could take the question at any time. He did not complain of their course this session, but he did hope that the question would not be forced that night. He was not in favor of either of the gentlemen preferred by the sitting member and the petitioner for the next presidency. Between the two, however, he had a decided choice; and he should give his vote on this occasion in favor of the sitting member, because his views on the presidential election were nearer approximated to his own than the predilections of the petitioner. He begged the House, at the same time, to be assured that his vote on the pending question would be a conscientious one.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, here moved an adjournment; and

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MERCER hoped the hour would be noted on the journal.

[It was then four o'clock.]

At the request of Mr. BYNUM, Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew his motion to adjourn; and

Mr. BYNUM inquired of the Chair what would be the situation of this question, if they adjourned without taking it that night; and if it would not give place to all the other business on the Speaker's table.

The CHAIR replied that that would be the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, then moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, giving it the preference, from day to day, over all other business, until it was disposed of.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered; and the motion to suspend, taken by tellers, was negatived: Yeas 92, nays 77—not two thirds in the affirmative.

Mr. MERCER then renewed the same motion, and asked the yeas and nays thereon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an adjournment, remarking that the motion could as well be made on Monday as then.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the motion to adjourn was negatived: Yeas 83, nays 110.

Mr. MERCER then moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of enabling him to offer a resolution giving this subject the preference over all other business on Monday and Tuesday next, unless sooner disposed of; and on that motion Mr. M. asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

This question was also decided in the negative: Yeas 96, nays 92—not two thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. GRAVES being then entitled to the floor—

Mr. HOPKINS asked the gentleman to yield it for a moment, while he made a motion which he thought would meet the approbation of all sides of the House. If the gentleman would give way for a moment, Mr. H. would move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of submitting a proposition, which he hoped it would be the pleasure of the House to adopt. It was as follows:

Resolved, That the contested election from the 12th congressional district in the State of North Carolina be made the order of the day for Monday next, to the exclusion of all other business for that day, for the especial purpose of affording to the sitting member and petitioner a further opportunity of submitting to this House such remarks, in relation to the said contested election, as they or either of them may think proper.

Contested Election.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. GRAVES refused to yield the floor for the purpose indicated, and replied, that from the manifest indisposition of the House to adjourn, he wished to conclude the very few remarks he had to make, and the gentleman might then make his motion. Mr. G. then proceeded to address the House, and expressed a hope that party considerations would not be brought to bear upon it, but that it would be decided according to the principles of right and justice. He appealed to the majority of the House, after suffering some weeks to be spent on the preliminary question, to allow this discussion to go on at least two or three days longer. Mr. G. was proceeding to reply to Mr. McKAY, when he gave way to

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, who moved a call of the House; which was ordered: Yeas 74, nays 67.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved an adjournment; and

Mr. LANE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; whereupon,

Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew his motion.

The call of the House was then proceeded in for some time; when, on motion of Mr. HAWES, its further proceedings were dispensed with—taken by tellers: Yeas 92, nays 62.

Mr. GRAVES then resumed, and proceeded to reply to Messrs. McKAY and HAMER, and in opposition to the report of the Committee of Elections; and after proceeding a short time, he again gave way to

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, who moved an adjournment; and

Mr. HAWES asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being taken, the House again refused to adjourn: Yeas 79, nays 103.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, then moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of offering a resolution to make this subject the special order of the day for Monday next, from and after 12 o'clock on that day. Mr. M. briefly explained that he had been given to understand that the sitting member wished to address the House, but that he was then indisposed. [Mr. GRAHAM was in his seat on the floor.]

The motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to: Ayes 86, noes 85—not two thirds in the affirmative.

Mr. GRAVES resumed his remarks, and, after proceeding some time, again gave way to

Mr. HARD, who moved an adjournment; and

Mr. HAWKINS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the House again refused to adjourn: Yeas 74, nays 101.

Mr. GRAVES then resumed, and addressed the House till twenty minutes after eight o'clock, when he again gave way to

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, who moved an adjournment.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

Mr. CALHOON withdrew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of enabling him to move that this subject be made the special order for Monday next. He remarked that he made this motion to accommodate the sitting member, who was then indisposed, as he was informed, and wished to address the House.

[Mr. GRAHAM was still in his seat at the time the motion was submitted.]

Mr. PEYTON wished the gentleman so to modify his motion as to permit the sitting member and the petitioner only to address the House on Monday; and that, as soon as they had concluded, the question should be taken on each proposition separately.

Mr. GARLAND replied, that he would merely make the motion to suspend; and if permitted by the House to submit his resolution, the gentleman might then move his amendment.

Mr. PEYTON asked for the yeas and nays, on the motion; which were ordered.

The motion to suspend was then negatived: Yeas 91, nays 95.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, then renewed the motion that the House adjourn, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; but the House again refused to adjourn: Yeas 81, nays 105; and

Mr. GRAVES continued his remarks for a few moments, chiefly in reply to Mr. ANTHONY, and then sent a document to the Clerk's table to be read. The document in question was some election case in Maine.

Mr. CAMBRELENG objected to the reading; and

Mr. GRAVES moved for the reading, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the motion was agreed to: Yeas 106, nays 76.

Mr. ANTHONY raised a question of order, whether the gentleman could read, or cause to be read, such a document as this, in refutation of an argument of Mr. A's yesterday, on the main question before the House. The document was a case from Maine, and did not apply to his argument in reference to the course pursued in Pennsylvania.

The CHAIR said the gentleman had sent a book to the Clerk's table, containing a report, which he desired to have read, or in part, and the House had determined by its vote that it should be read, and the Clerk would read it under that order.

The Clerk accordingly read an extract from the case.

Mr. GRAVES then resumed, and was proceeding to comment, with some severity, on the conduct of those gentlemen who had voted against the motion he had made, when he was called to order by several members, and the Chair pronounced him to be out of order.

Mr. G. then proceeded, and again recurred to the arguments of Messrs. HAMER and VANDERPOEL, &c.; but very little of what he said could be heard. At the end of about half an hour, he again gave way to

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, who moved an adjournment; and

Mr. GILLET asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the motion was rejected: Yeas 82, nays 107. So the House again refused to adjourn; and

Mr. GRAVES again proceeded, and read various extracts from the printed depositions in the report of the Committee of Elections. At 11 o'clock Mr. G. gave way, apparently without concluding, to Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky, who commenced addressing the Chair. The speech of Mr. GRAVES, and the various motions to adjourn, taken by yeas and nays, had occupied the House upwards of seven hours, Mr. G. having commenced at half past 3 o'clock.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, who was in possession of the floor, after a few remarks, gave way to

Mr. WISE, who remarked, that as the gentleman was a young member, he would move an adjournment.

Mr. PEYTON asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and, upon taking the question, there were: Yeas 80, nays 107. So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CUSHMAN rose and addressed the Chair, for the purpose, he said, of demanding the previous question.

The CHAIR decided the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CALHOON] to be entitled to the floor.

Mr. CUSHMAN remarked that the gentleman from Kentucky had spoken, and given way to another gentleman.

The CHAIR said, that to give the gentleman from Kentucky the floor, under the circumstances, was in conformity with the courtesy and practices of the House; and he therefore reiterated his decision in favor of that gentleman.

H. OF R.]

Contested Election.

Mr. CUSHMAN said he would not press the point, and withdrew his motion.

Mr. CALHOON then, at about half past 11 P. M., proceeded to address the House. He said he could have no party predilections in this case, for he was equally opposed to the politics of both gentlemen, as he was equally opposed to Judge White and Mr. Van Buren. He then went into an examination and review of the proceedings in the committee, and the details of their report, and, though believing that the sitting member had a clear and decided majority, he preferred sending the election back to the people, so as to place it out of the reach of president-makers and party influences. Mr. C. spoke until within a few minutes of 12 o'clock, when

Mr. LAWLER raised a point of order, that it was not lawful to continue the sessions of the House after 12 o'clock on Saturday night, so as to break in upon the Sabbath.

The CHAIR replied that this question had once before been raised within his recollection, and decided. At the 1st session of the 19th Congress, the question was raised at 12 o'clock on the last night of the session, which was on a Saturday; and it was within the memory of the Chair, as well as of other members present, that the then Speaker decided that, as a question of order, there was no difficulty about it; that during the war Congress had, in fact, sat all day, or through all the day, on the Sabbath, and passed a large number of important bills. The Chair, however, upon the present occasion, would not undertake to say whether it was in order or not for this discussion to continue, and would leave it for the House to determine.

Mr. LAWLER then took an appeal from what he understood to be the decision of the Chair, and asked the reading of the resolution fixing the hour of meeting at 11 o'clock each day. Mr. L. argued the point for some ten or fifteen minutes, that 12 o'clock having elapsed, it was then the Sabbath; and being a dies non for legislation, further discussion ought to be arrested at that time.

The point was debated for some time between Messrs. LAWLER, UNDERWOOD, PEYTON, and ADAMS, the last gentleman concluding by a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WISE then raised another point of order: that as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CALHOON] was in possession of the floor, when he was arrested by the other point of order, no motion could be made to adjourn until that gentleman yielded the floor.

The CHAIR overruled the last point, on the ground that a question of order always interposed, if made, in the discussion of every question; and that the motion to adjourn was always in order.

Mr. REED then asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; which were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD hoped the hour would be recorded on the journal; and he moved an amendment to the motion to that effect.

The CHAIR remarked that a motion to adjourn was not susceptible of amendment, but he supposed there would be no objection to the time of night being entered on the journal; and he would direct the Clerk to note it.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, appealed to Mr. ADAMS to withdraw his motion, to enable Mr. M. to renew the motion he had before attempted to make to proceed with this subject on Monday next.

Mr. ADAMS refused; and the question being taken, the House rejected the motion to adjourn: Yeas 83, nays 95.

The question then recurring upon Mr. LAWLER'S appeal from the decision of the Chair,

Mr. HAWES moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. CALHOON, of Massachusetts, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. LAWLER then withdrew his appeal; consequently, the motion of Mr. HAWES fell; and then

Mr. L. renewed his appeal; but the Chair decided that now the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CALHOON] was entitled to the floor on the previous subject.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from that decision, and

Mr. HAWES moved to lay that appeal on the table.

The CHAIR having stated the grounds of his decision, and Mr. ADAMS having withdrawn his appeal,

Mr. LAWLER renewed his original appeal against the power of the House to continue its sitting after 12 o'clock on Saturday night, and argued the point for some ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. HAWES demanded the previous question on the appeal; and

Mr. ADAMS made a few remarks against the right of the House, or of the majority, under the circumstances, to continue in business at that hour.

Mr. EVANS then moved an adjournment; and

Mr. PEYTON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, (it was then one o'clock A. M.;) and the House again refused to adjourn: Yeas 80, nays 95.

The question then recurring on seconding the motion for the previous question on the appeal, which was taken by tellers; and ninety-six gentlemen being counted off in the affirmative, a wish was expressed from several quarters of the House that the noes be not counted;

Mr. ADAMS rose and said he hoped they would be counted, and it would then be seen if a quorum would vote.

Accordingly, only nineteen gentlemen then passed between the tellers, making yeas 96, nays 19; no quorum.

Mr. ADAMS, who had not voted, rose and said he denied the right of this House to compel him to vote on the Sabbath day.

Mr. HAWES moved that the gentleman from Massachusetts be excused from voting.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not ask to be excused.

Mr. LAWLER then moved an adjournment.

Mr. BOYD asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, (but, in consequence of what took place, the vote was not announced till long afterwards,) and the motion was again rejected by the House: Yeas 54, nays 95.

On calling over the roll, Mr. ADAMS had refused to answer to his name; and

Mr. WISE rose and moved that the rules of the House be enforced, and that the member from Massachusetts be thereupon compelled to vote.

After some conversation between the CHAIR, Mr. HAMER, and Mr. WISE, on the point,

Mr. BEARDSLEY remarked that, understanding the gentleman from Massachusetts had conscientious scruples about voting at that time, he moved that the gentleman be excused by the House.

Mr. ADAMS said he did not desire to be excused, nor did he refuse to vote upon the ground assumed by the gentleman from New York. He had no conscientious scruples on the subject; for, if the public business demanded, he would sit there throughout and till midnight of the Sabbath; but he held that the House had no right to sit there at that hour, without first passing an express order, setting forth that the public business demanded it, or could not be dispensed with.

Mr. PEYTON then addressed the House for about half an hour, commenting with great severity upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, and the inconsistency of his course in being there then after midnight, and his refusal to vote after that hour, on the last night of the last session of Congress. Mr. P. was several times called to order, both by the Chair and by the House. He spoke till a few minutes after 2 o'clock.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BEARDSLEY said that, as he perceived he had misapprehended the member from Massachusetts, and as the gentleman had not refused to vote upon conscientious scruples, he withdrew his motion in relation thereto; whereupon,

Mr. MERCER moved that the member from Massachusetts be not required to vote.

Mr. BYNUM then rose, and, after a few remarks, renewed the motion to make the subject of the contested election the special order of the day, in preference to all other business, on Monday and Tuesday next.

Mr. WISE. I object to that motion, sir; I wish the motion pending before the House to be decided before any other.

Mr. MERCER then withdrew his motion, for the purpose of submitting the latter motion; whereupon,

Mr. WISE moved that the gentleman from Massachusetts be required (subsequently modified by him "compelled") to vote, and addressed the House at some length in reply to Mr. BYNUM. In the course of his remarks he was called to order by the latter gentleman, and an altercation of an angry and painfully personal character ensued, which was arrested by the House.

Mr. MERCER interposed; and, after a few remarks and suggestions by Messrs. MERCER, PEYTON, THOMAS, R. M. JOHNSON, ADAMS, ALLAN of Kentucky, LAWLER, THOMPSON of South Carolina, and HOWARD, both the gentlemen explained, and made their acknowledgments to the House, which had unanimously required that the controversy should there end.

Mr. LAWLER then withdrew his appeal; and

Mr. DAVIS asked leave to move that the subject of the contested election for North Carolina be made the special order of the day, in preference to all other business, from and after one o'clock on Monday, and twelve o'clock on Tuesday, unless sooner disposed of; which motion, by general consent, was put and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,

The House then adjourned, at half past 4 o'clock A. M.

MONDAY, MARCH 28.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, with the motion to commit them, with instructions to report a bill, to the Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion to amend, by substituting the Committee on Public Lands, being the first business in order, were taken up.

Mr. C. ALLAN, of Kentucky, called for the reading of the instructions; after which he continued and concluded the course of remarks which he began on Monday last, as given entire in preceding pages. When Mr. ALLAN had taken his seat,

Mr. HAWES rose, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: When I offered the resolutions now under consideration, a few days since, I moved that they be printed and laid on the tables of the members of this House, with a view to call them up, and have them referred to the same committee to which the bill from the Senate on the same subject might be sent, in the event that it should pass that body. It has been the usual course, in relation to matters of this kind, to have them printed and laid on the table, until the subject is brought forward for action in the House. My colleague has thought proper to bring them under discussion at the present time; and, having no objection to that course, I shall proceed to their consideration, at the same time that I shall feel it an imperative duty to answer my colleagues who have preceded me, in relation to this and other matters.

The Representatives on this floor have been requested, and the Senators in the other body instructed, by a majority of the Legislature of Kentucky, to vote for a bill distributing the proceeds of the public lands among the States; or, in other words, to vote for Mr. Clay's land bill. This is not the only time since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, that the Legislature conceived it to be their duty to instruct their Senators to do an act which they knew would be done without such instructions, and request the Representatives to do that which they knew a part of them had already determined to perform, and another portion had determined not to do. I remember, a time long since past, when the Legislature, by an almost unanimous vote, requested her Representatives to give their votes to the present illustrious Chief Magistrate of this Union. The then members of Congress were requested to vote for an individual as President who had received more of the people's votes than all the other candidates put together; and I ask my colleague, [Mr. ALLAN] who has expressed such satisfaction at the present request, what was the course of Mr. Clay and those who acted with him on that ever memorable occasion? They proclaimed that the Legislature had no guardianship over the members of the lower House of Congress; that they appealed to the people of the congressional districts from which they came; and upon their decision, and theirs alone, would they rely for a justification of their conduct. I ask, if these were not the views of the then members of Congress? Mr. Speaker, I cannot, I will not, vote for Mr. Clay's land bill, except upon one condition, to wit: that a majority of my constituents, those who reposed their confidence in me, and for whose opinions I shall ever entertain the highest respect, shall instruct me so to do. In that event, which I am conscious will never happen, for I have a firm reliance on their judgment, discretion, and love of country, I shall either comply with their request, or resign my seat here. I am the Representative of the people of the second congressional district, and not of the Legislature.

I have on one occasion, (if not more,) since I have been a member here, been forced, from considerations of public policy and duty, to act contrary to the request of the Legislature. There was a time, and that not long past, when that body thought it to be their especial duty to request the Representatives from Kentucky to prostrate the rights and liberties of their constituents, and of the people of the other States of this confederacy, and bow in humble submission to the Bank of the United States, and its foreign stockholders, consisting of earls, dukes, marquises, barons, lords, esquires, &c., &c., by restoring the deposits to its vaults, which had been removed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Yes, the Assembly of that State, which the gentleman from Kentucky had said (and it was true) had done so much for the defence of the country during the late war, had acted in this manner, and I then disobeyed their request, and asserted the rights and supremacy of the people over the bank and all other such monopolies. When I see the Legislature pass a solemn resolution, which I believe for the good and welfare of the people whom I represent, it will at all times give me great pleasure to act in unison with their opinion. But when, on the contrary, I see them, influenced by party considerations, act contrary to the interests of the people of the State and the Union, it gives me equal pleasure to declare in my place that I will not comply with the resolution of the majority of the Legislature. That majority knew full well, before passing the resolutions, that the Senators would support the bill; for one of them had introduced the proposition, and the other was known to be favorable to it. That majority knew that every opposition man in Congress from the State of Kentucky would vote for the land bill, as surely as the sun would rise on to-morrow, and that all who agreed with me in opinion would as certainly vote against it; yet, with these facts before their eyes, they had consumed their time in doing that which could not possibly be of any benefit to their constituents. Sir, party considerations were at the bottom of this movement; and, before I close, I shall make some allusion to them.

Mr. Speaker, I have ever held to the doctrine that the Legislature of any State had a right to instruct their Senators to vote accordingly with the opinions of such Legislature, and that they were bound either to obey that will or resign their places; and I conceive that he who violates this first principle of our Government, and thus rudely removes the very foundations of our free institutions, is recreant to the trust reposed in him, and ought never again to be trusted by the people, unless after a long and sincere repentance, and a firm determination to practise a different course. But it is different with a Representative. They are the agents of the people of the several congressional districts, responsible to them, and occupying towards them the same relative position as the Senators to the Legislature. There are, perhaps, not more than four of the Representatives from Kentucky who will act with me in opposition to Mr. Clay's land bill; and there are, perhaps, nine who will pursue a different course. We are all responsible to our constituents; and I may be permitted to add an opinion, that the four, though fewest in number, are with the true interests of the people of the State and Union, while the nine (though equally conscientious) are on this occasion unintentionally against that interest.

My colleague, [Mr. HARDIN,] in the course of his remarks on another subject, has used the following language: "Is there any scene in this world so ridiculous as to see Van Buren's friends place him before the people as the war party candidate, and denounce Harrison and his friends as pusillanimous, cowardly, and ready to betray their country?" The friends of Mr. Van Buren never did hold him up as the war party candidate. They do hold him up as the choice for the next presidency of that party who were determined to vindicate the insulted honor of the nation. They do consider that he is one of that party who would not permit any foreign nation, harmlessly, and at will, to violate a solemn treaty, executed with all due formality, and faithfully performed on our part: one of a party who, when a foreign potentate wished to wring an apology from our Chief Magistrate for doing his duty to his country, would not, at any cost, permit the stain to rest on our escutcheon: one who could not patiently submit to the shameful scene of a monarch of Europe directing and commanding the President of these United States what he should, and what he should not, say to Congress in his annual messages: one of a party who were willing to meet foreign preparation for war against their native country with a corresponding force on our part: one of that party which would not, for the sake of a few dollars and cents, leave our frontiers exposed to foreign invasion, when, from time to time, warned that a powerful armament had been ordered to rendezvous in our neighborhood and off our coast, with no ostensible object, save to coerce a compliance with their demands on the Executive. If these objects make a man a war party candidate, I hope I shall ever be found supporting one of that character. My colleague, [Mr. ALLAN,] who has addressed the House on this subject, has said that he had always voted for appropriations when recommended for the naval service. I have the journal now open before me, and from it I find that when the cloud of war hung darkest in our horizon, when no one here could say at what hour war would be declared against France, or by the French Government against this country; when the countenances of all were solemn at what they thought the lowering and approaching contest; when every breeze from the east bore tidings of immense preparations on the part of France; when it was loudly and constantly proclaimed by the French ministry that nothing but a direct apology from the President would be received for a supposed insult offered to that Government; on the 11th day of January, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs offered the following resolution, to wit: "Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the naval force in commission." Here, then, is a proposition from the head of a committee of this House, proposing merely to inquire into the expediency of increasing the naval force in commission; and what was the vote of my colleague in relation to it? Why, sir, he is found in a small minority of 19 against the mere inquiry, when there are 164, composed of men of all political castes, who are in favor of the proposition. If the gentleman calls this a willingness to vote appropriations when called for, I am unable to comprehend his meaning. What justification he may find for his course under the above circumstances, I know not; but, for myself, I shall ever be found ready to vote appropriations for repelling the invasions, or even probable invasions, of our beloved country by any foreign nation whatsoever. I shall not attempt to follow the gentleman through all his remarks, but will say, that they are much after the order of the attacks which have been made on the administration for the last six years, both on this floor and by the opposition presses throughout the Union, which have been refuted on many occasions; and what is more, they stand condemned by the voluntary suffrages of nearly two thirds of the people of this nation.

My colleague [Mr. HARDIN] again holds this language: "Harrison, who spent his youth, his manhood, and the prime of his life, in camps and battles, in fire and smoke, contending in his country's cause. Many a bloody field can attest Harrison's achievements, and emblazon his fame and glory abroad. Kentucky has won laurels with him and under him. He always did her brave sons justice in the field, and justice in his reports to the War Department. In this approaching election the world will bear witness that Kentucky, amongst her other great virtues, boasts the proud one of gratitude."

Here, Mr. Speaker, are the grounds upon which General Harrison is to be brought before the people of Kentucky for the next presidency; and these are the only reasons urged why the people of that high-minded and patriotic State should support him. Not that he is qualified, from his education and habits, for that high and responsible station; not that he is capable, or has rendered civil services to the nation; not that his opinions or interests are identified with those of the people of Kentucky, but that he has been a warrior; that he has spent his youth and his manhood, the prime of his life, in camps and battles, in fire and smoke, combating in his country's cause. Now, suppose this last prop is taken from him; suppose, after following him through his whole military career, doing complete justice to his warrior deeds, surrounding his brow with every wreath of glory which justly belongs to him; I say, suppose, after doing him complete justice in every thing, we should find that he did not spend his manhood amidst fire and smoke, what claim could he then have to the votes of our patriotic citizens? I shall not, on the present occasion, make an allusion to the personal bravery of this high personage; he may be, and no doubt is, a brave man; and, consequently, I shall say nothing on that head. The history of his military career is the history of the country; it is public property, and as such I shall use it, more especially as my colleague has attempted to convert it to his benefit. Let us then, in the spirit of candor and of justice, follow him through all his campaigns,

Public Lands.

[H. OF R.]

and see whether he can lay a just claim to our suffrages on that score, unaided by any one recommendation beside; for even his friends claim nothing more for him. First, let us see him on the plains of Tippecanoe, which was his best field; and, if not made President for that, he certainly can be for none other. He commanded on that occasion as brave men as ever marched to a field of battle; men who would do honor to any army or any country. The commander, however, according to what was reported at the time, as I have been informed, trusting to his enemies, and those the untamed and untamable savages of the forest, encamped on ground which was pointed out by them, and thus unnecessarily exposed his army to their merciless vengeance. The ground might have been (for aught I know) suitable for an encampment; it probably was, but for the circumstance that the enemy proposed it, which of itself was sufficient to have warned a commanding general against it. On that occasion Kentucky lost many of her brave sons; and Joseph Daviess is still fresh in the memory of his countrymen. Sir, Kentucky has not yet ceased to mourn his loss. He left family, friends, and home, for that fatal field; and, when there, his gallant impetuosity led him to the thickest of the fight; and the lines of the immortal Byron are truly applicable, when he says, in relation to another,

"He rushed into the field, and foremost, fighting, fell."

Again: at Sandusky and the defence of Fort Stevenson, where was General Harrison? He was at the head of an effective and brave army, and left the little devoted band of one hundred and fifty men, commanded by the gallant Croghan and his noble associates, surrounded by an enemy, to defend themselves as best they might against vast odds. But hear what Mr. Duncan, present Governor of Illinois, says in relation to it. He was present; he was one of the officers of the fort on that memorable occasion; he is a friend of General Harrison; he is opposed to Mr. Van Buren for the presidency; and yet, what does he say in relation to that affair? It is unnecessary to recapitulate the whole letter of Governor Duncan, and I shall only take such parts as relate more particularly to the matter now under consideration: "About this time General Harrison received information that the enemy had raised the siege of Fort Meigs, and had started in the direction of Sandusky and Camp Stevenson. Receiving this intelligence, he determined to retreat from his position, and immediately sent an express to Fort Stevenson, which arrived about sunrise, ordering Major Croghan to burn the fort, with the ammunition and stores, and retreat without delay to headquarters, giving some precautionary instructions about the route," &c.

Here it is asserted, by authority which cannot be denied, that Croghan was ordered to retreat, to burn his ammunition and stores; and this, too, by his commanding general, my colleague's redoubtable warrior candidate for the presidency. What, let me ask, was the conduct of Croghan and his brave associates? Why, sir, they took the vote in true republican style, and determined to defend the place at all hazards. They did defend it; and the trainbands of British warriors, with their savage allies, thirsting for the blood of our brave countrymen, were driven back with a slaughter which will ever stand as one of the brightest pages in our history, and an everlasting stigma on the name of him who bade them desert their post and destroy their stores and ammunition. Sir, according to this same letter, "this great hero, this man who had spent his youth and his manhood in fire and smoke, and who is now attempted to be made President for his noble deeds," had piled up his ammunition and stores, and was ready to set fire to them, as soon as Croghan should reach Seneca; and it cannot be doubted that, if he had arrived according to orders, General Harrison would have retreated instantly, leaving the whole frontier, our fleet at Erie, and the boats and stores at Cleveland, (the destruction of which was the object of the invasion and movement down the lake,) at the mercy of the enemy; leaving five hundred miles of frontier undefended, and our whole fleet and millions of the public property exposed to inevitable destruction. But again, let me ask, what was the conduct of this great general, when this little band of patriots were contending against fifteen times their number, though badly provided with ammunition, and protected only by a log fort? Gov. Duncan says that, in relation to Croghan, during the siege, and when the firing could be heard in camp, General Harrison said: "The blood be on his own head; I wash my hands of it," not doubting for a moment that the garrison would be cut off. Mr. Speaker, it is but fair and just, if the American blood, which was expected to be spilt on that day, should rest on the head of Croghan, that he should be permitted to have the glory of the achievement and the victory; and if the general washed his hands of all participation in the deeds of that day, that not only himself, but his friend, should likewise wash his hands of any participation in the glory of the deed. But what do we hear on this floor and elsewhere? That, for his great military achievements, the people of Kentucky are to give him their suffrages for the highest office in the gift of the people.

I come now to the fatal field of Raisin; that field which has been fattened with the best blood of my adopted State; that field which was covered with the best blood of Kentucky's noblest and choicest spirits. Where was General Harrison then? He was not far distant; and why, let me ask my colleague, was he not in the fire and smoke which enveloped the manly forms of those who had gallantly marched in defence of the country? Sir, I remember to have heard it said, but I do not vouch for it, that when the news of that fatal day was received by express at the seat of our State Government, the Legislature was in session, and there was scarcely a being in that spacious establishment but had lost some near and dear relative or friend. Kentucky was in mourning from one extremity to the other; for the blood that flowed on that memorable occasion came from the veins of the flower of Kentucky's chivalry. Years and years after, their bones still bleached on that fatal field of slaughter, and stood as a lasting monument of the ill-starred and unfortunate conduct of the commander-in-chief. Was he in fire and smoke on that occasion? No, he was not; and the spirits of the brave, of our Allen, our Hart, our Simmes, and the many others who bravely perished, unaided and unsupported by their leader, will rise up and proclaim to the people that General Harrison was not amidst the fire and smoke which enveloped their manly forms on that trying and heart-sickening day. Sir, what does Governor Madison say in relation to the conduct of this hero on that occasion? He says: "Our camp police was not, perhaps what it ought to have been. But I am not here the accuser or excuser of any one, though thoroughly convinced that the principal error of the campaign, and that which brought all other evils upon us, was the great distance at which the other parts of the army were kept. Had the disposition been different, had the main body been located within sustaining distance of the advanced corps, or had this corps been reinforced by even a single battalion of five hundred men, ours would have been a victory instead of a defeat." Again, General Lewis says: "Had the general force been five hundred greater than it was, he would not have experienced a defeat."

Sir, will this testimony be denied, the testimony of a Governor of Kentucky, who was a principal actor on the occasion, and who, from the misfortunes of the day,

H. or R.]

Contested Election.

became the commander of those unfortunate troops? My colleague's hero, instead of being in fire and smoke, was not even in sustaining distance, and our brave men perished, and our glorious flag was trampled under foot by the enemy, for the want of being sustained, and because the commander-in-chief did not send five hundred men to their assistance.

I come now to the battle of the Thames, and I ask my colleague [Mr. HARDIN] who was the hero of that day? There is one now in this hall, and a member of this House, and who may be recognised afar off, by the effects of the honorable wounds received on that day, [Colonel JOHNSON;] one who has served his country for a long course of years, both in civil and military occupations; who was indeed amidst fire and smoke, and blood, and death, and destruction, and whose animating voice was heard above the din, the turmoil, the struggle, and the roar of the battle, encouraging the brave spirits who surrounded him to glory and to victory; one who completed the defeat of the enemy by slaying with his own hand their chief, the celebrated Tecumseh; for it was then, and not till then, that they raised the shout and yell of dismay, which was answered by the victorious war-cry of Kentucky; and yet my colleague leaves him, who is also before the people for their suffrages, and takes up another, who was not in the midst of the battle and of danger, and recommends him, for his military deeds alone. Sir, I do not wish to do injustice to General Harrison. If I know my own heart, I would not tear one laurel from his brow; I would rather add to their number, than rudely tear them asunder. What I have said is matter of history, and therefore public property; and I should not, on this occasion, have made an allusion to the late war, had not my colleague, on a former occasion, brought it under consideration, and urged it to Kentuckians, as a reason for discarding the republican candidates for the presidency and vice presidency, and supporting General Harrison.

Again: my colleague says that General Harrison always did Kentucky justice in his reports to the Department of War. It is true, he frequently spoke well of the Kentuckians, and sometimes made insinuations against them and the whole Western country, and particularly charged the militia of Ohio, as not to be depended on. But I will not, in relation to this matter, trust to memory, but use his own words, which may be found in his report to the War Department, written from Chillicothe, and dated March 17, 1813, page 141. He says: "Amongst the reasons which make it necessary to employ a large force, I am sorry to mention the dismay and disinclination to the service which appear to prevail in the Western country." This, Mr. Speaker, I contend is doing a crying injustice to the people of Kentucky, as well as the balance of the West. At what time, let me ask, did dismay and disinclination to the service pervade the West? Search the annals of your country, and when did men ever march more willingly at every summons? They poured forth their blood like water; they left their fire-sides and their homes, their wives and children, every thing which was near and dear to them; and while they are doing all this, suffering hardships and privations almost past the endurance of man, the commanding general writes from his headquarters at Chillicothe, that dismay and disinclination to the service prevail in the Western country; and yet this same West is called on to support him for the presidency. Never; no, never.

Again, in the same letter, after speaking of the militia who were with him the preceding winter, as brave men and much to be depended on, he resumes: "The new draughts from this State are entirely of another character, and are not to be depended upon." People of Ohio, do you see this; and from whom does it come? From a stranger? No. From one unacquainted with you as a people? No. From a citizen of another State? No. But from your own leader during the war; from a citizen of your own territory. Had you a right to expect this? You had not, for you had marched at his summons to the standard of your country. I ask you, are or are not the people of Ohio to be depended upon in the day of trial and of danger? General Harrison says not, but I say they are, and the world will with one accord agree with me in pronouncing it a slander on you character as a people. And yet you are called on to support this man for President, and yield up your republican opinions for his sake. Will you subscribe to this? If you do, the world will proclaim in a voice of thunder, and in the language of Harrison, that you are not to be depended upon.

And now, sir, in relation to Kentucky, he says: "I have no doubt, however, but a sufficient number of good men can be procured; and should they be permitted to serve on horseback, Kentucky would furnish some regiments," &c. Here, Mr. Speaker, after saying that the new draughts of Ohio are not to be depended upon; that if allowed to serve on horseback, Kentucky would furnish, &c., I ask you if this is not likewise a slander on the State in which I reside? 'Tis true he did justice to those who fought at Raisin; he could not avoid it, for such men are difficult to obtain in any country. But when he says that, if allowed to fight on horseback, is it not tantamount to an assertion that on foot they would not make good soldiers? I assert it, and many a glorious field will bear witness, that Kentuckians, whether on foot or on horseback, are not inferior to any in this wide extended Union, the innuendo of General Harrison to the contrary notwithstanding. It has been said that we are divided into three parts, to wit: alligator, horse, and snapping-turtle; and my colleague's hero and candidate for the presidency should have recollected, that when the horse was removed, there still remained the alligator and snapping-turtle; the one celebrated for holding on, and the other for destroying.

Sir, all this is painful to me. It is not consonant to my feelings to call up the history of events which have almost been consigned to oblivion; but I conceive my justification will be found in the course of my colleague, who commenced the investigation of the deeds of General Harrison. I would not willingly inflict pain either on him or his friends, and I owe an apology to the House for having so long detained them on this subject.

Before Mr. HAWES had concluded his remarks, he was arrested by a call for the special order of the day; when the House proceeded to the consideration of the North Carolina

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The motion pending was the proposition of Mr. RENCHER to amend the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, who was entitled to the floor, continued his remarks from Saturday night last. He adverted to the proceedings on that occasion, and defended the course of the minority, whose only purpose and object was to prevent the question being taken then, without taking a vote upon the various principles embraced in the amendment. That amendment, he maintained, embodied the very principles upon which the main question ought to be decided; and he yet expressed a hope that the House would vote on each proposition respectively, after hearing the sitting member and the petitioner. He felt authorized to pledge the House that those with whom he acted would refrain from further discussion. Mr. C. then proceeded to examine the report of the committee, and to controvert their conclusions in favor of the petitioner; supporting, also, at considerable length, the amendment of Mr. RENCHER.

Mr. GRAHAM then rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I sincerely regret that this contested election ever came before Congress. I regret that the valuable time of this House should be consumed in relation to a question which is peculiarly the province and the business of the people at home to decide. I regret that some fifty or sixty thousand dollars of the public money should be expended in the investigation of this subject. I regret the wide and irrelevant range of the debate on this matter; and in my head and in my heart I regret to have witnessed some of the scenes which transpired in this temple of liberty on Saturday night and Sunday morning last; for, sir, day was dawning when this House adjourned. In the midst of these regrets, I have one most cheering consolation and reflection. I hope the House and the country will bear in mind that I have had no agency, neither part nor lot, in instituting and introducing this protracted prosecution. I am no volunteer in this matter. I am the defendant, and a most unwilling party to this procedure. My duty, not my will, connects me with this vexatious contest. The verdict of the people, and the judgment of their own appointed sworn officers, solemnly rendered on the faithful finding of the ballot-box, have imposed upon me obligations and duties, which I should be recreant to freemen and freedom if I voluntarily abandoned. A deep sense of duty, and a high regard for the right of suffrage and the majesty of the people, whose sovereign will has been collected and proclaimed from the ballot-box, compel me to stand forth and endeavor to vindicate the rights, and privileges, and honor of my constituents. These very constituents are now looking with an eagle's eye, and turning an attentive ear to the proceedings of this body. They are quite anxious to learn and ascertain whether their constitutional rights to elect their own agents, which is the highest privilege of a republican freeman and an American citizen, are to be superseded and sacrificed. They desire to know whether their old, known, and well-established customs, usages, and habits, of themselves and their ancestors, are to be violated and destroyed, to defeat their own expressed will. Mr. Speaker, these pure, plain patriots, who are the salt of the earth and the strength of the nation, will not hold him guiltless who shall attempt to take away their privileges, and overturn and trample upon the good old honest customs of liberty.

In the twelfth congressional district of North Carolina there are six counties. It is upwards of two hundred miles long, and about eighty miles wide, intersected with lofty ledges of mountains. There are sixty-seven separate places of holding elections. In such a district, how can any representative, without knowing the names of voters alleged to be illegal, without knowing the particular objections to them, and the precincts at which they voted, be able to protect and defend the rights of the ballot-box and the privileges of the people? It is impossible. The high prerogative privilege, the right of suffrage, cannot be understandingly protected and defended, unless and until the charges are rendered certain, definite, and particular. There is in this vexatious contest no allegation made against me. It is made against the people and officers of my district, whose public affairs in this House have, for a time, been committed to my care and keeping. Now, sir, in their name and in their behalf, I have heretofore filed my protest, and demanded of the petitioner, Mr. Newland, an express and written allegation against them, before they or any one of them should be called upon to answer the charges made against them, and before any evidence was taken in the depositions concerning their votes. The petitioner, although called upon, before one deposition was taken, to furnish a list of the alleged illegal voters, declined and refused to do so; and thereby has produced all the delays, and difficulties, and wasteful expenditures of time and money, that have since followed. Why must I be compelled to go into the investigation of this matter in the dark and blindfolded? What good reason can be assigned why the petitioner should not have set forth names, objections, precincts; and state who, why, where? Sir, in North Carolina, before any court of justice, if this petitioner had instituted a suit for only twenty shillings, against any individual, he would be obliged to say and declare in writing, definitely and particularly, in what way the defendant became indebted to him. Well, sir, if you must be thus particular in a controversy at law, for a few shillings, why should you be less particular when the dearest rights and highest privileges of freemen are at stake? Shall the right of suffrage and the freedom of elections be sacrificed and overturned with more indifference and less concern than you would require in a trifling matter of shillings and pence? No, sir; no! the liberties of the people, and their own free institutions, are entitled to be treated with more respect and consideration; and he who assails them should not be permitted to stand behind a masked battery; he must put his toe to the mark, and let them see him from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot. He should, before the evidence was taken, have given the particular and specific cause of complaint against each person charged to be an illegal voter. Without this plain, candid, fair dealing, the inestimable right of suffrage would be a mere bubble; it would dazzle and allure only to delude and deceive. I am unable to conceive one good reason why the petitioner withheld, and did not disclose the names of the freemen whom he sought to deprive of their equal republican rights of voting. I hold the proposition too clear to be controverted, that no individual in this republic, from the garret to the cellar, can be deprived of his rights and privileges, but by previous notice to himself or agent; and that notice must be so definite and certain as to inform the party whose rights are to be affected, distinctly and expressly, of the particular grounds of complaint against him. This clear principle is interwoven and incorporated with all our rights; and surely it cannot be dispensed with and utterly disregarded, when the great question of liberty and freedom of elections is directly involved. I cannot perceive why Mr. Newland refused to comply with this reasonable request; it was due in fairness to the voters; and if he had, before taking his testimony, presented me with a list of the names of the alleged illegal voters, and the particular objection to them, then I would have informed them of the charge, and they could have had an opportunity of defending themselves. But it is political robbery to take a freeman's rights away from him without previous notice to him or his agent. It will not do to hang a man to-day, and present the accusation to-morrow. I believe some good legal voters have been deprived of their equal rights and highest privileges, by this unjust procedure.

Mr. Newland proposes, and asks the House, to strike from my poll a large number of voters who voted out of the counties in which they reside. Sir, there are two opinions in North Carolina among the people, with regard to the right of voting beyond the limits of the county wherein you reside for Congress. One opinion is, you must vote, according to the letter of the constitution, in the county only where you reside. The other opinion is more broad and liberal, and is supposed to embrace the spirit of the constitution, and permits a man living in the congressional district to vote for Congress in any county therein. In Georgia, a citizen thereof, I am informed, can vote in any county in the whole State for Congress. In South Carolina, too, I learn you may vote any where in the congressional district for Congress. Now, sir, when there are two opinions, emanating from respectable sources, on this subject, I presume it becomes this honorable House to incline on the side of liberty. I candidly confess, if this were an open question, and never had heretofore been decided otherwise by the inspectors of the election, and the people themselves in my district, I should say a man could only vote in the county wherein he resided. But inasmuch as there are respectable persons entertaining opposite opinions; and since there is positive proof that it has always been customary for men living in the twelfth congressional district to vote for Congress at any election in that district; and since the real result of the election would not be changed, so far as this class of voters is concerned, if they had voted for the same candidates in their own counties; and since the object and duty of Congress should be, not to deprive freemen of their privileges, but to protect them in the real enjoyment of liberty: then, for these reasons, founded in justice and equity, I contend the honest freemen who lived in the district, but voted out of their counties, ought not to be deprived of their votes.

Contested Election.

The proofs establishing this custom of voters living in the congressional district voting in any county therein, are clear and conclusive: first, by the positive proof of Robert Hall, one of the judges of the election. Second, by the fact that the sheriffs and inspectors of every county in the district received votes of that class in the last congressional election. Third, I perceive from the poll-lists and proofs, that Dr. James Tate, who is a first cousin of the petitioner, made a public speech, and then voted against me out of the county if not out of the State in which he resided. Fourth, Samuel Newland and Washington Newland, the two brothers of the petitioner, voted for him in August last, for Congress, out of the county in which they reside. Mr. Speaker, I have still more important and triumphant evidence to establish this liberal custom. I have proof nearer home, proof that sticks closer than a brother. I see on the congressional poll-book, at Franklin, in Macon county, the name of Daniel Newland, the petitioner himself, who lives in Burke county, at least one hundred and fifty miles from where he voted for Congress, passing through Burke county, and entirely across Buncombe and Haywood counties, into Macon, to vote for Congress. And now, since the majority of the people have solemnly declared he is not elected, he turns round and says no man shall be permitted to have his vote counted for me, (Graham), who voted for Congress out of the county in which he lived; and he gravely insists that I must lose all votes of that description. The plain practical result is this: he says other freemen shall not do that which his cousin, and two brothers, and himself, all did do. Is this equal rights and common privileges? Is this just, equitable, reasonable, or republican? Our bill of rights declares that no man or set of men shall be entitled to exclusive privileges. I cannot consent that my worthy constituents shall not enjoy equality and liberty with other men; and be debarred from the ballot-box, and deprived of their privileges at the polls, when the petitioner himself and his family have voted out of their own counties. Mr. Newland, sir, is like an eagle shot by an arrow feathered from his own wing. He cannot gainsay in others what he himself has done. No, sir, no; example goes before precept. The petitioner, to obviate this difficulty, stated on this floor, a few days since, that although he had voted in the last congressional election out of the county in which he lived, still he had done so in a mere jest or joke. A joke, eh! Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious joke. What is fun to some may be death to others. If this ever was a joke, it is one quite too much at the expense of other people. I hope this petitioner will not carry his jokes so far as to deprive my honest constituents of their ancient customs and just rights.

Now, with this pregnant proof and distinguished example before you, what will this honorable House do with that largest class of voters who voted out of the counties in which they lived? because, without striking them from my poll, this petitioner, every one sees, has no hope of success. I will tell you what you ought to do. Recollect the people do not petition to disturb their own verdict; no, sir; the jurors are all satisfied; but the defeated party, single and alone, petitions to set aside the verdict of the ballot-box. You ought to say to him, what a court of equity would say to him if he were to apply to them to set aside this class of voters: "If you Mr. Petitioner, can show merits on your side, and an injury done to you, we will interpose our authority and grant redress." The papers are read, and it is seen that the family of the petitioner and himself have done the very thing which he complains of in others. The judge looks with astonishment, and addresses the petitioner thus: "I see you, yourself, have voted out of the county in which you live. This is a court of equity, and should not do iniquity. The principle of this honorable court of conscience is the republican rule. Equality is equity, and must be dealt out to all alike, without distinction of persons. You must do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you. Mr. Clerk, dismiss the petition at the costs of the petitioner." Although the committee struck thirteen voters from my poll, for voting out of their counties, yet the petitioner, Mr. Newland, is permitted to retain on his poll the votes of his cousin and brothers, that have done the very same thing. This is left-handed justice, sir, and a burning shame.

Mr. Speaker, if this House should turn one member out and turn another in, by taking such unfair advantages of my constituents, there will be fire in the mountains. Sir, there will be one general burst of fiery indignation. When you improperly interfere with high privileges, and infringe upon the rights of the ballot-box, you touch a magazine. A single spark might cause an explosion which will wound, cripple, and perchance kill, those who may wantonly apply the match.

Notwithstanding the committee have said, I shall not have one of the votes which were given to me out of the county in which the voter lived, yet they have said that Mr. Newland shall have three votes added to his poll that were given to him at the Henderson precinct, in Buncombe county, from three voters living in Yancey county. Is this evenhanded justice? Is this weighing out impartial justice in golden scales? No, sir. It is the game of "heads, he wins—tails, I lose." A good rule ought to work both ways.

The committee have done me and my constituents, in another respect, great injustice. They have said that Mr. Newland shall, at the Franklin precinct, in Macon county, retain five votes that are expressly proven to be taken, not from the Congress box, but from the Commons box. Mr. Robert Hall establishes this fact; and Mr. J. W. Killian also swears that "all the tickets taken from the Commons box, for the candidates for Congress, were given for Newland," and there were five or six. They were all counted for Newland in the congressional election. The return of the officers of that election confirms the evidence of these two respectable witnesses; for it shows only four hundred and forty-five voters' names registered on the poll-book, and yet four hundred and fifty votes were counted for Congress. By adopting this unjust rule, you put it in the power of one voter to give as many tickets as there are different boxes to one candidate; and you supersede the necessity of separate boxes. In the case of a contested election in this House in the year 1830, of Washburn against Ripley, it was expressly decided that "the intention of a voter is to be ascertained only from the box in which his ticket is deposited." The majority of the committee (if there be any majority) have entirely misconceived and misrepresented the evidence, both of Hall and Killian, as any gentleman will see by reading their evidence, and comparing it with the report. The report makes Robert Hall swear what he never said. It represents him as swearing that it was the custom to change votes from one box to another and count them. Now, Mr. Hall states no such thing; hear his own words: "I know that it has been the custom for men who lived in the district to vote in whatever county in the district where they may be at the election;" and yet, wonderful to tell, he is misrepresented in the report, page 3, to say as follows: "Robert Hall further states that it is customary to correct such mistakes;" that is, to change votes from one box to another and count them. Neither Hall nor Killian says there was any mistake. I am pleased to see one of the five members who signed that report rise in his place and disclaim and deny that he ever agreed to this part of the report; but still, I regret to see his name sanctioning a paper which he says himself he does not approve now, nor never did.

The committee say they will add five or six votes to Newland's poll, that never were given, but tendered and refused by the judges, at Morgantown. I cannot assent to the proposition that a vote shall be counted that never was given. The intention to do an act is one thing, and the actually doing of it is another. I hold that the House can decide only upon the votes actually given. I concede, if a sufficient number of good votes had been tendered and refused, after the persons tendering them had offered to swear to their qualifications, and that they had not before voted in that election, then that might constitute a good ground to order a new election, if the number so offered would have changed the result. Independent of other objections to all this class of persons as legal voters, not one of them proposed to swear to his qualifications, or that he had not before voted in the election.

Hearsay evidence has been rejected by the committee; of that kind, however, I have proven one hundred and five illegal votes against the petitioner, and he has but fifty-four against me. Two of the five members that signed this report have been sick and unable one half their time to attend the committee-room. Another member went home during the Christmas holidays, and stayed about three weeks; hence you find so many misstatements and misrepresentations in the report. My depositions and evidence have been flowing in from the people of my district, until every man, without an exception, who has read it, admits that I am entirely and largely ahead.

I have been surprised to hear gentlemen from all sides of the House introduce the next presidential election into this debate. Sir, my constituents have a clear right, not only to elect whomsoever they please to represent them on this floor, but they have the same right to vote for whom they please for the next President; they know my settled and declared determination, in the event of the presidential election coming before this House, to vote for and support that candidate who shall receive a majority of the votes in my district.

The opinions of a majority of the people of my district, as expressed at the polls in November next, in the choice of electors, will be my letter of instructions on that great question, and I shall cheerfully act in obedience thereto.

Sir, Congress should be deprived, in any event, of electing a President; and then you would not see this temple of liberty and legislation continually converted to the illegitimate purpose of President-making, and usurping the rights of the people. I have entertained and expressed these views and sentiments at home as well as here. My opinions in relation to this question have undergone no change. They were the same last summer that they are this winter. My honest constituents can neither be bought nor sold while their rights are committed to my keeping. I have adverted to this subject, not because I feel any obligation or accountability to any man or set of men here: all my responsibilities are to the people at home.

Mr. Speaker, if I believed for one moment that I was not fairly and duly elected a member of this honorable body, I would resign my seat before the setting of the sun. I do not desire a seat here unless I obtain it as the voluntary freewill offering of freemen. I was born free and independent, and, by the permission of Divine Providence, I intend to live and die so. All the advantages of the last summer's campaign were in favor of the petitioner, and against me. He had a very extensive, numerous, and wealthy connexion in the district. His father, brothers, and cousins pervaded and intersected every cove and neighborhood in that widely extended district, to favor the wishes of the petitioner. I stood alone, without a relation in the district—no, not one. But the bone and sinew, the nerve and muscle of the country—yes, sir, the workingmen, the farmers, and tax-payers, sustained me, and I was elected by the people. After the secrets of the ballot-box were unfolded and told, and proclamation duly made, I hoped, and fondly hoped, that I should find some rest, and that the voice of the people would have been acquiesced in and submitted to without a murmur. But, not so. I have since been pursued in the most unexampled and untiring manner. Through these embarrassing trials I have had no assistance in the management of this case. The petitioner employed an able federal lawyer of this city to prepare and argue his cause before the committee. He made all his arguments for him, and drew up all the papers attached to the report of the committee signed by the petitioner, and has been his constant counsellor up to this time.

Mr. Speaker, I am exhausted and tired of this contested election; you, sir, the House, and the country, know it is not one of my seeking. The people at home know that duty to myself and to them imposed upon me a most unwelcome participation in this unpleasant and unprofitable contest. It is true, my majority was small; but he who lives in a small log cabin is just as much bound to defend it as though it were a large castle. His house is his castle, without regard to size; and he who will not protect and endeavor to defend it is worse than an infidel. The people placed me in this House, their Capitol, and commanded me to defend it and keep out intruders. When I ask the honor of a seat on this floor, I shall ask it, not of the members of this House—no, sir, no—but of the people of my district. It is my deliberate conviction that I am fairly and clearly elected; but, if the House are not disposed to look into and hear the evidence and decide upon the propositions submitted in the resolutions now on your table, then send it back to the people of the district, and by their opinions I am always willing to abide.

When Mr. G. had concluded,

Mr. NEWLAND obtained the floor, but yielded it to Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, who moved an adjournment; which was agreed to, 94 to 29.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29.

JACKSON CITY.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Jackson

Jackson City.

[MARCH 29, 1836.]

City Association in the District of Columbia; which was read the first time.

Objection being made to its second reading, the SPEAKER said the question would be on the reception of the bill.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said that, from remarks which he heard from gentlemen in his vicinity, the nature of the bill was entirely misapprehended; and he presumed that was the case with gentlemen on the other side of the House. It seemed to be regarded as a charter for a city. Now, sir, it is very far from this. The facts are these. A number of gentlemen, some of them residing in this District, having become associated in the purchase of a large tract of land on the other side of the Potomac in this District, with the expectation that, from its peculiar position and other circumstances, not necessary now to enumerate, a commercial city will soon be established there; and intending themselves to make a beginning, now ask for an act of incorporation to enable them to manage this common property with more facility and convenience than they otherwise could. The powers granted are few, and no more than are absolutely necessary for the purposes of the association. If the gentlemen succeed, as they now anticipate, in inducing gentlemen not now connected with the association to come here and establish themselves in commercial pursuits, they will by and by ask us to grant them a city charter. Now they ask for no such thing; but for a few simple corporate powers. But, however well or ill grounded are the expectations of these gentlemen, or whatever may be the merits or defects of the bill, it is hoped that the usual courtesy will be extended towards it, of permitting it to pass to a second reading.

Mr. WARDWELL remarked that, in his opinion, if there ever was a humbug, this is emphatically one; and he hoped that the House would at once reject the bill. What are the facts attending this most singular application? Several gentlemen have purchased a farm at the south end of the long bridge over the Potomac, in this District. Their ostensible object is to build a city; but, in my opinion, the real object is to make money out of it at the expense of the community. Should we incorporate this company, what will be the consequence? The lots will be advertised in New York, and the different cities of the Union; they will be sold at a large price; the company will pocket the money, and those who purchase will lose it. This will be the result of this humbug. He hoped the House would reject the bill at once, and not give countenance to a project so well calculated to deceive the people.

Mr. SPEIGHT had heard of taking time by the forelock; but the present motion looked like taking legislation by the forelock. Why did not gentlemen wait until the proper time for objecting to this bill? The course indicated on the present occasion was, to his mind, more odious than the previous question, about which so much had been said. He hoped the bill would be permitted to take the usual course, and be referred to a Committee of the Whole, where, in the present state of the business, it would probably sleep for the remainder of the session. The proposition to reject at that stage would give to the bill more importance than it deserved. Mr. S. asked for the reading of the bill; which was accordingly read in part; when

Mr. ALLAN, of Kentucky, moved to suspend the further reading of the same; which was agreed to.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that this bill was reported by one of the standing committees of this House; and he would ask whether it was entirely courteous to the committee to make the summary disposition of the bill which was now proposed. He did not know that he should ultimately vote for the bill; he was at least open to conviction as to its merits and demerits; but he did not believe that the bill was on its face so preposterous, and so outrageous in principle, as to require the desperate expedient now proposed to be adopted in reference to it. Why not let it go through the ordinary routine of legislation? It did not propose to charter a city before a city was erected, but to grant to an association of gentlemen corporate powers to facilitate the effort to build a city on the other side of the Potomac, which the petitioners told us they contemplated doing. If the petitioners or proprietors really intended to build, or commence building, a city there, an act of incorporation like the one now under consideration might be very convenient and useful. It would at least guard against the inconveniences that would result from the death of any one or more of the proprietors, and the probable minority of those who might succeed them. He was not, in principle, favorable to the unnecessary increase of corporations, but this bill was certainly not so flagrantly objectionable as to destroy all claim to that courtesy which was extended to most, if not all, other bills that were reported to this House. He hoped, therefore, that the motion now to reject would not prevail.

Mr. BOND said that this was a novel proposition. When it was attempted to grant an act of incorporation to deal in lands, it was time to take the alarm. In relation to the inconvenience to which reference had been made, about the management of the property of this company, it was the same which was experienced by every partnership; and he inquired whether there was a gentleman present, who had heard the bill read, who would vote for it.

Mr. PEYTON was sorry to witness the uses which were made of the name of the President. He did not object to the political speculations which were carried on in his name, but he did object to the pecuniary speculations which connected his name with the bogs, and swamps, and frogs of Jackson City. This city reminded him of a reply of a Georgian who had visited a tract of land which he had purchased in the western part of Tennessee, in answer to a question as to the production of his plantation. He said that it produced sixty bushels of frogs to the acre, and a sufficiency of alligators to fence in the premises. The gentlemen from New York were not content with appropriating to their use the military fame of Andrew Jackson, but were also disposed to connect it with this bullfrog speculation, for the purpose of advancing the original price of the property. He objected to the use of the President's name for any such purpose.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said that he rose to say only a word in reply. The bill now presented had not been draughted by himself. It was originally very voluminous, and granted very extensive powers; but, on his motion in committee, it had been razed, and no greater powers retained than were essential to enable the association to manage this property with convenience, and progress with their design. When the subject had first been presented to the committee, he entertained the same opinion that some other gentlemen now appear to entertain, to wit, that it was a mere matter of speculation. But he had since been led to change that opinion. He was now satisfied that the gentlemen of this association had other objects; that they not only intended to proceed immediately in the erection of stores, wharves, and other conveniences for commercial operations, but that they had appropriated the sum of sixty thousand dollars, and held it ready to invest in this enterprise, as soon as they could obtain an act of incorporation, to enable them to proceed with safety. But he said he was not prepared to go into a discussion of the merits of the bill. He had been instructed by the committee to present it only about fifteen minutes before it was presented to this House. But when the proper time arrived, he would endeavor to show that the case had merits, and that the bill ought to pass, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BOND.] The opposition to this bill, in this stage of its progress, he believed to be entirely novel, though he had not much experience in legislation; and he believed it must arise principally from the association of the illustrious name of the President in the title of the corporation, judging from the quarter of the House from which the objections came. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEYTON] seemed disposed to be merry upon the occasion, and had, moreover, manifested some solicitude lest the President's name should suffer by its connexion with "swamps and bogs." Sir, I wish the gentleman had always manifested the same regard for the President; but it appears to me, from the course pursued by that gentleman, and those with whom he is associated in support of a particular candidate for the presidency, that they would not have felt any great degree of reluctance at seeing the President's name and fame swamped, politically and otherwise, at any time during the past year or two. He repeated that the course pursued by those who objected to the bill was novel, and to him entirely unexpected. He had not the remotest idea, on presenting it, that he should be called upon to say a word in its favor; and he now trusted that it would be permitted to take the usual course, and at a suitable time have its merits fairly and fully discussed.

Contested Election.

[H. of R.]

Mr. REED said there were three cities in this District, neither of which could get along without the aid of the Government. He was opposed to any act of Congress which would countenance this speculation. He adverted to the locality and unfitness of this position for a city. He did not wish to treat this bill with any disrespect; he would treat it with more kindness than absolutely rejecting it, by moving to lay it on the table.

Mr. FAIRFIELD asked for the yeas and nays on the resolution; which were not ordered.

The bill was then laid on the table: Yeas 80, noes 64. The bill from the Senate, fixing the northern boundary of Ohio, was read twice; and

Mr. VINTON made some remarks in favor of acting on this bill without committing it.

Mr. THOMAS rose to make some remarks, but the special order was called for.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

At 12 o'clock, in pursuance of the special order for this day, the House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the subject of the North Carolina contested election, and the following resolution, with which the report concludes:

Resolved, That James Graham is not entitled to a seat in this House, and that David Newland is entitled to a seat in this House.

The question being on the resolutions moved by Mr. RENCHER, on Saturday, as a substitute for the above,

Mr. NEWLAND (the petitioner) took the floor, and spoke at some length in support of his claims to the seat, and in reply to the argument of the sitting member, [Mr. GRAHAM.]

Mr. CUSHMAN, after some remarks on the length of time which this subject had occupied, and the necessity of deciding it, in order to proceed in the despatch of the public business, moved the previous question.

Mr. PEYTON rose and moved to recommit the report to the Committee of Elections, on the ground that it was not in fact what it purported to be, the report of a committee, as he would prove to the satisfaction of the House.

The CHAIR decided that the motion was not in order, and that the previous question was applicable to the report and the resolution with which it concluded.

From this decision Mr. PEYTON appealed, and proceeded to show that there was nothing before the House upon which the previous question could be taken. The report, he contended, was not the report of the majority of the committee, and a minority report had been decided, by the Chair, not to form any basis for the action of the House. He stated that his honorable friend from North Carolina [Mr. HAWKINS] had not given his assent to the report, though his signature to it was obtained; and the report, therefore, was in fact assented to by only four out of the nine members of the committee.

Mr. HAWKINS explained that he assented to the resolution with which the report concluded, though he differed from it in some important points, which he stated.

Mr. PEYTON proceeded in his remarks for some time, when he was interrupted by Mr. RIPLEY, who called the gentleman to order, on the ground that the merits of the case were not debatable on the appeal.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Tennessee was out of order.

Mr. PEYTON appealed from this decision, and the yeas and nays were ordered on the question.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, rose and said that he hoped the House would excuse him from voting on any question arising out of this contested election from North Carolina. He had been detained from his seat by illness during the whole period of the discussion; he had not read a line of the voluminous testimony that had been submitted; he had heard no argument in illustration of the merits of the case; and he could not, in justice to himself, or in justice to either of the parties, vote upon the question. He had no political feeling on the subject; if he had, he would stifle it, as unworthy and degrading. As a representative of the people, he wished to see a fair and impartial judgment rendered, without regard to party. Not being qualified to vote conscientiously, he requested to be excused.

The question being then taken, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 124, nays 68.

On motion of Mr. RIPLEY, the gentleman from Tennessee had leave to proceed.

Mr. PEYTON proceeded in his remarks for some time, though he was repeatedly interrupted with questions of order.

After various confused proceedings on questions of order, the point raised by Mr. PEYTON was reduced to writing.

The CHAIR stated the question.

The SPEAKER having decided that the report and resolutions were before the House, and that the previous question shut out any debate or proposition in regard to them, and the gentleman from Tennessee having appealed from this decision, the question now was, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

The question being taken by yeas and nays, it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 138, nays 46.

Mr. PEYTON moved that the House do now adjourn; at the same time remarking that he made the motion for the purpose of enabling the House to come to some conclusion, by which the votes of the House could be taken on the several questions pending in relation to the report, without any further debate.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 50, nays 130.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, moved a call of the House; and said, the call of the yeas and nays, just taken, showed too many members absent, upon a question of so much importance, and involving so high a responsibility as that now depending.

The question having been taken on this motion by

H. OF R.]

Contested Election.

yeas and nays, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 60, nays 117.

Mr. RENCHER moved to suspend the rules in order to offer a resolution, declaring that, by general agreement, no further debate should take place on the subject of the report and resolution, and that, therefore, the previous question ought to be withdrawn, in order to enable the House to proceed in taking the several questions on the amendments offered to the resolution of the committee.

The CHAIR decided that this motion was not in order.

Mr. RENCHER appealed from this decision, and, thereupon, asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD asked if this question was debatable.

The CHAIR replied that it was not.

Mr. PATTON appealed from this decision, and asked the yeas and nays thereupon; which were ordered.

The question being then taken, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand?" it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 108, nays 56.

The question then recurred upon the appeal of Mr. RENCHER, and the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand?" was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 107, nays 48.

Mr. MILLIGAN moved to lay the whole proceedings on the table.

Mr. RENCHER requested that the motion might be withdrawn. He had wished that a decision might be had separately upon the resolutions he had offered; but as the House clearly was not disposed to take that course, he now only wished that the main question might be taken.

Mr. MILLIGAN said his only desire was that time might be had for the House to come to some understanding upon the subject; but as the friends of the sitting member did not desire it, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved a call of the House; which was ordered; and the Clerk proceeded to call the House.

The call of the names having been made, the doors were closed, and absentees called upon for excuses; but soon after, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the proceedings were suspended, 190 members having answered to their names.

The question then recurred upon the demand for the previous question; which, having been seconded by the House, was ordered to be taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 112, nays 87.

The House adopted the first branch of the resolution—yeas 114, nays 87; and rejected the second branch—yeas 99, nays 100; and then passed a resolution referring the election back to the people.

The House then adjourned.

The following proceedings, embracing the votes upon the different points of order which arose in the above sketch of the debate, are copied from the journal of the House:

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on the memorial of David Newland, contesting the election of James Graham, of North Carolina.

The question recurred on the amendments moved by Mr. Rencher to the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, and set forth on the journal of the 26th inst.

And, after further debate, the previous question was moved by Mr. CUSHMAN, when

Mr. PEXTON rose to a point of order—"that the previous question could not be moved upon resolutions purporting to be reported by a committee, but which, in fact, were never reported by the committee, because a majority never agreed thereto, and the report was never made in committee; and also that the document purporting to be the report of a majority of the committee is inconsistent and contradictory in its different facts, and presents no result on which the previous question can be called; inasmuch as, in the body of the report, it leaves to the House to decide the propriety of allowing to the petitioner the votes found in the Commons box; and in schedule A, which is annexed as a part thereof, it includes the said votes among the 3,726 stated to have been given for the petitioner."

The SPEAKER decided that the report of the Committee of Elections, signed by a majority of the committee, made to the House on the 24th of February, was the subject before the House; that the previous question could be moved; and that, if demanded by a majority of the House, the main question would be on agreeing to the resolutions appended to said report, and constituting a part thereof, to wit:

1. Resolved, That James Graham is not entitled to a seat in this House.

2. Resolved, That David Newland is entitled to a seat in this House.

From this decision Mr. PEXTON took an appeal to the House, and was debating the same, when

Mr. RIPLEY rose and called him to order, on the following grounds: "That the majority of the committee having signed the report, notwithstanding the member from Tennessee [Mr. Peyton] alleged that General Hawkins, from North Carolina, had not agreed to it; which allegation is disproved by the statement of General Hawkins, who explicitly declares that he did sign it, and agreed to the resolutions, although he dissented in relation to the five votes put into the Commons box; that, under these circumstances, on an appeal from the decision of the Chair on a point of order, the honorable member from Tennessee has no right to go into the facts of the case involved in the report, after the motion for the previous question."

The SPEAKER decided that, on the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the point of order, pending a motion for the previous question, it was not in order to go into the facts of the case involved in the report.

From this decision Mr. PEXTON took another appeal to the House, and the question was put, Shall the decision of the Chair on the point of order raised by Mr. Ripley stand as the judgment of the House and passed in the affirmative: Yeas 124, nays 68.

Mr. PEYTON resumed, and was addressing the House on the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the question of order, raised by himself, when

Mr. THOMAS rose and called him to order, on the ground "that there is no question before the House which is debatable, the previous question having been called for, which is not debatable; that it is not in order for any member to enter into debate on a question of fact, about which the Speaker and a member may disagree."

The SPEAKER decided that, as the previous question had been moved, and as, by the rules of the House, pending the demand for the previous question, "further debate of the main question" is precluded, and "on a previous question there shall be no debate," that debate on the point of order, if objected to, could not be entertained, as, if permitted, the operation of the rules of the House, which precluded debate on the previous question, would be defeated; and that, consequently, no member could enter into debate on a question of fact, as set forth in the point raised by Mr. Thomas.

The question was then put, Shall the decision of the Chair, on the question of order first raised by Mr. Peyton, stand as the judgment of the House? and passed in the affirmative: Yeas 138, nays 47:

rill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Weeks, Whittlesey—117.

A motion was made by Mr. RENCHER, that the rules of the House be suspended, to enable him to submit a resolution, touching the subject matter of the said contested election.

The SPEAKER decided that, pending the motion for the previous question, it was not in order.

From this decision of the Speaker, Mr. RENCHER took an appeal to the House, and stated his point of order in writing, as follows: "That pending a call for the previous question, it is in order to move to suspend the rules of the House, for the purpose of offering such a resolution as the following, to wit:

"Resolved, That, by general agreement, there shall be no further debate upon the resolutions of the committee, or the resolutions proposed thereto, in the form of an amendment.

"Resolved, therefore, That the call for the previous question ought to be withdrawn; and that the House proceed to vote on each resolution contained in the amendment, and that it be done without debate."

The SPEAKER decided that if, by "general agreement," the motion was entertained, no question of order could arise; but objection being made, it was not in order to entertain the motion at this state of the proceeding, and whilst the motion for the previous question was pending.

Mr. PATTON rose to debate this appeal.

The SPEAKER decided that it was not in order to debate the said appeal, the previous question having been moved.

From this decision Mr. PATTON took an appeal to the House; and the question was put on this appeal, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and passed in the affirmative: Yeas 108, nays 58:

YEAS—Messrs. The question then recurred on the appeal moved by Mr. Rencher, and being put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House? it passed in the affirmative: Yeas 107, nays 49:

A call of the House was then ordered, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina.

After the roll had been called, on motion of Mr. CHILTON ALLAN, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

And it was then ascertained that the previous question, which had been moved by Mr. Cushman, was demanded by a majority of the members present.

The said previous question was then put, viz: Shall the main question be now put?

And passed in the affirmative: Yeas 111, nays 88:

The previous question having been thus put and carried in the affirmative, and the main question ordered to be put, the amendment moved by Mr. Rencher to the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections was thereby put aside, and the main question was stated, to wit: That the House do agree to the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections, which are as follows:

1. Resolved, That James Graham is not entitled to a seat in this House.

2. Resolved, That David Newland is entitled to a seat in this House.

A division of the said main question being called for,

The question was put, that the House do agree to the first of the said resolutions, viz:

1. Resolved, That James Graham is not entitled to a seat in this House.

And passed in the affirmative: Yeas 114, nays 87, as follows:

And so it was resolved that David Newland is not entitled to a seat in this House.

A motion was then made by Mr. PATTON, that the House come to the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the election held in North Carolina in last August, for a Representative of the twelfth congressional district of that State in the House of Representatives of the United States, be set aside, and the seat of such Representative is hereby declared vacant; and that the Speaker of this House inform the Governor of North Carolina of the fact.

And on the question, that the House do agree to this resolution, it passed in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. PEYTON, BRIGGS, MERCER, BELL, THOMAS, EVERETT, SPEIGHT, and the CHAIR, in reference to alleged inaccuracies in the journal, and particularly in reference to the call to order by Mr. RIPLEY, of Louisiana.

Mr. PEYTON (who was called to order by Mr. RIPLEY yesterday) objected to the terms in which the transaction was entered upon the journal. It appearing, however, that the motion made by Mr. RIPLEY was in writing, that it had been read at the time, and the point of order was decided under it, and it being also stated that the Clerk, in making up the journal, had copied the motion of Mr. R. verbatim, Mr. PEYTON obtained the consent of the House to enter upon the journal a protest, or explanatory statement on the subject.

PAY TO MR. NEWLAND.

Mr. HAWKINS, by consent of the House, offered a resolution directing the Clerk of the House to pay to David Newland, Esq., the full amount of pay and mileage which would be due to him as a member of the House, from the day when he presented his petition to the 29th instant, inclusive.

Mr. RENCHER suggested that when the bill for the compensation of Messrs. Moore and Letcher was taken up, the gentleman could move this as an amendment.

The resolution, on motion of Mr. MERCER, was so modified as to instruct the Committee of Elections to inquire into the expediency of making the proposed allowance.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. WM. B. SHEPARD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a resolution setting apart the 27th and 28th of April for the consideration of business relative to the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the resolution so as to strike out the 27th and 28th, and insert the 29th and 30th, viz: Friday and Saturday. It would be necessary (he said) hereafter to give more than one day a week to the consideration of the public business. It would, indeed, he thought, be necessary, by the time proposed, to suspend the rules appropriating Friday and Saturday to private business.

Mr. WHITTLESEY hoped the motion would not prevail. It would be an abandonment of decisions upon private claims. Many important bills had been reported which ought to receive the action of the House; and he would ask, if petitioners with just claims should be compelled to come up year after year, without having their rights examined by the House. There was no necessity for the course proposed. If gentlemen wished to speak upon the appropriation bills at length, there would be ample time, without intrenching upon the time allotted to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend the resolution so as to set apart the 28th and 29th for the purpose.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had no objection to this course, and withdrew his motion.

The motion to amend was not agreed to.

Mr. PARKER moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WM. B. SHEPARD called for the yeas and nays; which were refused.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to, by a vote of 70 to 54.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the select committee raised on so much of the President's annual message on that subject, reported joint resolutions proposing amendments to the constitution, in reference to the mode of electing a President and Vice President.

Mr. D. had reported the resolutions as the organ of the committee, and, differing as he did with the majority, he should move, at the proper time, a substitute for the proposition of the committee. He would further state that the committee had not deemed it necessary to submit any argument to the House on the subject which had been referred to it.

The joint resolutions were read twice, when

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved that they be referred, together with his substitute, to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, stating his intention to follow up that motion by proposing to make the subject the special order for a particular day.

Mr. BELL suggested that if it was the object of the gentleman to discuss and decide this question at the present session, he ought not to send it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but permit it to be considered in the morning hour of each day. The various important bills which were before that committee would probably not afford an opportunity of discussing this measure during the session. He would not make the motion, but merely throw out the suggestion for the consideration of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DROMGOOLE had made the motion, which was usual and proper upon such an important measure. It was a question which peculiarly belonged to that committee. He had no desire to get up a discussion. He was in favor of an amendment of the constitution. The bills alluded to by the gentleman from Tennessee he hoped would be disposed of in time to allow this subject to be examined in Committee of the Whole. He therefore could not vary his motion.

Mr. BELL again adverted to the state of the business before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as a reason for not sending these resolutions to that committee. He would be happy, if circumstances would permit, that this subject should be discussed in committee, where alone it could be fully and freely debated. There would, perhaps, be no advantage gained by deciding the question at the present session; but something would be gained by its discussion, and bringing the subject before the country, so that they might come there at the next session prepared to decide it. If gentlemen were not prepared to go on with the discussion now, he would propose to postpone the subject for two weeks.

Mr. SPEIGHT was not hostile to a proposition to amend the constitution in this particular. He had been twice upon committees who had brought the subject before the House; and he would gladly co-operate in any amendment which would remedy existing evils. He would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that it would be impossible to give this subject a partial or any thing like a thorough examination during the morning hour, nearly the whole of which was devoted to receiving reports from standing committees. If the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee prevailed, the resolutions would sleep out the session on the Speaker's table. He was in favor of marching up and deciding the question, and that some early day should be fixed for its consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BELL reminded the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SPEIGHT] that there were two hours in the morning, instead of one, which might be devoted to this resolution. Besides, he could see no necessity for a protracted discussion on this subject. It had been ten years before the people, and been much discussed in Congress and by the public press.

Mr. SPEIGHT said there was but one hour in the morning for the consideration of reports from committees. He had no objection to the postponement as proposed, and when it came up, it could go to the Committee of the Whole. He was prepared at that moment to decide upon this question. He was in favor of electing the President for one term, and of providing against the possibility of an election by the House of Representatives. He would favor a provision for one term of seven years, or even four years. He preferred seven, but would take six, five, or four years as the term which the President should serve. He was in favor of entering upon this investigation as early as possible.

Mr. HAWES was in favor of an amendment of the constitution on this subject; but he could not consent that the morning hour should be taken up in its discussion. He had offered a resolution on the subject of the West Point Academy, which he deemed of much importance, and he could not vote to give a precedence to other matters, while his resolution remained unacted on. He would vote to consider the present subject at an early day; but could not consent to have it taken up during the morning hour.

After some conversation between Messrs. DROMGOOLE, BELL, and the CHAIR, as to the position of the resolutions during the morning hour, if they should not be committed, the motion to postpone was negatived without a count, and the whole subject was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DROMGOOLE further moved that the subject be made the special order for the first Tuesday in May. There seemed to be a disposition (said Mr. D.) to economize time, and he hoped that the important measures to which reference had been made would be disposed of before the day he had named, and that an opportunity would yet be afforded during the present session for a full, free, and untrammelled discussion of the subject which he had reported to the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG desired to throw no obstacle in the way of the subject before the House; but it was true, as had been remarked by the gentleman from Tennessee, that there were other important measures besides the appropriation bills which the House might feel disposed to act upon during the session, in preference to this constitutional amendment; and he hoped they would make no other special orders until the one in reference to the appropriation bills was determined.

Mr. RIPLEY was a member of the select committee who reported this proposition to the House. He thought it ought to take precedence of all other business. In this matter they acted in the character of a convention. They proposed to make amendments to the constitutional compact; and in a business connected with the social relations of the community, precedence should be given over the ordinary acts of legislation.

The country had demanded that some change should be made in reference to the re-eligibility, length of term, and patronage, of the Chief Executive. He trusted it would be discussed, and properly disposed of. It was due to the people that this should be done, and it should not be made to give place to an ordinary matter of mere dollars and cents. He hoped, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] would prevail.

Mr. VINTON was opposed to making this subject a special order. Nothing could be gained by such a course. If the majority of the House was disposed to act on the resolutions, it was in their power, at all times, under the rules, to go into Committee on the state of the Union, and could there take up such measures as were deemed proper; and he was not prepared to say, at that time, that it would be proper to take up a particular subject on the second Monday in May. He adverted to the time which was wasted in consequence of an existing special order, and the impropriety of placing the majority in the hands of a minority, which resulted from such a course. He was opposed to any other special orders. He was willing to take up this subject and act upon it, but he could not vote for a motion whereby he would be trammelled.

Mr. LAWLER moved to amend the motion by making the subject the special order for the second Tuesday in April, instead of the first Tuesday in May; which was negatived without a count.

The motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE was also disagreed to without a count.

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

(Mr. HAMER in the chair,) and, in pursuance of the special order of the 26th of January, took up the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the year 1836.

The question being on the motion of Mr. BELL to strike out the following clause: "For repairs and improvements of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $67,000,"

Mr. J. GARLAND rose and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The motion now under consideration, embracing simply the question whether the navy yard at Portsmouth should be discontinued, or repaired and improved, could of itself involve no important question, either of principle or expediency; and, so far as this simple proposition is concerned, the discussion might long since have been closed; but, instead of confining the discussion to the question really involved in the motion to strike out, there has been connected with it, in the able and eloquent discussions of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON], the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS], and the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL], the propriety and expediency of adopting, at this time, a system of defence by fortifications, the increase and improvement of the navy, and a review, particularly by the latter gentleman, of the course and policy of the existing administration; a scope of discussion certainly not legitimately growing out of the question before the committee.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, in his introductory remarks, contended that it was proper that the general course and practice of the Government should be frequently and freely discussed in this House, in order that the people might be informed; and that he deemed this a proper and suitable occasion to discuss the merits of the present administration, as it was probable no occasion more suitable would offer during the present session. Whenever a subject is presented to the consideration of this House, involving a question of constitutional power, or of expediency, I admit it is legitimate and proper to review the course and practice of the Government, under each and every administration, so far as that course and practice apply to the single subject under consideration; but I utterly deny that it is expedient or proper, upon a single isolated subject, to take such a range of discussion, embracing so many topics of deep and pervading interest; for if it be proper or expedient to do so in relation to one subject, it is equally so in relation to another; and thus, upon every subject which can be proposed, there would be an illimitable range of debate; and this body would assemble for no other purpose than to prosecute discussions affecting presidential elections. It must be readily perceived by every gentleman present, that this mode of discussion can have no other bearing than to affect presidential elections, as it obviously is intended to affect the coming election, and that the principal business of the body will be to make and unmake Presidents.

Mr. Chairman, to the propriety of all and every discussion having reference to the election of President and Vice President, I utterly object; this is no part of the duty assigned us by the constitution. The constitution assigns to Congress duties of purely a legislative character. It does not authorize us to concern ourselves with the presidential elections, except in cases where the people have themselves failed to make a choice; and it is even doubted by many whether this contingent power should not be taken from the House of Representatives; indeed, propositions, time after time, have been made, and one is now before this House, for that purpose. There is no man here, I presume, whose experience has not taught him that the subject of a presidential election is the most agitating and exciting political topic which can occupy the attention of the people, or of this body. It never fails to produce that degree of excitement which puts into full play the strongest passions of our nature, and disqualifies the mind for that sober, rational, and deliberate investigation necessary to conduct the mind to truth, and the judgment to sound conclusions. Congress being charged by the constitution with the important duties of legislation for this great and growing republic, it is all-important that harmony and good feeling should prevail in its deliberations; that it should examine, with sound reflection and mature deliberation, all measures which come under its consideration; and, in their adoption, look to the fundamental principles of the constitution for their guide, and the power, happiness, and prosperity of the people for their end. If, however, the propriety of introducing the exciting subject into this House to which I have referred, be established, this subject will become the polar star of all our actions here, without regard to the effect of our measures upon the principles of free government, or the wealth, happiness, liberty, and prosperity of the people. The minds of members, from the excitement always attending discussions of this character, will, by their prejudices and prepossessions, become totally disqualified for sound and wholesome legislation; for the truth of which I appeal to the experience which we have already had. If the principle and example of the gentleman from Tennessee be carried into practice, I think the honorable gentleman ought not to complain of the delays of this House.

I, for one, Mr. Chairman, am determined to discard, as far as I can, every consideration upon legislative questions of a mere partisan character, look to the fundamental principles of the constitution as my guide, and the good of my country as the end, in all my actions, while I have the honor of a seat upon this floor. I never will consent to lower the standard of the constitution to promote the views or secure the dominancy of any party. The party with which I act, and which I sustain, must come up to that standard of constitutional construction which I regard as fundamental, or I must part with it. Entertaining these views, I should not have deemed it necessary to have made a single remark upon the subject now before the House; but the gentlemen to whom I have referred, particularly the gentleman from Tennessee, have thought otherwise, and have brought into view the whole subject of fortifications, increase and improvement of the navy, and the course and practice of the present administration, attempting to show that the administration had departed from the principles upon which it came into power, and that its practices are corrupt and anti-republican. I should not now, Mr. Speaker, have undertaken to address the House, had not the honorable gentleman from Tennessee made such frequent allusions to the Virginia delegation sustaining the administration, but should have left the task to some other friend of the administration, whose superior abilities and greater experience better qualified him than myself for the task of defending the principles and policy of the administration which have been assailed, and which I, in the main, approve, and am prepared cordially to sustain, as far as my humble abilities will permit.

The first question which presents itself for consideration, growing out of the extensive range of this debate, is the propriety of a system of defence by fortifications and increase of the navy. In coming to a conclusion upon this question, it should be borne in mind that, our institutions being democratic, and essentially pacific, all the wars in which we may unhappily be engaged will be principally of a defensive character: our system, happily, is totally inadequate to the successful prosecution of offensive foreign wars, while it is entirely adequate for all the purposes of successful defence. Large standing armies, and numerous fleets always in commission, are incompatible with the genius of our institutions and the security of our liberties; hence they cannot be employed; they are only essential to the prosecution of offensive foreign war. The militia, composed of the great body of the yeomanry of the country, is the only safe reliance for the defence of the nation against invasion by hostile armies, compatible with the principles of free government, and should be employed in the most efficient manner possible, being composed of the same materials, and with the same discipline, would be as efficient as regular troops; yet, from the nature of the militia system, men called out on short service, acting together for the first time, having scarcely the first rudiments of military discipline, could not be relied upon in a regular field conflict with well-organized, well-disciplined troops, of which an invading army would in all probability be composed; disaster and defeat would be the inevitable result; but, protected by strong fortifications, in which so much discipline and experience would not be necessary to successful resistance, they would make up in reliance upon the security which such defences afford, what they would lose by the want of discipline in the field. This truth has been most decisively tested by experience. In the brilliant defence of New Orleans during the late war, in which the citizens of Kentucky and the countrymen of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee bore such a conspicuous part—a defence in which about 3,000 men resisted and put to flight about 14,000 of the flower of the British army, before whose victorious standard the proud eagles of Napoleon himself had crouched—this system was well tested. Who doubts, if the battle had been fought in the open field, that, from want of discipline, our gallant militia would have been defeated, and New Orleans captured and plundered? Many examples might be cited, such as Plattsburg and Fort Erie; but it is unnecessary to detain the committee with the recital. I will here cite an extract from the report of the board of engineers, at the head of which was General Bernard, made on the 25th of February, during the late administration, and approved by the then Secretary of War, who is a Southern man, in support of the system of national defence now proposed. It is as follows:

“Fortifications must close all important harbors against an enemy, and secure them to our military and commercial marine; 2d. Must deprive an enemy of all strong positions, where, protected by naval superiority, he might fix permanent quarters in our territory, maintain himself during the war, and keep the whole frontier in perpetual alarm; 3d. Must cover the great cities from attack; 4th. Must prevent, as far as practicable, the great avenues of interior navigation from being blockaded at their entrance into the ocean; 5th. Must cover the coastwise and interior navigation, by closing the harbors and the several inlets from the sea, which intersect the lines of communication, and thereby further aid the navy in protecting the navigation of the country; and 6th. Must protect the great naval establishments.”

“The navy must be provided with suitable establishments for construction and repair, stations, harbors of rendezvous, and ports of refuge; all secured by fortifications, defended by regular troops and militia, and supplied with men and materials by the lines of intercommunication. Being the only species of offensive force compatible with our political institutions, it will then be prepared to act the great part which its early achievements have promised, and to which its high destiny will lead.

“If our navy be inferior to that of the enemy, it can afford, of course, unaided by fortifications, but a feeble resistance—single ships being assailed by whole fleets;

if it be equal or superior, having numerous points along an extended frontier to protect, and being unable to concentrate, because ignorant of the selected point of attack, every point must be simultaneously guarded; our separate squadrons may therefore be captured in detail, by the concentrated fleet of the attacking Power. If we attempt to concentrate, under an idea that a favorite object of the enemy is foreseen, he will not fail to push his forces upon the places thus left without protection. This mode of defence is liable to the further objections of being exposed to fatal disasters, although not engaged with an enemy; and of leaving the issue of conflicts often to be determined by accident, in spite of all the efforts of courage and skill. If it were attempted to improve upon this mode, by adding temporary batteries and field works, it would be found that, besides being weak and inadequate, from their nature, the most suitable positions for these works must often be neglected, under a necessary condition of the plan, that the ships themselves be defended; otherwise, they must either take no part in the contest, or be destroyed by the superior adversary.

"We pass over the great comparative expense of such a mode of defence, rendered clearly apparent by a little reflection, with these brief remarks, viz: That the defensive expenditures by this system will, in the first instance, greatly exceed the offensive; and that these defences, being perishable in their nature, will require frequent renewal and repairs.

"The proper fortifications of the coast preventing the possibility of a blockade so strict as not to offer frequent opportunities for our vessels to leave the harbors, the navy, no longer needed for passive defence, will move out upon its proper theatre of action, though inferior to the enemy, with confidence; knowing that, whether victorious, whether suffering under the violence of tempests, or whether endangered by the vicinity or the pursuit of a superior force, they can strike the extended coast of their country (avoiding the harbors and the important outlets of the country, where alone a blockading force may be supposed to lie) at numerous points where succor and protection await them. Hovering around the flanks and rear of blockading fleets, and recapturing their prizes; falling upon portions of these fleets, separated for minor objects, or by stress of weather; watching the movements of convoys, to capture straggling vessels; breaking up or restraining the enemy's commerce in distant seas; meeting, by concert, at distant points, and falling in mass upon his smaller squadrons, or upon his colonial possessions, and even levying contributions in the unprotected ports; blockading, for a time, the narrow seas, and harassing the coasting commerce of the enemy's home: these are objects which our own history shows may be accomplished, although contending against a nation whose marine has never been paralleled as to force and efficiency, with a navy apparently, as to numbers, insignificant. Our own history shows, besides, that the reason why our infant navy did not accomplish still more, was, that the enemy, being able to occupy unfortified harbors, was enabled to enforce a blockade so strict as to confine a portion within our waters. That this portion—indeed, that all—was not captured, is to be attributed solely to a respect (so misplaced that it could only have been the fruit of ignorance) for the then existing fortifications; a result, notwithstanding, amply compensating the nation for the cost of these works."

"It is truly an axiom in military science, and one fully illustrated by military history, that the worst mode of waging war, although strictly defensive, is to allow its field of action to be within the borders, and that the best is that which most frequently assumes an offensive attitude. In our case, war can only be excluded from our territory by fortifications; and we can only assume the offensive through our navy. The construction of the former secures the means of creating, equipping, and repairing the latter, and leaves it unencumbered with duties which it imperfectly performs, to the full exercise of its important and appropriate functions."

In the principles of the above extract I fully concur, and am confident it will forcibly strike the attention of every member in his deliberations upon this subject. A system of defence, by fortifications, has been recommended by almost every administration since the foundation of the Government, and by some most zealously pressed. General Washington, in his annual message to Congress of 1790, made the following strong recommendation: "Among the most interesting objects which will engage your attention, that of providing for the common defence will merit particular regard. To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace." Again: in his message of 1791, he says that, "in connexion with this, [arming the militia,] the establishment of competent magazines and arsenals, and the fortification of such places as are peculiarly important and vulnerable, naturally present themselves for consideration. The safety of the United States, under divine protection, ought to rest on the basis of systematic and solid arrangement, exposed as little as possible to the hazard of fortuitous circumstances." Again: in 1793, General Washington, whose solicitude for the safety and security of his country was in constant action, urged upon Congress the necessity of adopting a complete system of defence, in the following patriotic and energetic terms: "I cannot recommend to your notice measures for the fulfilment of our duties to the rest of the world, without again pressing upon you the necessity of placing ourselves in a condition of complete defence, and of exacting from them the fulfilment of their duties towards us. The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every other nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States, among nations, which will be withheld, if not entirely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war." In the session following, a committee of the House of Representatives made a report, recommending that our whole maritime coast, from Maine to Georgia, be put in a state of defence, accompanied with a statement from General Knox to the then Secretary of War, of the number and kinds of works which would be necessary for the different ports and harbors.* This recommendation embraced almost every point of defence now recommended; for, in fact,

* This report led to an act of Congress authorizing fortifications to be erected at the points designated, and is in these words:

"That the following ports and harbors be fortified under the direction of the President of the United States, and at such time or times as he shall judge necessary, to wit: Portland, in the District of Maine; Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire; Gloucester, Salem, Marblehead, and Boston, in the State of Massachusetts; Newport, in the State of Rhode Island; New London, in the State of Connecticut; New York; Philadelphia; Wilmington, in the State of Delaware; Baltimore, in the State of Maryland; (Annapolis, by supplementary act); Norfolk and Alexandria, in the State of Virginia; Cape Fear river and Ocracoke inlet, in the State of North Carolina; Charleston and Georgetown, in the State of South Carolina; and Savannah and St. Mary's, in the State of Georgia."

the recommendation of the present War Department is but a recital, with a little more energy, of the recommendations made by previous administrations. This system of defence, and the increase of the navy, was somewhat abandoned during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, and the gunboat system substituted for it.

This system was found utterly inefficient during the late war, and has been abandoned. The system of fortification was recommenced and vigorously prosecuted during the administration of Mr. Madison, and has been strongly urged upon Congress ever since by every succeeding administration, and to Congress belongs the fault why we are now in so defenceless a condition. If there had been proper defences by fortifications on the Chesapeake, posterity would have been saved the mortifying task of reading the disgraceful capture of this city during the late war by a handful of British troops. Much blood, much treasure, and much destruction of property, would have been saved to the nation. The present President of the United States unites his voice with that of Washington, Madison, and Monroe, in recommending the immediate commencement and energetic prosecution of a system of fortifications for our national defence; by it we may in time be saved the horrid calamities of wars of invasion, such as were felt during the late war, in the pillage, plunder, conflagration, and devastation of our towns and villages, and the murder of our citizens in cold blood by a brutal soldiery. Sir, want of preparation invites attack; preparation frequently prevents it. I am, Mr. Chairman, a decided advocate for the adoption of this system of national defence, and shall vote for appropriations for that object. In making this avowal, however, I am not to be understood as pledging myself to vote for the erection of fortifications at every point which may be proposed; I design no such thing. But I will take up each scheme, and ascertain its importance and necessity, and vote for it or not, as I may deem expedient. I shall, in the first place, vote for fortifying those points which are of primary importance and most exposed, and so graduate the system until all necessary and important points are provided for.

Intimately and importantly connected with a proper and judicious system of national defence, is the improvement and increase of the navy. To this arm of national defence we must look with increasing solicitude; for, as our power, commerce, and resources increase, so increases the probability that any future foreign war in which we may be engaged will be mainly upon the ocean, more particularly if our maritime frontier shall be inaccessible by means of its fortifications. Our navy is now totally inadequate to our defence, comparing its strength with that of those foreign Powers with whom there is any probability of coming into collision. It is admitted on all hands that our present navy is inadequate to the protection of our extended and increasing commerce. If thus inadequate to this purpose, how much more so to the protection of our coast against the powerful navies of European Powers, particularly France and Great Britain? The importance of an increase of this arm of the national defence need only to be mentioned to be approved.

The necessary connexion between these two systems is perspicuously and forcibly enforced in the following quotation from the document before referred to: "The navy must be provided with suitable establishments for construction and repair, stations, harbors of rendezvous, and ports of refuge; all secured by fortifications, defended by regular troops and militia, and supplied with men and materials by the lines of intercommunication. Being the only species of offensive force compatible with our political institutions, it will then be prepared to act the great part which its early achievements have promised, and to which its high destiny will lead." These are sound truths, and to their practice we have been urged by the patriots and statesmen who have and do now administer the executive department of this Government. I therefore readily conclude that the proposed system of defence is, upon every principle of economy and efficiency, the best which can be adopted; not so prodigal of human life as contests in the field, and most compatible with the genius and stability of our free institutions.

This system has been assimilated by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] to that of the federal administration of 1798, to which the republican party was so warmly opposed. The parallel will not hold good; the policy of that administration, so strongly reprobated, was, that, under the mask of a war with France, a standing army and navy, far beyond our resources, physical and pecuniary, and dangerous to liberty, was sought to be established. The proposed system is not beyond our resources, pecuniary or physical, and involves no necessary increase of the standing army, and a very gradual increase of the navy. The system of defence by fortresses is peculiarly adapted to the efficient and successful employment of the militia; no increase of the army worthy of consideration is proposed. We have before us statements of the chief of the engineer department and the inspector general, proving, that so far as the system of fortifications is concerned, any material increase of the army will be unnecessary. The only reason which would induce a small increase of the army grows out of the concentration of so many hostile tribes of Indians on our western frontier, which, combined, can bring into the field twenty thousand or more warriors, and the existing hostilities between Mexico and Texas, requiring a strong force on that frontier for the maintenance of our neutrality.

The adoption of an efficient system of national defence is of high constitutional obligation. Common defence, growing out of a sense of common danger, arising from the individual weakness of the States, is one of the main pillars of the Union, the very foundation stone upon which it was erected, and constitutes one of the most important duties of this Government. The only inquiry, then, for American statesmen, is, whether there be a point on our extended limits accessible to hostile attack, undefended; if there is, our constitutional obligations require that it should be put in a state of defence; if we refuse, then we have failed to perform our constitutional duties and discharge our constitutional obligations. Is this the condition of the country? Upon almost every point of our extended maritime frontier there are many important points entirely without defence; and but few, if any, having sufficient defences. This appalling fact is admitted by almost every member here; indeed, is not denied by any. Many have felicitated the country on its escape from damage and dishonor, by the settlement of our controversy with France, growing out of this miserable state of our defences. Shall not then the experience of the past, and the dangers we have escaped, admonish us so to prepare for the contingencies of the future? Shall we not avoid such great risks, by adopting and executing an invulnerable system of defence? Wisdom says we should. The recommendation to adopt this system of national defence, and make appropriations for its execution, is what the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] call a war upon the Treasury; as constituting a part of the corrupt practices of this administration. If, Mr. Chairman, this is a war upon the Treasury, it should be prosecuted with the utmost vigor until its end is accomplished. It is such a war as ought to be waged; it is war upon the Treasury, to do that which constitutes one of the highest duties and strongest obligations of the Government to the nation—to provide for the common defence. In acting upon this subject, I shall not be controlled by a miserly calculation of dollars and cents, but by the necessities of the country; she ought to be and must be defended, or we are lost to the experience of the past, and unfaithful to the obligations of the Government and our duty to the country.

The navy yard at Portsmouth, to strike out the appropriation for the repairs and improvement of which the motion is now under discussion, was established in 1794, with the sanction of General Washington, during his administration. Its repairs and improvement have been the subjects of appropriation by every succeeding administration, and I cannot perceive any good reason why it should now be abandoned, and all the works constructed there thrown away and lost. It is not questioned by any one that the harbor is safe, and that the depth of water is ample for ships of war of the largest size.

This point is very important in another point of view: It is near the southern boundary of the State of Maine, and its preservation important to prevent, in case of invasion, this State from having its communications with the other States cut off. The State of Maine, in its geographical position, is bounded on its southeast by the Atlantic ocean, on its east, north, and northwest, by Canada. An enemy, having command of the ocean, and in possession of Portsmouth, might, by forming a military post on the Canada frontier opposite Portsmouth, successfully cut off Maine from the other States, and reduce her to subjection. In this point of view, the preservation of the navy yard and fortifications at Portsmouth is absolutely necessary. It should not be forgotten that both during the revolutionary war and the late war we were invaded from the Canadas. I hold it a sound principle in our system of national defence, that every port and every harbor which could give security to a hostile fleet, or constitute a post from which expeditions into the interior might be made, should be secured by ample and invulnerable defences. We should not permit war to be brought into the interior if it can be prevented.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ALLAN,] who addressed the House several days since, takes it for granted that the standing army is to be greatly increased by adopting the system of defence proposed, and charges the President with inconsistency. To sustain this charge, the honorable gentleman read an extract from the President's first inaugural address, in these words: "Considering standing armies as dangerous to free Governments in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment, nor disregard that salutary lesson of political experience, which teaches that the military should be held subordinate to the civil power." Here the gentleman stopped; when, if he had merely read on, in the same paragraph he would have found the President then had in view this very system of defence, which reads thus:

"The gradual increase of our navy, whose flag has displayed in distant climes our skill in navigation and our fame in arms, the preservation of our forts, arsenals, and dock yards, and the introduction of progressive improvement in the discipline and science of both branches of our military service, are so plainly prescribed by prudence, that I should be excused for omitting their mention sooner than enlarging on the importance."

The material objection of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee to this appropriation seems to be founded upon the assumption that we have already too many navy yards. He seems to think that two would be amply sufficient; and, in proof of this, refers to Great Britain, the greatest naval Power in the world, which, he says, has but two navy yards of any importance, while the United States has seven. In this opinion I differ entirely with the honorable gentleman. On a coast so extensive as ours, indented by so many bays, harbors, and inlets, accessible to a hostile fleet, it is all-important that our navy, charged with the defence of so extensive a coast, should, at every convenient point, have a place of refuge, in case of distress and pursuit by a superior fleet, and of course naval supplies in case of blockade. If there be but one navy yard, the whole force of an enemy could be concentrated in an attack upon it, and, if successful, would destroy all the material and supplies belonging to the whole navy; and thus, at one blow, destroy our naval supplies, cripple our naval operations, and lay open our whole coast to attack. If there be but two, the same consequences, to a proportionate extent, would result. If, however, our navy yards are extended at convenient and suitable points along the whole coast, the capture of one would not so seriously affect our naval operations, as there would be ample supplies at others. In addition to this, they would be more safe, because it is not reasonable to suppose that an enemy could with safety so divide his fleet and army as to attack all our navy yards at the same time; if he did, our navy and army would, by judicious management, be enabled to beat him in detail.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] contends that, upon a principle of economy, we should reduce the number of our navy yards, because he thinks the cost of construction, repairs, &c., is in proportion to the number we have, and that four will cost as much again as two. I do not concur with the honorable gentleman in this view. The proposition would be true if each navy yard was precisely of the same dimensions and constructed with the same material; but it is not to be presumed that the seven navy yards are each as large as the two would be, if there were but two; on the contrary, the extended system is calculated to reduce the dimensions; for each navy yard, in its construction, will have reference to the character of the harbor and the importance of the point, and would be constructed either on a large or contracted scale, as these facts might render expedient. Eight navy yards may not, in fact, cost more than two, depending entirely upon the scale of their construction. The argument deduced from the fact that England has but two important navy yards, is not conclusive, owing to the great dissimilarity in the situation of the two countries. England is surrounded by the ocean, has a territorial extent not much exceeding that of Virginia and Maryland, and is accessible but at few points, and has a coast not more than a third of ours in extent; hence there is no necessity for extending her navy yards to the same extent as ours. England has, in fact, seven navy yards of all descriptions; but either of the two referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee is larger than all ours put together. I decidedly believe our true policy is to construct navy yards, at convenient distances, at every suitable point, to secure supplies and protection to our navy in its operations on so extensive a coast as ours.

The War Department, in submitting a scheme of national defence, has properly submitted to the consideration of Congress a comprehensive plan, embracing all the important points which need fortifications, together with the supposed cost of improving, repairing, and completing existing and unfinished works, as well as such as are to be constructed hereafter. Having done so, with the reasons for each, it is the duty of Congress to determine which shall be constructed, and when all or either shall be commenced. The Department points out the works, and the necessity for them; Congress must determine which is to be undertaken now, and which hereafter. The Secretary does not insinuate that we are to undertake all at the same time; so that the administration is unjustly charged with seeking a sudden appropriation for every work proposed, so as to exhaust the surplus in the Treasury.

It being admitted by all that there are important fortifications in a state of dilapidation and ruin, and that there are many points without defence, which should be provided for, the only question seems to me to be, the time when this system is to be commenced. To this inquiry, reason and safety would seem to dictate but a single reply; and that is, now; now we are defenceless; now we are at peace with the whole world; now we have ample means; and I cannot see any good reason for postponing, unless we are disposed to await an unexpected war, and sacrifice much of blood and treasure, before we shall be prepared to meet it, as was done during the late war, for want of proper defences. It was a maxim of the Father of his Country, the great Washington, that "in peace prepare for war." The sentiment has been adopted and strongly recommended by President Jackson, and its wisdom conclusively demonstrated, not only by our own experience, but by that of every nation on earth. I cannot imagine to myself a more appropriate time, arising from the fact of our being in a state of profound peace, owing not a cent of national debt, and having ample means. Certain it is, we can never be in a better situation to commence and prosecute an efficient system of defence: by postponement we may be in a worse, but not in a better condition. Sir, I ask, shall the admonitions of wisdom from the great Washington be buried with him in the hallowed tomb of Mount Vernon? Wisdom, prudence, discretion, all say no. Then, sir, look at New Orleans, Pensacola, Charleston, Richmond, Petersburg, Norfolk, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, all without sufficient defences, all exposed to the attacks of a hostile army—shall they be provided with defences? is the question.

The President of the United States, in his message to Congress of 23d February last, answering the proffered mediation of Great Britain, with a wisdom and patriotism which addresses itself to the confidence and approval of the American people, availed himself of the maxim of the beloved Father of his Country, and renews, in the most energetic manner, the admonition, in peace prepare for war. After speaking of the want of effective preparation in which a contest with France would have found us, he says: "From the nature of our institutions, the movements of the Government in preparation for hostilities must ever be too slow for the exigencies of unexpected war." In the concluding paragraph of the message he says: "If we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war." The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] seizes hold of these two paragraphs, and charges upon them inconsistency. He says, if the principle of the first paragraph be true, the recommendation of the latter cannot be true. With that deference which I feel for all the opinions of the honorable gentleman, I feel confident in the assertion, that the most fastidious criticism cannot torture the expressions into the slightest inconsistency. In the first paragraph, the President, speaking of the slow operations of our system, regards it as too slow to make ample preparation for sudden, unexpected war; a truth which severe experience has fully and lamentably taught us. To avoid this evil, to avoid the serious results of sudden, unexpected hostilities, and the consequent calamities attendant upon them, he urges on the nation the necessity of being always prepared to repel sudden aggression, or any other; he warns us against the effects of that lethargy incident to our institutions, of postponing our preparations for repelling aggression until the danger is upon us. The message is not only consistent, but wise and patriotic.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee here, in very emphatic terms, inquired what was meant by the maxim, in peace prepare for war. Does it mean, said he, that preparation made by the monarchies of Europe, by a system of large standing armies and heavy taxation? To this I answer, no. Washington meant no such thing; nor does the President mean any such thing. Our system is opposed to standing armies: so was Washington, and so is the President opposed to them; they mean by the maxim, in peace prepare for war, the preparation of a well-organized and well-disciplined militia, and all the material of war, with suitable means of defence, so arranged that they may be brought into speedy action, in cases of emergency: such a system as Washington recommended, followed by Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, and such as the President has now recommended. If I could suspect the President of favoring a large standing army, I would, without hesitation, not only abandon his administration, but would do my utmost to oppose it. But, sir, he means no such thing; he values liberty and our free institutions too highly; he has made too many sacrifices to preserve them.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] without indicating that most or all of the fortifications proposed are not necessary to our security, inquires whether this is the proper time, being on the eve of a presidential election, and whether we have such confidence in the ability and integrity of those who will have the disbursement of the appropriations as to justify us in making them. These are not the words, but I think the substance, of what the honorable gentleman said. As to the objection growing out of the fact that we are on the eve of a presidential election, I think it is not of much force; for if a system of national defence is postponed until the nation is clear of the agitation and excitement of a presidential election, we shall never commence the work; for so soon as one election is over, the agitation of another commences; and thus the subject is perpetually agitated, and would perpetually bar any action upon this subject. As to the question of confidence, I will only now say that I have sufficient confidence in the administration to confide to its care the disbursement of the funds necessary to be appropriated for all necessary works of defence; a confidence, I think, well justified by the experience of the past, as I shall hereafter be able to prove most satisfactorily when I come to reply to the gentleman's charges against them.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who so ably and so eloquently addressed the committee on this subject, made no particular objection to any item of appropriation recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means. He professed, and no doubt sincerely, a willingness and readiness to vote liberal appropriations for the purposes of national defence, but did not signify whether he approved all or either of the appropriations proposed, not even the one now under consideration. The objection was, that many of them were not recommended by the Departments having charge of the various branches of the public service; and that they were not based upon executive estimates, as they should be. The Executive has done all it could do; it has reported to you the true condition of the defences of the country and the navy; in its annual reports it has pointed out where defences are needed, and estimated the cost upon the best data within its reach; it has recommended improvements in the navy and navy yards, and estimated the costs: it remains for Congress to conform its action to those estimates, according as it may deem them accurate and necessary for the public service. All inquiries from the House or its committees have had as prompt answers as circumstances would permit. But I do not understand the reason why nothing can be done here without executive recommendation and executive estimates. I cannot perceive why this House, or a committee, may not act upon its own knowledge, without regard to executive recommendation or executive estimates, when it perceives measures necessary for the public service. It is true the constitution requires the Executive, from time to time, to recommend such measures as it may deem necessary for the public good; but the constitution does not require Congress to limit its action to the measures recommended by the Executive, or to adopt them; Congress has no barrier to its action but the limits of the constitution; and it is the department principally charged with these duties, to which the country looks for wise and salutary legislation. Hitherto the Executive has been, according to some, too officious and intermeddling, taking too much responsibility; now, all responsibility is to be thrown upon the Executive, and gentlemen will not act upon some subjects without executive recommendation and executive estimates.

The debate, on the part of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] was confined principally to a charge of inequality, favorable to the North, in the naval appropriation bill, by which to prove favoritism to the North and neglect of the South. In order to do this, the honorable gentleman has exhibited a table, showing proposed appropriations to the North, exceeding those proposed for the South by about $11,000,000. This table, taking the principle upon which the calculation is based, is true; but the principle is wrong, and the calculation, however accurate as to figures, is wrong in its results.

The honorable gentleman, in order to sustain the immense disparity which his table exhibits, has counted Virginia a Northern State, and classed the proposed expenditures upon the defences of the Chesapeake with appropriations for what he calls the favored Northern region. Virginia has hitherto been classed and considered a Southern State. Her defences must be considered Southern; they afford protection and defence not only to Virginia, but to Maryland and North Carolina, mainly to the latter, and they have been considered the most important on our whole maritime frontier. Virginia will not ask to be classed with the North or South: she is content with being Virginia, and that she will be. But, Mr. Chairman, when the South, if ever Heaven shall so order it, is beset with danger and with difficulty, the pride, the chivalry, the Southern feeling and high character of Virginia will be appealed to. I feel very confident my friend from South Carolina meant not the slightest reflection upon her. In the establishment of navy yards, if the Government is to be regulated by suitable positions, there is not one south of Virginia suited to the construction of vessels of the first class, for the want of harbors of sufficient depth of water; so that, in this point of view, all appropriations for this object have been properly made, although unequal in dollars and cents. Virginia must be classed a Southern State, and the appropriations for her defences Southern appropriations. Take the proposed appropriations from the amount stated by the gentleman, take also the pay and provisions of the officers and sailors, which cannot be considered in the light of local appropriations, and others of like character, and the disparity will be greatly reduced; yet, upon this point of appropriation the advantage is favorable to the North. But the reason of this disparity is obvious, and is accounted for without the slightest imputation of favoritism upon the Executive or either of the Departments. The inequality has been produced by nature. To the North there are numerous bays, rivers, and harbors, suited for navy yards, having naturally safe and sufficient depth of water: hence the navy yards have been principally established to the North. There, too, were our principal maritime towns which needed defences. All these Northern navy yards were established during the administration of Southern Presidents, and have been sanctioned by Southern representatives. I have not gone into the minute details of inequality of the gentleman from South Carolina, because they depend upon the leading points, and will be correct or not, as they are correct.

While, however, navy yards have been provided for to the North, the South has been provided for in fortifications; and, in this branch of public defence, the disparity of appropriation favorable to the South has heretofore been much greater than the disparity favorable to the North upon navy yards. The annexed table, exhibited by the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] in his able discussion of this question, gives the number of fortifications erected since the foundation of the Government, and the expenditure on each, classed North and South by the Potomac river:

It will be seen that there have been expended South $8,043,591 46, and North $3,447,772 44, leaving a balance in favor of the South of $4,595,819 02; and here the gentleman from Maine drops the calculation. In the appropriations now proposed for repairs and improvements of navy yards there is a balance in favor of the North of $369,125. Upon all the works finished, under construction, not finished, and proposed, the expenditure will be, North $18,000,425, South $16,530,054, leaving a balance in favor of the North of $1,470,371. This disparity, however, is the result of circumstances which cannot be controlled, and of which we cannot complain. But the true point upon which we have good cause of complaint is, the unconstitutional appropriation for works of internal improvement, and the tyrannical and unequal operation of the tariff laws. In works of internal improvement, the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] admits that the advantage is greatly in favor of the North, but charges the inequality upon the refusal of the Southern States to receive appropriations for such objects. This is true, sir; true to the letter; Virginia has always regarded these appropriations as unauthorized by the constitution, and has refused the beneficence of the Federal Government founded in violation of that sacred compact. She has acted upon that principle of integrity upon which an honest man will refuse to receive stolen goods. She will neither touch, taste, nor handle, the unclean thing. She will not listen to the argument addressed to her cupidity, that the States, believing the Federal Government has this power under the constitution, are receiving, yearly, large appropriations. She regards her integrity with unyielding pertinacity, and will not surrender it to considerations of avarice or cupidity. She will not sell her integrity at any price. Her motto is, to do right, let others do wrong who will. I do not doubt that gentlemen of the North honestly believe that the Federal Government has this power; yet I think they should have some respect to the opinions of so many Southern States, and not be willing to clutch all they can get by a strained construction of the powers of the constitution, although they may believe the doctrine sound.

Mr. Chairman, our Yankee friends understand how to manage these moneyed affairs better than we do. They always have had, and I fear always will have, the advantage of the South in this particular; they know how fastidious Southern statesmen are in their construction of the powers of the constitution, and very generally throw out some constitutional question for our discussion, and, in its heat and excitement, carry some scheme of appropriation without attracting notice. I heard of a very sagacious Northern man who, upon a certain occasion, said that when an appropriation was to be carried which might excite opposition from the South, the right plan was to give the Southerners a constitutional question for debate; and that, while that was debating, the appropriation could be carried. I think the history of our legislation proves very clearly the success with which this stratagem has been practised.

Mr. Chairman, the framers of the constitution never contemplated that, in authorizing appropriations for the common defence, they were incorporating a principle of equality in dollars and cents, and that when so many dollars were expended in one State, so many were to be expended in another, whether needed or not. The object was to defend the whole; and the only question in making appropriations is, where are defences needed? In our extended territory Nature herself has created the inequalities of which the honorable gentleman complains. There are more assailable points in one section than another, which must be provided with defences; and hence this natural inequality necessarily produces inequality of expenditure. The only true principle is to provide defences for every point, North or South, wherever needed, without regard to any other consideration.

But my honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] complains that, under this administration, the interests of the South, particularly in its defences, have been grossly neglected; and, in order to account for it, refers to the location of the present members of the cabinet. He says the Secretaries of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, are all from this favored region, (the North,) and only the Secretary of State from the South. The Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Navy are from the North, but the Secretary of War is from a Northwestern Territory, (Michigan.) But, even taking all three from the North, upon the principle of population and commerce, the inequality does not exist; for, in addition to the Secretary of State, the chief executive officer, (the President)—he who is charged with the whole executive power, and controls all executive officers—is a Southern man. So that I think there is, on this ground, little cause of complaint. But, Mr. Chairman, what I principally complain of in this part of the honorable gentleman's argument is its tendency to create sectional feelings, sectional jealousies, and sectional dislikes. I know the gentleman intended no such effect. I only speak of the tendency of his argument, however honestly felt or designed. So long as parties exist in name, extended over every quarter of the Union, the integrity of the Union is not hazarded; but it was against parties separated by geographical lines, by sectional divisions, that the paternal and warning voice of Washington was raised, early in our history, and against which the effort of every patriot has been, and will ever be, directed. Whenever the geographical line shall be distinctly drawn, and the parties shall be known as a Northern and Southern party, then, indeed, there will be an array of party which will ultimately sever the Union, dissolve us into our original fragments, destroy our free institutions, and produce that state of anarchy, war, bloodshed, and despotism, against which all our sages and patriots have struggled, and to prevent which the Union was formed.

I think there is no just ground to charge the Government with neglecting the interests or defences of either Charleston or Pensacola, (for there seems to be no complaint elsewhere.) There is proposed for Charleston $——; there have been surveys and inquiries set afloat, as to the practicability of constructing at Charleston a navy yard; and there is now a proposition depending for that object before Congress, under the patronage of its own representative, founded upon the information communicated and recommended by the Executive. For this appropriation I am prepared to vote. The appropriations recommended for Pensacola, by the Navy Department, are contained in the following letter, addressed to me by the Department, containing also the course pursued by the Department on that subject:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 12, 1836.

SIR: In answer to your letter requesting my views as to the expediency of constructing a dry dock, and of deepening the channel over the bar at Pensacola, and requesting any information in this Department necessary to a correct decision on this subject, I have the honor to state that the Secretary of the Navy, in his report of the 30th November, 1833, brought this subject before Congress, by recommending the continuance of Pensacola as a naval station; and submitting a report from Captain Dallas, on the means and expense of deepening a channel through that bar, and a memoir and estimate on the improvement of that bar, by Captain W. H. Chase, of the engineer corps, (to be found in the first volume of Executive Documents of H. R., 1st session, 23d Congress, No. 1, page 263.)

Captain Chase calculated the expense of adding three feet to the depth of the channel over the bar at $106,690. The various items of expense are given in detail in his estimate. Captain Dallas, however, is of opinion that the channel over the bar should be made six feet lower than at present, and adds $40,000 to the estimate of Captain Chase, making the whole expense amount to $146,690, for deepening the channel six feet, and giving a depth of water over the bar of from twenty-nine and a half to thirty feet, which will be amply sufficient for our vessels of the largest class.

These gentlemen are very capable of making the observations and estimates which they have submitted, and there is no reason to doubt the accuracy of their calculations; and I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion that the great importance of Pensacola, as a naval station, would justify the expenditure of the sum estimated for the object stated.

Naval Service Bill.

Annexed to my last annual report will be found estimates for buildings of different kinds at the Pensacola navy yard, to the amount of $64,000; for building a powder magazine near the yard, $17,000. In addition to which, there are the following estimates for Pensacola:

For wharves and appendages	$150,000
Hydraulic dock	125,000

Making the whole of the estimates of Pensacola for the year 1836, $356,000. If to this we add $146,690, deemed necessary, as before stated, for deepening the bar, it will amount in the whole to $502,690.

It is believed that for this sum the harbor of Pensacola may be rendered a safe and commodious station for the purposes of our navy, and a convenient place for building and repairing our vessels of war.

The construction of a dry dock, such as we have at Norfolk and Boston, and such as it is proposed to build at New York, and which would cost nearly a million of dollars, cannot be considered as necessary at Pensacola, until the channel over the bar shall be deepened, even if it should be deemed expedient to build a fourth dry dock upon the largest scale. In the mean time, a hydraulic dock, such as is now in successful operation at New York, and which it is believed may be constructed in the course of a year, and at the expense mentioned in the estimate, would be highly useful, as this kind of dry dock answers perfectly well for all vessels under the size of a frigate.

The estimate of $150,000 for wharves and appendages is made without the knowledge necessary for an accurate detailed statement of the items of expense. It is hoped, however, that, in the course of a few months, a careful examination may be had of this station by competent officers, whose report upon the same will afford all the information wanted; but it is confidently believed that the full amount estimated will be required for the objects stated. I am not aware that there is any information in this Department upon the subject of your letter which has not been communicated to the House of Representatives.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. DICKERSON.

Hon. L. JARVIS,
Chairman Naval Committee, House of Reps.

So there is $502,690, instead of $342,000, estimated by the gentleman from South Carolina. (The gentleman from South Carolina here tells me that the additional estimate was not in the annual report, and had not been laid before Congress until after he delivered his speech. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means states that it was in, and laid on each member's table, long before.) I have no doubt that both gentlemen are right in their recollection, and that the additional estimate had escaped the attention of my friend from South Carolina. I only use the fact to prove that the Department had not, from considerations of favoritism, or any other, neglected its duty to the South; for in relation to both these points, of Charleston and Pensacola, the Executive has been employing all the means placed in its hands by Congress, in ascertaining the practicability of constructing navy yards at both these points, and has, in several annual reports, strongly recommended them to the consideration of Congress. Here, Mr. Chairman, I must correct a misapprehension of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] He says that the late Secretary of the Navy (now the Secretary of the Treasury) made a tour of inspection to the South, with a view of informing himself as to the necessity and practicability of establishing, particularly at Pensacola, an extensive navy yard; and that, after his return, he had not heard of any recommendation from him favorable to it. It is true that the Secretary did make such a tour, but the gentleman is entirely mistaken as to the fact that he made no favorable report. The Secretary not only made a report favorable to the scheme, but strongly urged its adoption on Congress. I refer to the document, from the Navy Department, accompanying the President's annual message of December, 1833.

In addition to these facts in the recommendation and estimates of works of defence, $5,000,000 are recommended to be appropriated to the defences of Florida alone.

Our navy yards were located and constructed before the purchase of Florida; and no new one, except at Pensacola, I believe, has been constructed since. Upon the whole of this branch of the subject, I would ask, if this inequality exists, how is it that it has been produced by Southern statesmen? Thirty-nine out of forty-seven years Southern men have administered the executive department of the Government—some of them always in the cabinet. A distinguished son of South Carolina administered the War Department for eight years, who did much to recommend the system of defence now proposed to the favorable consideration of the nation. Why is it that so much of neglect to the South has marked the administration of Southern men? Why is it that Southern representatives have neglected to present the claims of the South upon Congress? When and where was it that appropriations for defences have been asked and refused to the South, which were not in like manner asked and refused to the North? This charge of neglect, Mr. Chairman, if true, lies at the door of Southern men, and I leave them to answer it. The table of appropriation for defences, heretofore referred to, I think, clearly proves that the South has had her full share of the protection of the Government.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to consider the objections which have been urged to the system of national defence now under consideration, and which are apart from the intrinsic merits of the subject itself; and,

1. It is objected that, if the proposed system is carried into execution, it will largely increase the peace establishment of the army. The establishment of these defences will not require the addition of a single company to the present army establishment. An estimate has been made of the force necessary to be employed in keeping and preserving the fortifications, if all proposed shall be constructed, which will be about 3,180 men. An estimate of the inspector general makes the force necessary about —; so that, from either statement, no addition on account of these works will be necessary. If any addition shall be found necessary to our army, it will grow out of the concentration of so many restless Indian tribes on the Missouri and Arkansas frontiers, who can bring into the field twenty thousand warriors, and the civil war raging between Mexico and Texas, demanding a force on the Texan frontier of sufficient strength to enforce our neutrality and preserve our peace.

2. It is urged by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ALLAN] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] that the adoption of this system will prevent the distribution of the public lands and the surplus revenue. This objection involves the consideration of two very serious and important questions, in both their aspects of constitutionality and expediency; each of them, in all its bearings, affording subject-matter of sufficient magnitude for a long argument. I do not design, upon the present occasion, to do more than glance at them. If I were to do otherwise, I should unnecessarily detain the committee, as both these subjects will be open for discussion when they come up directly for consideration.

H. OF R.]

Naval Service Bill.

[MARCH 30, 1836.]

The bill for the distribution of the public lands originated in the Senate, under the patronage of a distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [MR. CLAY.] It proposes, in substance, a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among all the States, according to the ratio of representation, for purposes of "internal improvement" and "education." All the public lands east of the Mississippi were ceded to the United States by the several States, mostly by Virginia. The cession by Virginia was an act of magnanimity, generosity, liberality, and devotion to liberty, unparalleled in the annals of history. She stripped herself of dominion, power, and wealth, for the sake of liberty and the security of free institutions. This cession embraced the now great and flourishing States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and the Territory of Michigan. In the act of cession, however, she entered into certain stipulations with the Government, for the disposition and proceeds of these lands; the fulfilment of which she has a right to demand, and will insist upon. The Virginia deed of cession was executed on the 1st of March, 1784, and contains the following condition:

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

When it is recollected that this cession was made previous to the adoption of the constitution, that it was made when the confederacy owed a heavy debt incurred during the revolutionary war, and that this debt, as well as the current expenses of the Federal Government, was made, not by a system of taxation, but by direct requisitions upon the State Governments in fixed proportions, the manifest intention of the condition which I have read cannot be mistaken or misunderstood. It was intended as a common fund, to pay a common debt, incurred in a common cause; and when that should be done, to lessen the requisitions upon the States for the annual support of the Federal Government. The sales of these lands were intended to supply the revenue which would otherwise have to be raised by taxation.

The adoption of the constitution did not discharge the obligations of the condition in the act of cession, or authorize the diversion of the proceeds of the public lands to any other purpose whatever than that specified. The clause of the constitution giving power to the Federal Government to regulate and dispose of the public domain reads thus: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States, and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." If this clause of the constitution could, without the reservation, have been construed into an abandonment of the condition in the act of cession, the reservation retains the force of the obligations in its full effect, so that the obligation cannot be avoided without a flagrant breach of faith. In the proposed plan of distribution, fifteen per cent. is allowed to the new States, over and above what would be their equal proportion upon the plan of equal distribution—the result of which is, that Virginia would lose $410,104; all the old States would lose $4,096,346. The annexed table exhibits the whole operation.

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

This inequality, in express violation of the compact, and of every principle of justice in relation to any of the public lands, is, in my humble opinion, fatal to the pretensions of the Senate's bill, if either justice or good faith is to prevail.

Another palpable inequality in regard to all the Southern States, and especially Virginia, is covertly couched in the provision of the Senate's bill which directs the distribution according to what is called federal numbers. The constitutional compromise allowing the slaveholding States only three fifths of the slave population in the estimate adjusting the representative ratio among the States, I will not complain of. It may have been right to give this preference to free over slave labor, in estimating the moral worth and adjusting the weight to be given to the suffrages of different sections of the Union. But when the question becomes one of money, of a division of the proceeds of the public domain, a very different consideration should enter into the calculation. It is known that slave labor is not so productive as free labor; it is the inevitable consequence, that the population, and strength, and wealth, of the Southern States, suffer a relative diminution in regard to the other States, from this very cause. Is it not monstrous, then, that, while slave labor tends to this result, making the wants of the Southern States greater and their means less than their more opulent and powerful neighbors, an argument should be drawn from it to give them two fifths less of the proceeds drawn from the public domain, in right of their laboring population, than the Northern States would obtain in virtue of the same class within their limits? And how much more outrageous is this scale of distribution, whereby almost two thirds of the income of the public lands would be monopolized by the North, when it is considered that almost the whole of the great domain was generously relinquished by Virginia, for the common benefit of the whole Union? In the proposed division, although she gave up all, she would get but half the portion of New York, that gave up nothing.

In addition to this objection, I regard the proposed scheme as at war with the principles of the constitution, unless, indeed, the worn-out and long ago refuted federal doctrine, that the "general welfare" phrase in the constitution confers in itself an independent power, unrestricted and uncontrolled by the defined limited powers of the instrument, is to be exercised in the sound discretion of Congress—a discretion which the constitution was designed to restrict and control. The constitution authorizes Congress to raise revenue for national purposes only; for common defence and general welfare. It was never designed to make the Federal Government the grand reservoir of bounties and largesses to the separate States, or to individuals; nor was this system of distribution ever designed to be placed in the hands of the Federal Government. It is certainly not to be found in the express grant of powers; but is, if to be found at all, by inference or implication.

This bill limits the appropriation by the States to purposes of internal improvement and public education. This is a direct appropriation of the means of the Federal Government to works of internal improvement of a local character, and public education, reserving to the States only the right to determine to what subjects the appropriation shall be made. The public lands are public property, and, when sold, the proceeds become public money. I cannot perceive in the constitution a distinction between public money derived from duties on foreign importations, direct taxation, or the sales of public lands; nor do I perceive that the constitution gives any authority to apply the public money derived from the one source to subjects which it prohibits to the other; the powers granted may be exercised by the appropriation of money drawn from either source; so the powers restricted cannot be exercised by the employment of public funds derived either from the one source or the other. The restriction was to prevent Congress from exercising the forbidden powers, without regard to the source from whence the means were to be derived. It was not intended to authorize Congress to act upon these subjects at all. Among the subjects over which Congress has no power, (in my opinion,) are the subjects of internal improvement and public education in the States. If they have not, then this bill is unconstitutional, appropriating the public money to purposes over which the Federal Government has no power. I know that there is much diversity of opinion upon this subject. I only speak my own views and those of my State.

The distribution of the surplus revenue among the States is a scheme introduced into the Senate, under the patronage of an able and distinguished Senator from South Carolina. It proposes an amendment of the constitution, so as to authorize the distribution of the surplus revenue until 1842, the time fixed for the expiration of the tariff law, as regulated by what is familiarly called the compromise bill, regulating the tariff until that time. This bill does not propose any restriction upon the States as to the application of their respective portions, and is not susceptible of all the objections to its constitutionality as the "land bill." It only involves the question of the power of distribution itself. Yet, sir, the author of this bill, for whose discriminating and sagacious mind I have the highest respect, introduced it into the Senate, and it will come before this House, admitting the want of constitutional power in this Government, and seeking to supply the want of power by amendment of the constitution. Now, sir, if there is no power to distribute the public money in the constitution, where is the power to distribute the public lands? Nowhere, sir, unless it can be proved that there is more danger in authorizing this Government to use money derived from duties or direct taxation, than from public lands. I humbly believe the danger is the same from either source; the principle is wrong, and cannot be made right, because of the source from which the money comes.

The tendency of this system of distribution, if once introduced, will be dangerous in the extreme. Yes, sir, in its operation it will destroy the sovereignty and respectability of the States; it will demoralize and corrupt the people. The States, instead of relying upon their own energy and enterprise, and their own resources, will have their eyes turned to this great centre of attraction, the Federal Government, as the source of all their wealth and prosperity; every session of Congress will exhibit the sickening and disgusting scene of the representatives of the several States scrambling for their portions, each returning home saying to his constituents, see what the Government has done for you. The State Legislatures will be scuffling to find subjects to which to apply the bounty of the Federal Government. Sir, it has been said that "money is power." It is true, fatal experience proves it to be true. In addition, then, to the power of the "purse" and "the sword," now in the hands of this Government, give it this power of enlarging its influence by authorizing another theatre for its employment, and I would not give a fig for your liberties. The watchfulness and vigilance of the States over the action of this Government will be lulled into a fatal confidence and security; they will no longer stand upon the battlements of liberty, and sound the alarm against approaching danger, but the sentinels will sleep upon their watches, and the enemy enter the citadel by stealth.

The people will no longer watch the action of the Federal Government with their accustomed jealousy and vigilance; the deformities of the federal action, and its gradual approaches to despotism, will be unperceived amidst the glare and splendor of its munificence and bounty. Sir, interest is the mainspring of human action, and no scheme could be better devised to operate upon it than these distribution schemes. They are at war, vitally at war, with that frugality, simplicity, and poverty, which it was designed should attach to the Federal Government; they destroy the very foundation upon which the safety and durability of our institutions was based. I do not attribute to the authors of these bills any such designs—far from it; but I must confess I should view their adoption as the sure precursors of consolidation and ultimate despotism. I hope my fears may be unfounded. I confess, however, they will be seriously awakened if these schemes succeed. If they be adopted, it is easy to perceive that it paves the way for another high tariff system, and an unlimited system of internal improvement; for, sir, when the people shall be told of excessive taxation by tariff, they will be told it is immaterial; what they pay in taxes they get back in the distribution; and thus they will be deluded into a fatal security and indifference to the exercise of the taxing power. The people, sir, the hard-working taxpayers, will never get back any part of the taxes they pay. The indirect manner of its collection conceals from them its onerous burdens. I am not willing, Mr. Chairman, to see the States coming in humble supplication, asking, at the hands of this Government, their due portions of its bounty and its munificence. I wish to see the States, in their own domestic concerns, looking to their own energies and their own resources, forbidding the slightest control over or interference with them by the Federal Government; above all, I wish to avoid a moneyed dependence.

There is another principle involved in the latter scheme, to which I am utterly opposed, as being of dangerous tendency. I have learned, sir, to venerate the constitution as a system of fundamental law, framed and adopted upon the most mature and deliberate investigation; an instrument intended to be as enduring as time, and not to be altered upon slight and trivial occasions. Amendments should only be made to introduce permanent fundamental principles, which the severest test of experience has demonstrated to be salutary and necessary. If it be approached and amended upon slight and trivial occasions, or for temporary purposes, it will lose all that veneration and respect necessary to its perpetuity and faithful observance. It will occupy no higher grade than legislative enactments, and be repealed, altered, or amended, upon the most slight and trifling occasions, and be subject to all the disadvantages of excessive, precipitate, and capricious legislation. This amendment, if adopted, is to last five or six years, and then die. Sir, upon the same principle, other temporary amendments may be introduced, until finally we shall have a new constitution, subverting all the principles of the old; for it is not to be doubted that these temporary amendments will finally become permanent principles. I cannot, sir, upon any view I have been able to take of this subject, bring myself to vote for either of these schemes, or for any scheme of giving away the public lands. So dangerous do I regard them, that I would prefer resigning my seat here to sustaining them by my votes.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ALLAN] claims these schemes of distribution as matter of right, and strongly declaims against the expenditure of the public money upon the seaboard, to the exclusion of the West. Sir, in the system of defence proposed, does it not occur to the gentleman that the defence of our maritime frontier is the defence of the West? Can the West be endangered, sir, by a foreign invasion, while the Atlantic States successfully resist the invaders? Are not the Atlantic and Gulf towns the channel of transportation for all the exports of the West? Certainly, sir, the gentleman, when he reflects upon this subject, will not, for he cannot, reasonably complain.

I do not intend here, Mr. Chairman, to inquire who has or who has not recommended this scheme of distribution. I am well aware that the present President, as did Mr. Jefferson during his administration, made some undefined suggestions for the distribution of the surplus revenue which might remain in the Treasury under certain contingencies; yet both were mere suggestions, acknowledging the difficulties attending it, both as regards constitutional power and corrupt tendency, and were never earnestly pressed. The present President, in most emphatic terms, deprecated the idea that the scheme, if adopted, should be so unrestricted as to introduce into the practice of the Government the habit of creating a surplus revenue for the purpose of distribution. It is matter of no concern with me who does or does not maintain opinions favorable to this scheme. I decide for myself; I speak my own opinion upon this subject; and I believe the effect of this measure, if adopted, will be to produce that state of things so deprecated by the President—the creation of a surplus revenue for the purpose of distribution. I therefore oppose it, and would do so, even if it were sanctioned by the high authority of Andrew Jackson. In the view which I have taken of the dangerous tendency of this proposed plan of distribution, I am strongly fortified by the opinions of the honorable gentleman who is the reputed author of the scheme now under discussion. In a speech delivered by him in the other branch of this body, on the removal of the deposits, he said: “There is another aspect in which this subject may be viewed. We all remember how early the question of the surplus revenue began to agitate the country. At a very early period, a Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Dickerson] presented his scheme for disposing of it by distributing it among the States. The first message of the President recommended a similar project, which was followed up by a movement on the part of the Legislature of New York, and, I believe, some of the other States. The public attention was aroused—the scheme scrutinized, its gross unconstitutionality and injustice, and its dangerous tendency, its tendency to absorb the power and existence of the States, were clearly perceived and denounced. The denunciation was too deep to be resisted, and the scheme was abandoned.”

This strong and forcible paragraph imbodyes every objection which I have urged to the scheme, and is in itself sufficient, in my humble apprehension, to defeat this dangerous measure.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] in assigning the reasons which have induced him to abandon “the party” now sustaining the administration, charges, 1st. That the administration came into power upon the profession of one set of principles, and practises upon another. 2d. That the administration has been grossly derelict in its duty in recommending proper measures and providing for the defence of the country. 3d. That its practices are prodigal and corrupt, in the employment and disbursement of the public funds used in dispensing the patronage of the Government. And, 4th. That it has attempted to delude the people, and produce public excitement upon subjects which they recommended, and never intended to carry out into practice. Before, however, I proceed to answer these charges, I propose to ascertain the true point of responsibility, if they be found true. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee says he attaches but a slight degree of responsibility to the President, for the practices and neglect which he charges upon the administration; but holds his lieutenants, as he calls them, responsible, and thinks the Vice President himself should be held somewhat responsible; that he ought, to some extent, to examine into the practices of the Government, and correct abuses. I do not, Mr. Chairman, concur with the honorable gentleman in his views upon the subject. I hold the President himself responsible for all and every abuse of executive neglect of duty or abuse of power. The constitution charges him with the whole executive duty; he appoints to office and removes at his will; if abuses exist, the constitution has placed in his hands the corrective power; and if he fails, whenever he has knowledge of abuse, to apply the corrective, I hold him responsible to the country. I will not separate between the President and executive officers, because all his duties consist in controlling their action and correcting their malepractices. It is here abuses may sometimes exist for a time without his detection; but when he does detect them, it is his duty to correct; and if he fails, he is deeply responsible. But upon what principle the Vice President is to be held responsible, I confess, I cannot discern. He is charged by the constitution simply with the duty of presiding over the deliberations of the Senate; he can neither appoint nor remove an executive officer, nor can he constitutionally do a single executive act, unless he is charged with the duties of the office of President, by the death, removal, or resignation, or disability, of the President. Sir, the Vice President is upon no principle responsible for any abuses of the Government, however glaring or corrupt, for the simple reason that he has no constitutional power to correct them. It is obvious, however, that he is to be held responsible by his opponents with a view to affect him in the coming presidential election.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to consider the charges of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee against the administration. In doing so, I shall attempt to defend the administration by fact and reason. I shall not employ opprobrious party epithets, or impeach the motives of any man upon this floor. Conscious of the integrity of my own opinions, I shall extend to others, with whom I differ, as much credit for integrity of opinion as I claim for myself. Knowing, as I do, the fallibility of the human mind, and its proneness to err, and being unwilling to claim to myself infallibility, if facts and reason cannot be found to sustain my opinions, I am sure denunciation will not. The first charge which I propose to consider is, that the administration came into power professing one set of principles, and that it practises upon another. The first specification made by the gentleman from Tennessee which I shall discuss is the subject of "internal improvement." He charges that the present administration came into power professing opposition to this system, and in practice had expended more money than in the same period of any pre-existing administration. First, then, sir, as to the profession, and then the practice. And here I might rest the defence of the administration against this charge, by simply quoting from the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ALLAN] the charge that the President came into power favoring the system of internal improvements, while his practice has overthrown it. This gentleman read an extract from a letter from the President to the Governor of Indiana, in which the President refers to his votes as a member of the Senate upon this subject, and asserts his opinions to be unaltered. This letter, the gentleman from Kentucky says, deluded the West into the support of the President. He says: "This letter, throughout the West, was considered as removing every doubt, and the vote of that country was given upon the faith of the positive pledge it contained." The gentleman sarcastically says that this pledge was redeemed by the veto of the Maysville road bill, and the veto of the bill for the benefit of the Louisville canal, in the latter of which the President expressed this sound and orthodox opinion: "Positive experience, and a more thorough consideration of the subject, have convinced me [the President] of the impropriety as well as inexpediency of such investments." After the gentleman had spoken of the shock and disappointment which the Maysville and Louisville canal had produced in the West, and their tendency to weaken the ties which bind together representative and constituent, and denying the right of a representative to change his pledged opinion, he says: "But it was necessary to break the shock which this disappointment caused in the West."

This purpose was accomplished, says the gentleman, in the message of 1829. Sir, this is certainly a most singular state of things. The force of the shock and disappointment created by the Maysville veto message of May, 1830, in the West, is broken by the annual message of December, 1829. Most singular: the force of a shock which took place in May, 1830, is broken by a message delivered about six months before! I leave the gentleman to make the best of this argument he can; for it is, I admit, greatly beyond my comprehension. In addition to this testimony, I will offer that of Mr. Clay, who pronounced, I think in 1834, the death of his favorite system of internal improvement, under the blow given it by the Maysville veto. Every member knows the particular solicitude with which that gentleman watched over this favorite system; and that, from his public or private relations with the President, he would not be disposed to do him more than justice; yet, as late as 1834, he pronounced the system crushed beneath the power of the veto. Now, sir, this gentleman, or the gentleman from Tennessee, is mistaken. But, sir, as to the professed principles of the President upon this subject, when he came into office, independent of this testimony, I think I shall be able satisfactorily to prove that the President, in the administration of the Government, has been consistent with himself, in profession and practice, in relation to this subject. The Maysville veto was the first occasion upon which the President made a particular avowal of his opinions upon this all-important question of constitutional power, in which he denies the right of this Government to construct works of internal improvement within the boundaries of a State, or to appropriate money in aid of such works, by subscriptions for stock or otherwise. He avows, also, the opinion that this Government has the power to appropriate money for removing obstacles from and improving the navigable rivers within the limits of a State, or where it is the boundary between States, and for constructing works of improvement in the Territories; in all of which he distinguishes between works of a national and those of a mere local character. The President, however, in the veto message, expresses himself doubtfully of what is the true boundary line within which the Government may appropriate money, and recommends such an amendment of the constitution as will place the exercise of this important power upon its true ground, defining the line over which the Government shall not go, and putting to rest forever this vexed question. The President repeated, in each of his succeeding messages, the difficulty under which he labored, and the recommendation of a constitutional amendment, to relieve the Executive from the difficulty. This recommendation of his, merely to define by constitutional declaration this power, has not been responded to by the representatives of the people, and the responsibility for its failure rests upon them.

It cannot be forgotten that the Maysville veto was hailed with enthusiastic delight by the opponents of this power, as cutting off the whole system of local improvements within the limits of the States, and though not achieving the whole, yet achieving much, very much, for the principle of strict construction. All the public journals so regarded it, and this was the view which was taken by the whole nation. This, sir, is the principle which the administration professed; and I contend that in all the appropriations for works of internal improvement, none have been constructed of a local character, incompatible with the principles avowed in the Maysville veto and subsequent messages. If there is one, sir, it has escaped my memory, and I should like to know it, for I wish to know the truth.

Naval Service Bill.

[MARCH 30, 1836.]

[Mr. WISE rose and said, that understanding his honorable colleague [Mr. GARLAND] to inquire or to ask for a specification of any act of approbation by the Executive of the principle of internal improvement since his veto of the Maysville road bill, he would, with his colleague's permission, specify a single instance during the last Congress.

Mr. GARLAND gave way, and Mr. WISE proceeded to state that during the last Congress there was a bill of appropriation for the construction of certain harbors on the lakes, in the States of New York and Ohio. That when that bill came up for consideration, his colleague [Mr. MERCER] moved to amend it, by adding an item of thirty thousand dollars, or thereabout, for surveys for works of internal improvement. This sum has been for several years annually appropriated for internal improvement, and had ever been considered the foundation of the whole system. It was the nucleus, the nest egg, of works of internal improvement; for without previous surveys no works whatever could be constructed. It involved the whole principle of the system, without limitation, without the refined distinction ever involved in the word "national." So viewed, when this amendment was offered to this harbor bill, a few strict constructionists from the South, of whom I was one, determined to make one more effort to resist the principle of internal improvement, and to strike a blow at the very foundation of the system. Accordingly, when the bill came up, several gentlemen and myself appealed to the gentlemen of "the party," particularly from New York, to aid us in resisting this amendment of my colleague, [Mr. MERCER.] My honorable colleague, [Mr. ARCHER,] when the amendment was offered, called for the yeas and nays, and, to our gratification, it was rejected by the votes of "the party" from New York, united with the strict constructionists of the South. We congratulated ourselves upon the triumph; and I remember well that I was cordially congratulated by several gentlemen from New York upon the evidence which they had then given us that they were with the South on the question of internal improvements. I relied upon their evidences and their smiles, but was doomed to disappointment, and, in turn, to defeat. My colleague [Mr. MERCER] and the national republicans, as they are called generally, seeing the manner in which their favorite appropriation for surveys had been defeated, turned around and united with the strict constructionists in voting against the harbors of New York and Ohio. Thus we, in fact, defeated the whole bill; but the rejection lasted only twenty-four hours, for the moment "the party" of New York saw their harbors fail, they forgot they were against the principles of internal improvement, which they admitted, and all admit, is involved in the appropriation for surveys, came in the next day, moved a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the amendment of my colleague—it was moved by Mr. BEARDSLEY, of New York. The amendment, then, was passed by their votes. The vote rejecting the harbors was then reconsidered; the bill containing surveys and harbors was passed; and the President of the United States signed and sanctioned the act, with all its features of internal improvement, in every form.]

Mr. GARLAND resumed. I do not doubt at all the truth of the statement of my honorable friend from Virginia. I know he would make no intentional misstatement; nor is it material to my argument to vindicate or defend the course of members on this floor, who may act inconsistently with themselves: that is their own business, with which I have no concern, and with which I shall not meddle; but I do not think the $30,000, referred to by my colleague, at all conflicts with the truth of the assertion; for there is nothing in it, nor has there been any practice under it, incompatible with the principles of the Maysville veto. The first appropriation for plans and surveys was made on the 30th of April, 1824, and is in these words: "Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, to be made of the routes of such roads and canals as he may deem of national importance in a commercial or military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the public mail; designating, in the case of each canal, what points may be made capable of sloop navigation," &c.; in which the surveys to be made are to be for works of "national importance;" and in its execution restricted to such works as are of national importance in a commercial or military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the public mail. The first appropriation for this object during this administration is in these words: "For defraying the expenses incidental to making examinations and surveys for national works under the act of the 30th April, 1824, &c., thirty thousand dollars."—Act of May 31, 1830, in which the appropriation directly refers to the surveys, &c., contemplated by the act of 1824, and only incorporates the principles of that act. Every appropriation since is in the same language, and is made to procure the surveys, plans, &c., contemplated by the act of 1824; and is expressly restricted to the objects named in that act. Whatever, then, is wrong in the annual appropriation referred to by my friend from Virginia, is to be traced to the act of 1824, for which the republican administration of Mr. Monroe is responsible. In that act, the distinction is taken between local and national works, and is the distinction taken in the Maysville veto, and running throughout the messages of President Jackson. I admit, sir, for I never will disguise truth for any consideration, that this annual appropriation of 30,000 dollars contains within it a principle of internal improvement, not an unrestricted and unlimited principle, such as was claimed by the preceding administration, but a restricted principle, restricted to national works, the very principle of the veto. Yet, sir, I am free to confess that this principle is broader than my own notion of constitutional power, and incompatible with the strict doctrine of the Virginia school upon this subject. I disagree with the President as to the power which he asserts over rivers within a State, or where the jurisdiction of two States extends over it. I am not attempting to prove that the doctrines of the President are entirely in accordance with the Virginia doctrines upon this subject; I know they are not, and he never pretended that they were. I am only contending that he is consistent with himself in principle and practice in relation to this subject; and in this practice he has done much, very much, to restore the practice of the Government to the true constitutional standard, for which he has my sincere thanks.

To prove that the practices of the administration in the expenditure of the annual appropriation for surveys, &c., before referred to, have been in accordance with the principles of the veto, I here read an extract from the report of the able and intelligent head of the topographical department, charged with the duty of making surveys, &c., upon the principle upon which this fund is expended, and proving that not one cent has been expended upon local works. "The rules (says the report) which have been prescribed for the office in these matters are as follows: that—

Naval Service Bill.

[H. of R.]

"1. Surveys ordered by law, and for which there are generally specific appropriations, should be attended to.

"2. Surveys ordered by resolutions of Congress. The expenses of these are paid out of the annual appropriation for surveys, including the pay of civil engineers, which is taken out of the same appropriation.

"3. Surveys of a national or highly interesting commercial character, applied for by States or incorporated companies. In these cases, such officers as can be spared (with their instruments) are allowed to be assigned. All other expenses, including those for additional engineers or additional instruments, are supplied by the parties interested in the survey, the United States being subjected to no charge on these accounts; or, in other words, confining the aid from the United States to the mere loan of such engineers and of such instruments as can be conveniently spared."

Here, then, is proof that the manner in which this annual appropriation is disbursed is compatible with the strictest letter of the Maysville veto. I ask, then, what survey has been made in conflict with it? [Mr. MERCER said "that, as his colleague had called for a case, he would give the survey for a ship canal around the Niagara falls.]

It is true, the survey of the canal designated by my honorable colleague [Mr. MERCER] was made by the topographical department, but not one cent of the expense was paid out of the public money; it was paid for by private subscription. My colleague also designates Mars Hill road, in the State of Maine, as a local work, at war with the principles of the Maysville veto. This, sir, is a military road, constructed from a military post on the Maine and Canada frontier into the interior of Maine, by which supplies are transported to that post, and is the only road by which they can be transported. This being a military road, and necessary to military operation, connected with a military post, is certainly constitutional. I think the cases singled out are not at all at war with the professed principles of the President, and that I have succeeded in proving that his practices upon this subject are in strict conformity with his professed principles.

The charge of prodigal and excessive expenditures upon works of internal improvement by this administration, when impartially and thoroughly examined, will be found unsustainable. The whole amount expended is $4,930,176 92, excluding the expenditures of the year 1829; for the expenditures of 1829 were the result of appropriations made in the preceding administration. There must also be deducted the whole expenditure upon the Cumberland road, amounting to $2,600,511. This road was authorized and commenced in Mr. Jefferson's administration, has been the subject of appropriations by every succeeding administration, and could not, with propriety, be vetoed by the President, as the whole work, so far as completed, would have been lost. The acts I regard unconstitutional, although sanctioned by the high authority of Mr. Jefferson, and shall vote against any further appropriation for it. The President, in his Maysville veto, expressly disapprobates the original law; yet he avowed his determination not to arrest works commenced by his predecessors. From this amount is also to be deducted $388,200 93 for expenditures upon works authorized and commenced by preceding administrations, leaving the nett sum of $1,941,434 56 expended by authority of the present administration, and for which it is alone responsible. This expenditure, moderate when compared with the amount charged upon the administration by its opponents, has been expended principally in the improvement of bays, harbors, and navigable rivers, for the accommodation of foreign and domestic commerce, and for the improvement of the Territories, which are entirely dependent upon the Government. View this subject, then, in its true light, and all will admit that, in relation to it, gross injustice has been done to this administration. In its course there is much to approve, but little to disapprove.

But if the amount of expenditure upon objects of internal improvement has elicited so much alarm, I ask how much is the country indebted to the firmness of the President in arresting the many local and extravagant schemes which were proposed, and about to be proposed, when the Maysville veto was presented? It is said there were in bills and reports, in both Houses, in the session preceding the Maysville veto, schemes of a general and local character which would have cost the Government upwards of $100,000,000. [Mr. MERCER interposed, and said that "the statement was not true; that he had before pronounced it false; that all the bills and schemes reported by the committees would not have cost one fifth of that sum."]

I make the statement, Mr. Chairman, upon the authority of the President's message of December, 1834, which I now have before me. Whether the President or my colleague is mistaken, I shall not here stop to determine; it is matter of calculation. The reports and bills are here, and will speak for themselves, and correct any error of calculation in relation to them. Whether the error be with my colleague or the President, it is immaterial now for me to determine, for, in either case, a very prodigal and excessive expenditure has been prevented. This is not all upon the same authority; it is stated that there were petitions and memorials for works of internal improvement, which were estimated at about $100,000,000 more. If this be so, and I do not doubt it, I ask if the country does not owe a heavy debt of gratitude to the present administration for the achievement of so much of principle and of economy? I leave the impartial to decide upon this subject. Whatever blame there is must rest upon Congress, as the annexed table shows what has been estimated by the administration for purposes of internal improvement, and what has been appropriated by Congress.

1831	$639,216 59	$1,035,494 44

The increase of works necessarily increased estimates for their continuance.

The next subject of complaint in support of the charge that this administration has not practised upon its professed principles, is, the extravagance and prodigality of its expenditures. Determining the truth of this charge, it is necessary to determine the true signification and meaning of the word economy; whether the principle of economy is to be determined by the necessity, propriety, and value of the subject upon which an expenditure is made, or whether it is to be determined by the mere amount of dollars and cents expended. I contend, and I think no gentleman will contradict it, that the true principle of economy must be determined by the necessity, propriety, and value, of the subject of expenditure; for one thousand dollars may be lavishly and prodigally thrown away, while millions may be usefully and economically expended upon subjects of great importance and value to the nation. If this be the true standard to test the economy of the administration, it will, all circumstances considered, bear a safe comparison with any preceding administration. It is true it exhibits more in amount, except during the late war; yet, when the subjects upon which the excess of expenditure has been made are taken into the account, its reasonableness and propriety are made manifest, and every suspicion of prodigality dissipated. The following table presents a comparative view of the expenditures of this administration with the two preceding. The aggregate expenditure of Mr. Adams's administration was $50,501,913 21. The first four years of this administration, $56,270,480 62; excess, $5,768,567 41. This excess of expenditure, by this administration, for the first four years, over the preceding four years, is to be principally found under two heads—miscellaneous and military; in the miscellaneous, embracing a large number of private claims to an amount never before allowed; the excess of expenditure in this over Mr. Adams's administration is $2,798,081 98; and in the appropriations for the military department, embracing pensions, Indian annuities, purchase of Indian lands, and various Indian appropriations, the excess is $4,316,190 92, making, in both branches, an excess of $7,114,271 83; from which take the balance before stated of $5,769,567 41, leaves a balance of ordinary expenditures of $1,344,704 42 in favor of this administration; but from this must be deducted $1,000,000 paid by Mr. Adams's administration towards the treaty of Ghent, leaving the nett balance of $344,702 42; and this, too, under the circumstances of increased population, largely increased commerce, and increased foreign relations. I challenge, under these two heads of appropriation, to be shown a single improper, injudicious, or prodigal item of appropriation. These calculations are made exclusive of the public debt. The annexed table presents a comparative view of the expenditures of this administration, embracing the estimates for the current year, in comparison with the eight preceding years, inclusive and exclusive of the public debt, showing in what way the expenditures of this administration have been increased, either in its ordinary expenditures or on extraordinary objects. I invite particular scrutiny, and feel no doubt that it will remove from the administration the slightest imputation of prodigality. The items of increase are such as have been sanctioned by Congress, and such as the country, with some few exceptions, will generally approve.

[Mr. BELL said he did not charge that the general expenditures of this administration exceeded those of the late administration. His charge was, that those branches of the public expenditures which were most liable to suspicion and abuse, and which depended upon the discretion of the officers, had increased under this administration.]

I am gratified that the honorable gentleman so explains, and it relieves me from the necessity of saying much more upon this subject.

But if, upon the most fastidious principles of economy, the charge of extravagance can be sustained, it is not chargeable upon the executive administration, but upon Congress. As a proof, I here exhibit a table showing the estimate made and recommended by the Executive, and the appropriations made by Congress, embracing the years 1831, 1832, 1833, 1834, and 1835, in which it will be seen that the appropriations made by Congress exceed the estimates of the Executive by fifteen millions four hundred and eighteen thousand four hundred ninety-five dollars and three cents.

Upon what principle, I would ask, can the administration be held responsible for the prodigal appropriation by Congress? Upon none that I can perceive. Congress is particularly charged by the constitution with appropriations of the public money. The administration does not elect the Representatives, but the people do it, and it is for the people, sustaining the principles of the administration, to elect such Representatives as will sustain and carry out those principles which they demand at the hands of the administration, or it is impossible the administration can effect its wishes. Somehow or other, upon some subjects, the friends of the administration have never been united, and have thus thwarted the efforts of the Executive to carry out some of its valuable and important principles. The President cannot, with reasonable propriety, veto money bills within the constitutional power of the Government; hence the responsibility for the failure of the administration to reduce the expenditures of the Government, to a great extent, rests with the people themselves. The cure of the evil is alone in their hands. In 1833, from the increase of the pension list, the Indian war, purchases of Indian lands, and various other causes, the expenditure of the Government greatly increased, but in 1834 diminished about 4,000,000 dollars; also, in 1835, about 1,000,000 dollars, as will be seen from the annexed table:

Comparative expenditure of 1833 and 1834.

1. CIVIL LIST.

The expenses under this head were about $500,000 greater in 1834 than in 1833. The following items will show the sources of most of their increase:
During the long session of Congress of 1834, the pay of the members more than the short session of 1833 amounted to	- $300,000
Increased expenses of printing and contingencies, from length of session,	- 60,000
Increased expenditures in judiciary department,	- 40,000
Expenditures occasioned by burning Treasury building, rent, &c., and some other small items,	- 13,000
	$413,000

2. MISCELLANEOUS EXPENDITURES.

Under this head the expenses were about a million lower in 1834 than in 1833. The following items show the principal differences. The balance between the two columns indicates its amount:

To which sum should be added about $400,000, being the amount of a great variety of small items either reduced or discontinued.

3. MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Under this head the expenses were about three millions less in 1834 than in 1833. The following items show the composition of this sum:

Less amount paid to individual States on account of their expenditure during the late war, -	-	$400,000
Less for roads in Territories, &c.	-	100,000
Less expended on fortifications from suspension of Rip Raps, &c.	-	500,000

			$3,236,000

4. NAVY.

In 1834 the expenditures in this branch of the public service were about $200,000 greater than in 1833. This increase was principally occasioned by the rebuilding and repairs of vessels, and the addition made by law to the pay of officers during a part of the year.

5. PAYMENTS ON ACCOUNT OF FOREIGN INTERCOURSE,

Were about $600,000 less in 1834 than in the preceding year, that sum having been paid in 1833, under awards in the treaty with Denmark. Besides this item, the expenditure was about $50,000 less.

EXPENSES OF 1835.

The general expenditures of 1835 are very similar to those of 1834. But from the session of Congress being a short one, and there being no appropriations for the fortifications, the payments under these heads were of course much less, and the aggregate expenditures of the year lower by over half a million.

EXPENSES HEREAFTER.

The annual expenditure for ordinary purposes might be brought down to fourteen millions, were the expenses of all connected with the military establishment placed on the footing of ten or twelve years ago; the miscellaneous expenditures restricted as at that period, and the naval, civil, and miscellaneous appropriations not greatly enlarged.

The increased expense from miscellaneous appropriations since that period averages per annum, about -	-	$1,000,000
Increased expense from pension arrearages, about -	-	3,500,000
Increased expense from Indian treaties and annuities, -	-	1,000,000
		$5,500,000

Which is about a million over the average excess beyond previous years.

The annual expenditures from 1817 to 1821, without including expense of public debt, averaged per annum, about -	-	$15,000,000
Similar average from 1821 to 1825, about, -	-	12,000,000

The details in the foregoing statement may, from the number of selections forming them, not be altogether correct; the general results are deemed correct.

The next fact upon which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee bases his charge of the corrupt tendency of the practices of the Government, is the connexion of the Government with the public press. The gentleman says that the Government has an annual fund of $30,000 at its disposal, for the purpose of being employed in the publication of the laws, Government proposals, &c.; and that, with this fund, the Government subsidizes the press, makes it subservient to its views, and thus controls public opinion. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the Government has this fund appropriated to it annually by Congress, at its command, which is employed in paying for the publication of the laws, proposals for carrying the mails, supplies for the army and navy, &c.; but this, sir, is a work of necessity, and cannot be dispensed with. The Government must either use the columns of existing newspapers, or employ a press of its own; the laws must be disseminated, as well as proposals for contracts; and there is no means by which it can be so extensively and successfully done, and, indeed, there is no other practicable mode in which it can be done, except through the medium of the press. The Government, then, must of necessity employ the public press. If the sum appropriated be too large, Congress has the power, and should reduce it; if not, then there is no cause of complaint. In making the selection, it is but natural to expect, if there be rival presses at the point selected, that the Executive would select the press, all other circumstances being equal, which is friendly to it. This is a feeling attached to human nature which does not die with incumbents in office; it is a feeling which should be approved rather than reprobated, for all of every party act upon the principle of preferring a friend to an enemy. I do not approve of a change merely for opinion's sake, without any other cause; but it is making a very small allowance indeed for the infirmities of human nature, to suppose that the Government would or ought to continue its patronage of a press in the constant habit of traducing and vilifying its administration. This is requiring the Government to do what no man here would do. I deny, however, to loco, that the administration has employed any press, in which the laws and proposals are published, to vilify and abuse any man. I deny that it is in any wise responsible for the editorial or other articles in such papers. The editors are free—they conduct their papers in their own way, and are individually responsible.

The honorable gentleman charges that a copy of what he calls the semi-official paper in this city was sent to each of the members of the Legislatures of Tennessee and Alabama, during the last fall, franked by the President, in which was contained an article copied from another journal, of a very offensive character to Judge White; and this he charges as an abuse of the patronage of the press. I do not believe that the President saw or knew of that article, when he franked the papers alluded to. He had a far different and more important object in view; one which was and ought to be very near his heart. The papers franked contained the speech of Mr. Benton in the Senate of the United States, upon the resolution to expunge from the journal of that body (whether properly or not, I shall not here undertake to discuss) its resolution charging the President with violating the laws and the constitution in the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States—a resolution as unauthorized by the constitution as it was defamatory to the character of the President. The President was deeply solicitous that the imputation stamped upon his character for an act which had been decisively sustained by an overwhelming majority of the American people, contained in the Senate's resolution, should be obliterated or expunged from the journal by a decisive mark of reprobation. For this purpose he appealed to the people of his own State, that people for whom he had done so much, for whom he had made so many sacrifices, and with whose character their own was so intimately identified. This, sir, induced the frank of the papers referred to; and I am sure none will blame the President for feeling some interest in the vindication of his character against the foul imputation stamped upon it, for an act which will in future time be regarded as the most brilliant event of his eventful administration. This, sir, was his object, and his only object; and he could not have appealed with as much propriety to any other people as to that people, the people of Tennessee, to whom he was so strongly attached, with whom he had lived, and among whom he expected to die. If the President has either openly or covertly used his influence with the press, for the purpose of vilifying and abusing any man, if any member of his administration has done it, I have yet to learn the fact; but it does not follow that because presses are employed by the Government to do the public printing, the Government authorizes or is responsible for every thing that is inserted in the columns of their papers. It is to be expected that the administration would feel some interest in the vindication of its measures, and against the antagonist principles of the one, and the misrepresentation of the other. But, sir, I deny that the press has been purchased; for it is a fact notorious that the majority of the American press is opposed to this administration. It is reasonable and proper, then, that it should prefer presses sustaining it. I would ask the honorable gentleman if he holds the candidate whom he supports in the coming election responsible for all that is said in the presses that are sustaining his election? If he does, will he hold him responsible for this article of the Richmond Whig? "Judge White elected, (if elected at all,) by the votes of the whigs, he will naturally and necessarily select his counsellors from their ranks, and modify his measures according to their views." As also this article from the Charleston Mercury: "If (says the Mercury) Judge White should be elected, the Union party would be dead and buried. The nullifiers would not only have the ascendancy at home, but in the Federal Government to boot." Again, it says: "They (the Union party) would be dead politically, both at home and at Washington; and not only this, but while their party and their principles would be whisked to the winds, the principles of the States rights party, under a man like White, would spread and prosper, and become substantially the principles of the federal administration." Upon the principle that an administration is held responsible for all that is said in the presses supporting it, Judge White would be held responsible for the articles cited, avowing that his administration would overthrow the Union party and its principles.

Again: Is the Judge to be held responsible for all that has been said by the presses sustaining his pretensions, to the prejudice of his opponent, the Vice President? If so, I would invite a comparison between the presses sustaining each, and it will be found that the abuse and vilification of Judge White has been trifling, compared with the volumes of slander and abuse poured out upon the head of the Vice President. Sir, this state of things grows out of the freedom of the press. It cannot be controlled. I admit that the press has become greatly licentious, showing too little respect to individual feeling and private reputation. It is to be deplored, yet it cannot be avoided, unless it be shackled. To this I never could consent, for I would much prefer enduring its licentiousness than shackle its freedom. The freedom of the press, freedom once shackled, and liberty is gone. Then, sir, what cannot be avoided must be endured: it is the price we pay for liberty. There is but one mode of correcting the evil, and that is, by the patrons of the press withholding their patronage from licentious presses. I do not intend to discriminate. The presses on both sides are in fault. I can only say, in relation to my humble self, that, when the press condescends to notice me, I trust it will do it in tender mercy, for I shall never have the folly to undertake a war with it.

In relation to the present public printer, I can only say that he was elected by Congress; and, as has been truly said, by a party vote. Those who oppose the present incumbents are proprietors of presses, and each had a distinct party vote; and the only reason why neither was elected is, the party to which they were attached was not strong enough. The party vote which elected the present incumbents, is cited as proof of party organization; yet, sir, the direct party vote to the other candidates is proof that there was no party organization: a singular conclusion, certainly. If the election proved party organization, it proved it in relation to all parties.

I think, by recurring to the elections of public printer, it will be found, from the foundation of the Government, that the conductor of a public journal has been selected; and since parties have assumed a distinct character, the editor elected has always been attached to the dominant party. It is generally one of the tests of strength of party; it is one of the results of our system of Government, and cannot well be avoided; the public printing is done at fixed rates, and may from time to time be reduced. So much for what has been charged as the corrupt practices of the Government; for it is all based upon the fact, that papers sustaining the administration have been employed to do the public printing. I would gladly aid in restricting any improper interference, by presses doing the public work, with elections, if it could be done consistently with the high principles of liberty involved in the freedom of the press. But, sir, I cannot consent to disfranchise the whole class of editors, because, in common with their fellow-citizens, they use the freedom of the press and of speech. It would not be just; it would be incompatible with every principle of liberty and our free institutions. I confess I do not see very clearly how it could be done; but if the public service could be disconnected with the public press, I would aid all in my power to accomplish it; but it seems very impracticable, however plausible in theory.

I will now consider the charge of neglect in the executive department, in providing for the defences of the country. In making this charge, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee has called to the attention of the committee the deplorable state of the defences of the country, and almost entire destitution of arms and munitions of war, and charges this state of things upon the War Department.

[Mr. BELL said he made no attacks, nor intended to make none, upon the War Department in particular. My attack was upon the party, upon those who were responsible for the action of the Government, in both the executive and legislative departments.]

I was aware that the honorable gentleman did not exclusively implicate the War Department; yet, sir, he charged upon that Department great neglect. It is my purpose now to vindicate the Department itself. I will say something hereafter as to the majority. There presides over that Department, Mr. Chairman, a man whose genius, enterprise, energy, and activity, are not surpassed by any of his predecessors. Order, skill, energy, integrity, and activity, prevail in the administration of that Department, in all its ramifications; and I assert, without the fear of successful contradiction, that all the means which have been placed in its power have been promptly and judiciously employed in placing the defences of the country in an imposing and safe condition. Beyond the means afforded by Congress, that Department could not go. It is known that nearly all the fortifications constructed during the late war, owing to the haste with which they were constructed, and the bad materials employed, are, and have been for years, in a state of rapid decay; yet, sir, what are the means which have been appropriated for their repair, the annexed table will show:

Statement of the estimates for repairs and contingencies of fortifications, and the amounts appropriated for the same object, from the year 1821 to 1835, inclusive.

Years.	Estimates.	Appropriations.
For the service of 1821	$20,000 00	$20,000 00
Do. do. 1822	20,000 00	20,000 00

Do. do. 1835	10,000 00
	237,320 50	210,320 50

These sums are totally inadequate; yet it will be perceived that the last year, 1834, and several preceding, only ten thousand dollars were appropriated to this object; that, for four successive years, commencing with 1830, the Department asked fifteen thousand dollars, and Congress appropriated ten thousand dollars only. In 1835 nothing was appropriated. This accounts for the state of dilapidation in which many of our fortifications are found.

In the annual report from the Secretary of War of November 30, 1829, the necessity of hastening the preparations for the armament of the fortifications was stated, and additional appropriations were asked therefor.

Extract from the annual report of the Secretary of War, dated November 30, 1829.

"A reference to the report of the chief of the ordnance will show the particular details of operation in that branch of the service; it merits attention. It has been frequently observed that the best way to avoid war is to be in preparation. In this point of view, it is desirable that the appropriations to be made for clothing our fortifications should correspond with the probable periods of their completion. It would, indeed, be a mortifying result, if, after the labor and cost which have been encountered for their completion, it should rest in the power of an enemy, at the onset of war, to seize or destroy them, because the means had not been placed in readiness for their defence.

"From the report it will be perceived that, at the present annual rate of appropriation, to wit, one hundred thousand dollars, sixteen or twenty years will have passed before a proper supply of arms for those fortifications now in progress can be obtained for their defence. As regards this subject, the course most advisable to be pursued would be, that the armament preparation should progress correspondently with the works themselves; not that they should be mounted, and, by exposure to the weather, become decayed and useless, but that, the guns being at their positions and the carriages in readiness on the apprehension of war, suitable preparations for resistance might at all defensible points appear, meeting the objects for which those fortifications were designed, and yielding protection to the assailable parts of the Union. If, in the slow and gradual preparation for a necessary and adequate armament at present pursued, sixteen years shall be found requisite, and war within that period take place, a consequence would be that some of our forts, built up at great expense, would be destroyed, because incapable of self-defence; or else, by being retained and armed, be used by the enemy as annoyance and injury to ourselves. A measure involving such important considerations should not be protracted in its execution; it carries with it, in foreboding anticipation, too much of probable evil consequence. This subject derives additional interest from the consideration that guns and carriages require time in preparation; they are things that cannot be hastily arranged, and which to defer might prove prejudicial.

"At the different arsenals and magazines an abundant supply of powder is in store. Considering its liability to injury, rather than keep up the supply, it would be preferable to procure the materials of which it is composed, ready to be manufactured when circumstances shall make it necessary. These articles are now remarkably cheap, and are easily preserved from deterioration. Recollection retains the fact that, during the last war, the average price of saltpetre was about forty cents, and brimstone eight. Involved in another contest, the same state of things might be presented, while at present those articles can be procured at one eighth the price which, of necessity, had then to be given.

"Being susceptible of ready procurement, it would prove a matter of economy to forbear any future purchase of powder, contenting ourselves merely with obtaining an adequate supply of ingredients, whenever it could be procured at fair prices. The materials thus preserved and in readiness could, at short notice, be manufactured, whenever occasion should make it necessary."

In the annual report from the Secretary of War, of December 1, 1830, the subject was again renewed, and the propriety of an additional appropriation again pressed.

Extract from the annual report of the Secretary of War of the 1st December, 1830.

"The ordnance department is progressing as rapidly as the means afforded will permit in arming the militia of the States, and in preparing the necessary guns and carriages for garnishing the different fortresses of the country. It is worthy of consideration whether the appropriation applicable to this service should not be increased, so as to provide a suitable armament by the time the different fortifications along the coast shall be completed. For the forts which are finished, a million of dollars will be necessary; but, besides these, others are in progress, and will shortly be completed. With the annual appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars towards this purpose, it will require ten years to accomplish the object for those which are in readiness. Should we be blessed with peace, no injury will arise; but should war take place, the effects upon our country would be of a serious and prejudicial character."

In the annual report from the Secretary of War, of November 21, 1831, this subject was again brought before Congress, and all the necessary details connected with the supply of cannon on hand, and of the number wanted, were given; and the propriety of establishing a national foundry, with a view of providing the necessary armament, was suggested and recommended.

Extract from the annual report of the Secretary of War, dated November 21, 1831.

"There are now 623 cannon, of various calibers, for field service; and there are at the arsenals and in the old fortifications 1,165. But these cannon are all of antiquated patterns, and, with the exception of the six pounders, amounting to 344, and a few of the heavier pieces, are considered unserviceable. There have been procured for the armament of the new fortifications 1,214 cannon of the improved pattern.

The old fortifications will require, probably, - 646

The new, already completed, - 2,587

Those contemplated by the board of engineers, a part of which are now constructing, - 4,045

Besides these, proper field trains, deposited in different sections of the Union, and sufficiently large to meet probable contingencies, may be estimated at

850

The average cost of our cannon is $5 94 per hundred pounds, which gives the following prices for those of different calibers:

For 42 pounders, - - - - $520

32 do. - - - - 450

24 do. - - - - 330

18 do. - - - - 245

12 do. - - - - 150

6 do. - - - - 70

It is estimated that an iron cannon will not safely bear more than 1,200 discharges with the service charge, after which it should be broken up.

The United States have no armories for the fabrication of cannon. The practice for some years has been to make contracts with the owners of the four foundries at Richmond, Georgetown, Pittsburg, and West Point, to the amount of the annual appropriation, allowing about an equal proportion to each, and paying such prices as the ordnance department, on the best information, judge reasonable.

This procedure has been repeatedly stated in the annual reports to Congress, together with the reasons which led to it. These are founded in the capital and experience required to conduct this business; in the necessity of depending, in some degree, upon the integrity and character of the manufacturers, as there may be defects in the piece not easily discoverable, owing to the necessity of mixing together iron of different qualities; and, in the belief that, if a general competition for these supplies were excited, the existing establishments would be broken down, and others endeavor to take their places, which would either fail from similar causes, or furnish cannon unfit for service, and thus leave the Government, at some critical period, without the means of procuring this indispensable arm of defence. The provisions of the act of Congress of March 3d, 1809, seem, however, to present serious objections to this course; and I bring the subject before you, at this time, that it may be fully considered.

It appears to me that a public armory for the fabrication of cannon is required by obvious considerations. By forming such an establishment, the necessary experience and artisans would be provided, and such supplies of heavy ordnance manufactured as the Government might direct. The actual value of the article would be ascertained, and contracts with individuals could be formed, with a full knowledge of the circumstances. There would be no danger of combinations, nor would any injury result from fair competition. The supplies might be so controlled as to leave no fear of a deficiency in the quality or quantity of this essential arm of defence.

In each of these years the sum of $100,000, in addition to the usual appropriation of $100,000, was asked for the armament of fortifications, and not granted by Congress.

The sum actually appropriated for the armament of fortifications, which object includes cannon, carriages, &c., for each year since 1829, inclusive, is $100,000; making, for the years 1829, '30, '31, '32, '33, '34, and '35, the sum of 700,000 dollars.

There have been procured with this sum—

2 42 pounder cannon.

1,052 32 do. do.

26 24 do. do.

47 42 do. balls.

19,482 32 do. do.

1,264 24 do. do.

355 casemate carriages.

342 barbette do.

There was on hand on the 4th of March, 1829, 2,241 guns of every description, new and old, which were serviceable.

There have been since added, as is shown above, 1,153 cannon of various descriptions. The number of carriages on hand at the same time was 378. The number of carriages since made is 697.

As a general rule, the practice has been to expend between 70,000 and 80,000 dollars per annum for cannon, and the balance of the 100,000 dollars for shot, and timber, to be seasoned for the carriages, and other materials for the same.

Statement showing the amount of money expended for the last seven years, under the appropriations for arming the fortifications, for the following objects, viz:

For 42 pounder guns -	-	-	-	$1,000
32 do. do. do.	-	-	-	520,200
24 do. do. do.	-	-	-	320

[MARCH 30, 1836.]

ORDNANCE OFFICE,

Washington, March 29, 1836.

The reasons why guns have been procured in greater numbers than carriages, are:

1st. Because only a limited supply of guns could be procured, the manufacture requiring peculiar and extensive preparations, and artisans well acquainted with the business. Previous arrangements, therefore, were required for their manufacture, and it was essential that the foundries employed in this manufacture should be kept in operation; for, if once broken up, it would be difficult to replace them, and on a sudden exigency we might not have been able to procure an adequate supply of cannon.

2d. Carriages could be made at every place where mechanical labor could be procured, and to almost any extent; and it was not therefore so necessary to hasten this supply as that of cannon. The truth of this remark is shown by the fact that, under the exigency of the last season, upwards of 800 carriages were made; and this number might have been increased to an almost indefinite extent, had circumstances demanded, and the means been provided.

3d. Wooden carriages are liable to decay, and it was therefore expedient to postpone the procuring of these rather than the cannon, which are almost indestructible, when the appropriation was not sufficient for a supply of both. Iron carriages have been but lately introduced into service, and were made for the first time last season. Wooden carriages are yet necessary in certain situations. Had the appropriations been sufficient for an adequate supply of both guns and carriages, both would have been procured; but as they were not, the funds were first expended upon the most indispensable articles.

These statements prove, beyond possible doubt, that all the means appropriated by Congress have been promptly and judiciously employed, and that no part of the public service committed to the care of that Department has been in the slightest degree neglected.

In addition to the strong recommendations of the War Department, the President, as early as the year 1830, called the attention of Congress to this important subject, in the following terms: "It is worthy of your consideration, whether the armaments necessary for the fortifications on our maritime frontier, which are now, or shortly will be, completed, should not be in readiness sooner than customary appropriations will enable the Department to provide for them. This precaution seems to be due to the general system of fortification which has been sanctioned, and is recommended by that maxim of wisdom which tells us 'in peace prepare for war.'" What more, I would ask, could the Executive do; and where rests the responsibility? I answer, upon Congress.

If the majority, then, have neglected to provide the means for the defence of the country, is the administration responsible for the consequences? I answer, no; the administration has done its duty; its skirts are clear. But, sir, how will this argument avail the honorable gentleman from Tennessee? Was he not one of that majority, and involved with them in the consequences of his own charge? I leave him to answer the question to himself and to his country. Why do the minority complain? If they had done their duty to the country, there would have been ample defences—all these complaints silenced. Yet they complain of the Executive for not doing what they themselves prevented being done, by not appropriating the means.

The Navy Department is also involved in this general charge of neglect, for the almost entire want of preparation and sad condition of the navy. To vindicate this Department against this charge, I need only refer to every annual message of the President and accompanying report from the Navy Department, to prove that the attention of Congress has been unremittedly called to this important arm of our national defence, and its increase, improvement, and equipment, urged in the strongest terms. The appropriations have been faithfully and judiciously disbursed. The true strength of the navy may be seen from the annexed table.

The President, in his message, strongly urged upon the consideration of Congress this subject.

THE NAVY.

	In commission.	In ordinary.	In stocks.	Total.
74	1	6	5	12
44	3	4	7	14
36	1	2	1	3
24	1	1	0	2
18	11	6	0	17
12	6	0	0	6
				<hr/> 54 <hr/>

This shows that although the vessels in commission are few in number, and inadequate to our defence, yet that such is the state of material preparation, that a large force could very promptly be put afloat in case of necessity. The whole navy is inadequate to the defence of our coast, but it is as large as the acts of Congress have authorized, and no blame can attach to the Department. It is true that some of the materials are in a state of decay at our navy yards. Why is it so? Because Congress has not provided sufficiently for their protection. As to the unexpended balances, so much spoken of, I have but a single word to say. There are existing contracts which will require every dollar. And now, Mr. Chairman, while the honorable gentleman from Tennessee has complained of our almost utter destitution of preparation for defence, and congratulates the country on its escape from damage and dishonor by the settlement of our controversy with France, he opposes entering at this time upon the adoption of that system of preparation proposed, the want of which he so strongly complained of. Sir, has not the gentleman, by asserting the want of preparation, and the dangers which we have escaped growing out of it, conclusively proved that we ought speedily to remedy the evil by adopting a judicious system of defence? I humbly think he has.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, proceed, as well as I can, to answer the charges of the gentleman from Tennessee affecting those promises and practices of the Government which were designed to delude and excite the people for political effect; and, 1st, as to what the gentleman opprobriously calls the "gold humbug." The honorable gentleman says, this administration pledged itself to restore a metallic circulation to the country—a pledge which it has totally failed to redeem. It is true, sir, that this administration maintains the principle that this was intended to be, and ought to be, a hard-money Government, and that it would use its utmost exertions to restore a hard-money circulation. To effect this, it recommended, and Congress has placed the value of gold here upon an equality with gold in Europe, and thus destroyed one motive to exportation. Since the formation of this Government, there has been coined in value $61,816,650 48, of which there has been coined in value during this administration $30,609,824 10—near one half. The mint establishment has also been extended; all of which proves that, if the effort fails, the administration has done every thing which it could constitutionally do to redeem this pledge. Why, then, has it not been redeemed? The answer is obvious: the State Governments have the constitutional power to charter banks; this power has been freely exercised: most of the State banks issue immense masses of small notes, which throw specie out of circulation. This was the very scheme which Alexander Hamilton, the father of the American banking system; resorted to, to throw out of circulation specie, so as to give full scope to the circulation of bank notes, and thereby secure their permanent and extensive circulation. The administration has done its duty: it cannot do every thing; and if the effort fails, the fault will be with the States and the people themselves; yet it must be admitted that the metallic circulation has much increased, and is gradually increasing, and I yet have strong hopes for the final accomplishment of so desirable an object.

The next subject of charge, of this character, made by the gentleman from Tennessee, is, that the administration profess to be greatly alarmed at the idea of the presidential election coming to this House, and are solicitous so to mend the constitution as to prevent it, while in truth and in fact they have no such fear, but hold it out to the people with a view of exciting their apprehensions to favor the election of a particular candidate for the presidency. This charge the honorable gentleman applies to the friends of the administration, but expressly excepts the President. To sustain this charge, the gentleman refers to the action of the last session of Congress, as exhibited upon the face of the journal, and contrasts the course pursued upon that subject by the friends of one candidate, with that pursued by the friends of another, and thence deduces the opinion that the friends of the Vice President are mostly opposed to the measure, while the party with which the gentleman from Tennessee acts favors it.

Such an amendment of the constitution as would prevent, under any contingency, the election of President and Vice President devolving upon the House of Representatives, has always been, and still is, a favorite measure with the present President; and he has never failed, in every annual message to Congress, from the commencement of his term to the present session, to urge it strongly upon Congress. He urged it when coming into power, and he urges it when going out. I have examined with much care the journals of the last session, and find the following to be the true state of the proceedings on that subject. On the 9th of December the President's message, recommending an amendment of the constitution in relation to this subject, was referred to a select committee. (See journal, p. 9.)

On the 19th of December, before any report was made Mr. Hamer, of Ohio, (the present chairman,) offered the following resolution: "Resolved, That the select committee to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the election of President and Vice President of the United States be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the constitution as to provide for the election of President and Vice President by a direct vote of the people in districts; the number of districts in each State to be equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, and each district having one vote; the election of such officers in no event to devolve upon Congress. No person who has been elected President to be again eligible to that office; and that no Senator or Representative shall be nominated or appointed to any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the authority of the United States, whilst holding a seat in Congress." (See journal, p. 111.)

Mr. Hamer was then, as now, a friend of the administration, as was also a majority of the committee.

On the 31st January, Mr. Gilmer, an opponent of the administration, who was chairman of the select committee, reported that the committee could not agree. (See p. 294.)

On the same day, Mr. Gilmer, by leave, offered joint resolutions on the subject, embracing a variety of propositions and details of an important character. Read, and laid on the table.

On the 13th of February, Mr. Gilmer made a motion to suspend the rules, to take up and consider these resolutions; yeas 151, nays 56; the great body of the friends of the administration voting for it: resolution read, and postponed to Thursday, the 19th. (Journal, p. 378.)

Same day Mr. Hannegan moved to amend, so as to refer the election of Senators directly to the people. (Page 378.)

February 19th: no effort made by Mr. Gilmer to take up his resolutions.

February 25th: Mr. Wilde moved to suspend the rules, so as to take up and consider the resolutions of Mr. Gilmer; yeas 112, nays 92.

By unanimous consent, the consideration of the resolutions was suspended for the present, and the House proceeded to despatch business on the Speaker's table.

Same day, resolutions taken up, and, on motion of Mr. Gilmer, amended. The amendment does not materially vary the original resolutions, and need not be repeated (Journal, p. 483.)

Same day, Mr. Speight moved an amendment, that the presidential term should be six, instead of four years; and the President to be ineligible to a second term. (Journal, p. 454.) Rejected; yeas 41, nays 162.

Same day, Mr. Gholson offered an amendment, by striking out some passages. (Journal, p. 455.)

February 27th: Mr. Gilmer moved to suspend the several orders of the day, to take up and consider the resolutions; many of the friends of the administration voting in favor of taking up—among them Mr. Polk—and many against it, and many of the opposition voting both for and against.

Same day, the consideration of the resolutions was resumed, and Mr. Gholson withdrew his amendment.

Mr. Gorham (an opposition member) moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. Briggs (an opposition member) moved to adjourn: rejected, yeas 38, nays 126. (Page 477.)

Motion to lay on the table rejected; yeas 39, nays 129. (Page 483.)

After further debate, Mr. Vanderpoel moved to adjourn: rejected, yeas 59, nays 112. (Page 480.)

Debate resumed. Mr. Plummer, a friend of Judge White, was addressing the House, when he was called to order by Mr. Wise, on the ground that his remarks were irrelevant, impertinent, and profane: decided to be out of order, but had leave to proceed, yeas 136, nays 38. (Page 480.)

After further debate, the House adjourned. This was on the 28th of February, but six days before the expiration, and is the last proceeding on this resolution.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee states that the majority of the select committee to which the President's message and the resolutions referred to were committed was composed of a majority of the friends of the Vice President, the purity and fidelity of some of whom cannot be doubted; and from thence strongly insinuates that the difficulty with the committee in coming to an agreement is chargeable to their opposition to the proposed amendment. I think that the history of the progress of this proposition proves, most clearly, that the honorable gentleman has ascribed the failure to the wrong cause. There is little doubt that Mr. Gilmer sought to ingraft upon the report of the committee all the propositions and details contained in the resolution which he submitted to the House on the 31st of January, involving a variety of propositions of very serious and important concern, and deserving grave and deliberate consideration; for it was said in the House, by Mr. Speight, of North Carolina, "that, although the committee could come to no agreement generally, they did agree, with one exception, to that part relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States."

H. OF R.]

Naval Service Bill.

[MARCH 30, 1836.]

This is proof conclusive that, upon the simple proposition of taking from the House of Representatives any participation in the election of President and Vice President, the committee found no difficulty in coming to an agreement; but that the conflict of opinion arose upon the proposition afterwards submitted in the House by Mr. Gilmer; and that this was the real cause why there was no action by the committee; for, let it be remarked, that, on the very day Mr. Gilmer reported that the committee could come to no agreement, he submitted his resolutions.

The views of the present incumbent of the chair, [Mr. POLK,] to whom some reference has been made by the honorable gentlemen from Tennessee, were favorable to this amendment of the constitution. In the discussion upon Mr. Gilmer's resolutions, he pointed out what he regarded a defect in the resolutions, and made the remarks which I will now read: Mr. Polk said "he believed he had discovered a very important omission in the resolutions; they nowhere stated the number of votes to which each State was entitled, although they had laid down the mode and manner in which the elections should be held. Mr. P. said that his views in many points resembled those of the gentleman from Georgia; but, in making important fundamental changes in our constitution, it became the House to pause and deliberate. Mr. P. was for a single term, against an election by that House, and would in all cases confine the election to the people; but he did not think that they should pass upon so weighty a subject in half an hour's deliberation. He again avowed himself in favor of the principles of the resolutions, and referred to his former course in support of them."

The approbation, then, of the present Speaker of the proposed amendment is not a matter of doubt. It is expressed in the remarks which I have quoted in the most unequivocal terms; and the manifest inclination of a large majority of the friends of the administration in favor of the amendment is to be found in their votes upon every question taken by yeas and nays upon this subject. When, therefore, it is considered that the last session of Congress was what is familiarly called a short session; that the proposition involved alterations and amendments in the constitution of the most grave and important character; the late period when they were called up; and that Mr. Gilmer at no time seriously pressed the decisive action of the House upon the subject, the propriety of the course taken by the House is strikingly manifest, and will be approved by the country. These amendments and alterations were, no doubt, introduced merely for the consideration of the people, to be finally acted upon at the present session. A report upon this subject has been made by the Committee on the Judiciary, and will, no doubt, be acted upon by the House during the present session. But, sir, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee has himself been numbered among the friends of this amendment to the constitution; it has been earnestly pressed by the President ever since his inauguration into office. I ask, then, why it is the gentleman himself has not been found pressing this amendment, it being, in his view, so very important. The gentleman stands involved in all the consequences of the failure of the majority, of which he was one, to act upon the subject, and must take his share of responsibility to the public.

The honorable gentleman, in alluding to some of the members of the select committee to whose consideration the resolutions were referred, spoke of them as gentlemen whose party fidelity could not be doubted. This, sir, is a compliment of no ordinary character, and I appeal to the testimony of the honorable gentleman himself, afforded in a speech ascribed to him, (whether justly or not, I do not know, for I find merely an extract in the newspapers,) delivered at Nashville since the last session of Congress. In speaking of the difficulties under which the administration labored in relation to the public deposits, he said:

"It was not speeches the friends of the administration stood in need of; it was votes, true and loyal friends, that would act in the hour of need."

From this expression, I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee will not regard honest party fidelity with any displeasure. Upon the whole, I think the gentleman from Tennessee has failed to fix upon the friends of the administration, or what he calls "the party," the responsibility of the failure of the amendment, or any insincerity in their advocacy of it.

Much had been said, Mr. Chairman, by all the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, about the immense surplus in the Treasury, and its rapid increase. I here submit a statement showing the actual amount of the surplus at the close of the last year; and what will be its probable amount at the close of the current year depends upon the appropriations of the present session.

1. The actual surplus in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1836, after deducting unavailable funds, and all outstanding appropriations, was about 18,000,000 dollars.

The balance on hand was about 25,731,152 dollars, and the outstanding appropriations near eight millions. This surplus was larger than had been previously estimated, on account of the great importations in the last quarter of the year, made before the apprehended difficulties with France should probably end in commercial restrictions and war; and on account of the unexpected continuance of extravagant speculations in public lands through the months of November and December.

2. The amount of the surplus at the close of 1836 will of course depend on the receipts during the year, and the expenditures, which have not yet been ascertained, for a single month with entire accuracy.

But if the estimates made in the last annual report of the receipts should be exceeded by three or four millions of dollars, as seems probable from the large imports to supply the destruction of goods by fire in New York, and from a continuance in January and February of large purchases of public lands, then the whole receipts in the year may be expected to equal about 25,000,000 dollars. The receipts from lands are so uncertain, they may exceed or fall short of the allowance included in the above computation.

I do not see any indications that the United States Bank intends to pay into the Treasury much, if any, of our capital stock during 1836, so as to swell the surplus from that source.

From this 25,000,000 dollars is to be deducted the expenditures during 1836 of new appropriations, which have been estimated in the annual report at about 23,000,000 dollars.

If the expenditures in 1836 of new appropriations should equal that sum, the balance of receipts in the year would exceed the expenditure about 2,000,000 dollars. But if to those expenditures, as estimated seven months ago, are added the new items for the Florida war, and other incidents, equalling five millions, the balance of expenditures over receipts would be 3,000,000 dollars; and thus what might be deemed a surplus in the Treasury, January, 1837 would be only about 15,000,000 dollars, instead of what it was January 1, 1836, of about 18,000,000 dollars.

Should Congress, however, appropriate still more to the fortifications and navy, to build custom-houses, &c. &c., than was contemplated in the estimates submitted last December, (and it is expected they may to the amount of at least six or seven millions,) all that excess will pro tanto reduce the surplus below fifteen millions,

MARCH 30, 1836.]

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

and make it not over seven or eight millions. So if the receipts from duties are actually postponed much to subsequent years by the New York fire bill, or are diminished by any large remissions of duties, the surplus will be further reduced. On the contrary, the receipts from lands, &c., may be larger, and then it will be increased.

From this statement, there was actually in the Treasury at the close of the year about $10,000,000, after deducting actual expenditures and unexpended appropriations, which must be expended. And this, sir, is the immense surplus over which the Executive wields an uncontrolled authority, and with which the nation is to be corrupted! Sir, it is true it is rapidly increasing, and will continue to do so, unless we pass the necessary appropriation bills. Sir, this surplus, with the decreasing duties under the act of 1832, will not remain long, although it amounts in calculation almost to $50,000,000; but will be only in calculation, not in cash. I am, Mr. Chairman, much amused at the change in the state of things. Two years ago we heard nothing but woful prophecies of a bankrupt Treasury and a ruined people. A resort to direct taxation, arising from the folly and usurpations of this administration, was predicted with great confidence. This very year was the period of fulfilment—when lo! and behold, we are not alarmed on account of a bankrupt Treasury and a ruined country, but, sir, because of an overflowing Treasury and a prosperous people. We are actually alarmed because we have so much money we do not know what to do with it. What a singular fulfilment of prophecy this! There is, Mr. Chairman, a ready way to relieve all our difficulties upon this subject—relieve the taxes of the people by reducing the tariff, and the surplus will soon be reduced. I hold myself under no obligation to abide any compromise of conflicting interests which shall unnecessarily burden the great body of the people.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to consider the subject of the deposit banks. It is said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] that the deposit of the public money in the State banks, extending as they do over the whole nation, secures to the Executive an extensive and dangerous influence over the moneyed concerns of the country, to an extent dangerous to public virtue and liberty; that the deposit banks will be entirely subservient to its views. Sir, the public money must either be concentrated at one point, in the Treasury Department, which would be unsafe and dangerous, or in the hands of individuals, which would also be unsafe, or in banks; and the question is, which would be the most judicious deposit? Mr. Gallatin, for whose opinions I entertain very high respect, in a report to Congress in 1811, when the charter of the old United States Bank was under consideration, used this language: "The banking system is now firmly established, and in its ramifications extends to every part of the United States. Under that system, the assistance of banks appears to me necessary for the punctual collection of the revenue, and for the safe keeping and transmission of public money. That the punctuality of payments is principally due to banks, is a fact generally acknowledged," &c. This argument is used merely to prove the necessity of using banks, because the system is firmly incorporated into our system. He then goes on to argue the advantages of a national over State banks; but says: "If, indeed, the Bank of the United States could be removed without affecting either its numerous debtors, the other moneyed institutions, or the circulation of the country, the ordinary fiscal operations of the Government would not be materially deranged, and might be carried on by means of another general bank, or of State banks." This concedes the whole ground I desire; and that State banks can be effectively and safely employed is already proved by actual experiment. The concession comes, too, from a man favoring a national bank.

The reasons, under existing circumstances, of selecting State banks, by the Executive, are manifest; it was an act of necessity. There is no law directing where the public money should be deposited, in case of the expiration of the United States Bank charter, or in case the Secretary, under the discretion with which he was vested, should deem it expedient to remove them: the State Banks were the only safe places which could be selected. At the opening of the session of Congress succeeding the removal of the public deposits, the President in his message notified Congress of the act of removal, the selection of the State banks, and earnestly recommended to Congress to make suitable regulations. He said, "the attention of Congress is earnestly invited to the regulation of the deposits in the State banks, by law. Although the power now exercised by the executive department in this behalf is only such as was uniformly exercised through every administration, from the origin of the Government up to the establishment of the present bank, yet it is one which is susceptible of regulation by law, and therefore ought to be so regulated. The power of Congress to direct in what places the Treasurer shall keep the moneys in the Treasury, and to impose restrictions upon the executive authority, in relation to their custody and removal, is unlimited;" and Congress from that time to this has failed to do so. The reason is obvious. The bill regulating this matter was embarrassed in its progress with clogs and restrictions, which might induce the State banks to refuse to receive the deposits, and thus to bring about the necessity of renewing the charter of the United States Bank, or chartering a new national bank. Sir, we should cease to assail the Executive about its influence and control over the State banks, and of the public money. The Executive has earnestly invited and urged you to regulate the deposits, and restrict its control over the public money.

Gentlemen complain of the influence which the Executive will exert over the community—an influence, they say, dangerous to liberty—through the medium of the deposit banks. I submit it to the country to decide whether there be less danger from a connexion with a national bank of $35,000,000, having its branches in the capital of every State, controlled by a single board of directors, or the same number of State banks, having each its independent board of directors, controlled by the vigilance of twenty-four State Governments, each interested for its own security in restraining any undue influence over State institutions by the national Government, even with $50,000,000, of capital. I am, myself, Mr. Chairman, no friend of banking institutions: the whole system is corrupt in its tendency, and is as successfully building up aristocracy in this country as the laws of primogeniture and succession sustain it in Great Britain.

But, sir, gentlemen not only profess to be alarmed at the influence possessed by the Government over these institutions, and the dangerous tendency of that influence, but they strike up another panic, and assert that the deposit banks are not safe; that the public money will all, or nearly all, be lost. I here exhibit a table showing the true condition of the deposit banks up to the 1st February, by which it will be seen that all the demands against them amount to $86,844,763 36, and their means to meet them $128,074,570 15; leaving a sum over and above all demands of $41,229,833 79.

It appears that the immediate liabilities of all the deposit banks are as follows:

Owing to other banks,	-	-	$14,879,161 45
Circulation to be redeemed	-	-	26,243,688 36
Private deposits	-	-	15,043,033 64
Public deposits	-	-	30,678,879 91

Aggregate - - - $86,844,763 36

H. OF R.]

Naval Service Bill.

[MARCH 30, 1836.]

Their immediate means to meet these immediate liabilities were:

Due from other banks	-	-	$15,712,977 35
Specie on hand	-	-	10,198,659 24
Notes of specie-paying banks	-	-	9,573,089 53

Aggregate	-	-	$35,484,726 12
-----------	---	---	-----------------

So that their immediate means were as 1 to about $2\frac{1}{2}$ of their immediate liabilities.

This is a proportion larger than most of the other banks in the United States; larger than the United States Bank itself used generally to have when a public depository, and larger than the Bank of England usually has. (See supplemental report, 1834, table AA, Doc. No. 27, Ho. of Reps.)

But, beside these immediate means, the deposit banks had also other means to secure the Government and other depositors, and the holders of their notes, of about 50 per cent. more than the amount of all their immediate liabilities:

Thus, beside the above immediate means, they have bills of exchange, in many cases as available as specie, amounting to	-	-	$27,149,935 39
---	---	---	-----------------

They have due them on notes and obligations discounted, the sum of	-	-	65,439,908 64
And add to this their immediate means of	-	-	35,484,726 12

And they have, in all, the sum of	-	-	$128,074,570 15
-----------------------------------	---	---	------------------

to pay and secure their immediate debt of 86,844,763 dollars 36 cents.

In addition to this, the Treasury holds collateral security of most of these banks, to secure what is due to the United States, as suggested in annual report, page 21.

The reports up to the 1st of March vary this view but little. It is manifest, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that so much alarm for the safety of the public money is totally unfounded. It is easy to discover that all these fears and alarms about the deposit banks, this irresistible influence of the Executive over the public mind, through their agency, are intended to effect some other favorite object; they squint at another national bank. I do not allude to any gentleman on this floor. But, sir, does it not occur to gentlemen, if these deposit banks are all broke, that they can exercise no deleterious influence upon the country, and that these fears are entirely visionary?

The next subject of complaint on the part of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELZ] to which I shall advert, is the subject of executive patronage, the increase and dangerous tendency of which seem to excite so much apprehension for the virtue and safety of the nation, on the part of that gentleman. In discussing this question, Mr. Chairman, I shall not stop to inquire what friend of the administration may or may not be involved in inconsistency; that is immaterial to me. I shall present my own views upon this as upon all other questions which shall come under consideration, without regard to the consequences to others. The question is, what are the principles of this administration upon this subject? not what is, or what has been, the opinion of this or that individual friend; and whether, upon this subject, the profession and practice of the administration have been consistent. The honorable gentleman says the bill now before the House, sent hither by the Senate, is intended to restrict and cut off improper executive patronage. This bill provides that the limitation of four years to the duration of the term of the public officers, to whose offices it now applies, shall be repealed, and that, in case of removal from office before the nomination of a successor is acted upon, the President shall assign to the Senate his reasons for the removal. Now, sir, I deny that this bill is in accordance with the professed opinions of the administration. The views of the President upon this subject were announced in his first annual message to Congress, in which he says:

"There are perhaps few men who can for any great length of time enjoy office and power, without being more or less under the influence of feelings unfavorable to a faithful discharge of their public duties. Their integrity may be proof against improper considerations immediately addressed to themselves, but they are apt to acquire a habit of looking with indifference upon the public interests, and of tolerating conduct from which an unpractised man would revolt. Office is considered as a species of property, and Government rather as a means of promoting individual interests, than as an instrument created solely for the service of the people. Corruption in some, and in others a perversion of correct feelings and principles, divert Government from its legitimate ends, and make it an engine for the support of the few at the expense of the many. The duties of all public officers are, or at least admit of being made, so plain and simple that men of intelligence may readily qualify themselves for their performance; and I cannot but believe that more is lost by the long continuance of men in office than is generally to be gained by their experience. I submit, therefore, to your consideration whether the efficiency of the Government would not be promoted, and official industry and integrity better secured, by a general extension of the law which limits appointments to four years.

"In a country where offices are created solely for the benefit of the people, no one man has any more intrinsic right to official station than another. Offices were not established to give support to particular men, at the public expense. No individual wrong is therefore done by removal, since neither appointment to, nor continuance in, office is matter of right. The incumbent became an officer with a view to public benefits; and when these require his removal, they are not to be sacrificed to private interests. It is the people, and they alone, who have a right to complain when a bad officer is substituted for a good one. He who is removed has the same means of obtaining a living that are enjoyed by the millions who never held office. The proposed limitation would destroy the idea of property, now so generally connected with official station; and although individual distress may be sometimes produced, it would, by promoting that rotation which constitutes a leading principle in the republican creed, give healthful action to the system."

If any man can discern in these views of the President the slightest accordance with the principles of the bill from the Senate, he has more acuteness than I have. The Senate's bill proposes to repeal the limitation of four years entirely, while the President recommends an enlargement of the limitation of four years to nearly all the offices under the Government; certainly a very material difference. The Senate's bill requires the President to assign his reasons for removal; the President nowhere intimates the propriety of such a requisition!

Mr. Chairman, it was a leading object in the formation of our Government to divide it into three separate and independent departments—legislative, executive, and judicial—leaving each, as far as practicable, uncontrolled and untrammelled in its action by the interference of the other. This, sir, is a constitutional division and a constitutional object; the principle has been sanctioned by our most distinguished patriots and statesmen. The executive power is placed in the hands of the President by the constitution; and however unwise the investment, if it be so, it cannot be divested of it but by constitutional amendment. Among the most efficient powers vested by the constitution in the President, is the power of removal from office. The importance attached to this executive power is well illustrated by the fact that, in the first session of Congress after the formation of the constitution, a provision attached to the bill organizing the State Department, authorizing the President to remove the Secretary from office at pleasure, was stricken out, on the ground that the power was unconstitutional, and could not be conferred by law. The proposition to strike out that provision gave rise to a long and able debate, in which the question whether the power of removal was derived from the constitution or not, was ably and elaborately discussed. Mr. Madison, who participated largely in that debate, said, while discussing the President's power of removal:

Naval Service Bill.

[H. or R.]

"But there is another part of the constitution which inclines, in my judgment, to favor the construction I put upon it. The President is required to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. If the duty to see the laws faithfully executed be required at the hands of the Executive Magistrate, it would seem that it was generally intended he should have that species of power which is necessary to accomplish that end. Now, if the officer appointed is not to depend upon the President for his official existence, but upon a distinct body, I confess I do not see how the President can take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

In the same speech he said:

"If any thing in its nature is executive, it must be that power which is employed in superintending and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed."

Again, Mr. Madison said:

"I think it absolutely necessary that the President should have the power of removal from office; it will make him in a peculiar manner responsible for their conduct, and subject him to impeachment himself, if he suffer them to perpetrate, with impunity, high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States, or neglect to superintend their conduct so as to check their excesses. On the constitutionality of the declaration I have no manner of doubt."

Mr. Giles, in a debate in 1802, upon the judiciary bill, expressed the same opinion. He said:

"In relation to newspaper scribblers, Mr. Jefferson once said, 'Let them stand undisturbed, as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated, where reason is left free to combat it.'"

Mr. Giles. "The President is authorized, without limitation, to commission all the officers of the United States. The question arises, by what tenure? The reply is, according to his pleasure or discretion. It was not difficult to foresee that, if the President was fully empowered to commission as he pleased, he would commission during his pleasure. The Legislature has no more control over an officer, who holds an executive commission during the pleasure of the President, than over a judicial officer, holding his office during good behaviour—the remedy given by the constitution being the same in both cases, to wit, impeachment. Nor is there any reason why the office of the one should be less subject to the discretion of the Legislature than the office of the other; and it seems to be universally agreed that, although the Legislature cannot deprive an executive officer of his office in any other way than by impeachment, during the continuance of such office, yet the office is always subject to be abolished. The same reasoning will hold with equal force respecting a judge and a judicial officer. The reason why the Executive is proscribed from the removal of a judge is to secure to the judge the complete independence of the President, who is not responsible for the discharge of judicial duties; but the removal is perfectly correct in the case of an executive officer, because the President is highly responsible for the due discharge of executive duties. The Legislature is not responsible for either, and, of course, stands in the same constitutional relation to both. There is the same remedy against both—impeachment."

The late eminent Judge Tucker, of Virginia, expressed the same opinion. In the appendix to his Commentary upon Blackstone he said:

"The constitution has made ample provision for his aid in these respects, by assigning to him ministers, to whom the conduct of each of the executive Departments may be committed, from whom he may require all necessary information, as also their opinions, in writing, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices; and whom he may, moreover, remove at pleasure."

In further support of this claim of constitutional power for the Executive, I here quote from Mr. Calhoun's speech upon the removal of the deposites in 1834. In that speech he said:

"I cannot doubt that the President has, under the constitution, the right of removal from office; nor can I doubt that the power of removal, wherever it exists, does, from necessity, involve the power of general supervision; nor can I doubt that it might be constitutionally exercised in reference to the deposites. Reverse the present case. Suppose the late Secretary, instead of being against, had been in favor of the removal, and that the President, instead of for, had been against it, deeming their removal not only inexpedient, but, under the circumstances, illegal; would any man doubt that, under such circumstances, he had a right to remove his Secretary, if it were the only means of preventing the removal of the deposites? Nay, would it not have been his indispensable duty to have removed him? And had he not, would he not have been universally and justly held responsible?"

In further support of this claim, I quote from Mr. Clay's speech at Fowler's Garden, in which, while he declaimed against the abuse, by fair inference admitted the constitutional power of removal.

"The President is invested with the tremendous power of dismissal, to be exercised for the public good, and not to gratify any private passions or purposes. It was conferred to prevent the public from suffering through faithless or incompetent officers. It was made summary, because, if the slow process of trial before a judicial tribunal were resorted to, the public might be greatly injured during the progress and prior to the decision of the case."

These opinions are founded upon the principle that the President, being charged by the constitution with the whole executive power, is responsible to the country for the due and faithful execution of the laws—his oath requires it at his hands. In support of this opinion, I quote from Mr. Jefferson's letter to Monsieur De Tracy:

"While the tranquil and steady tenor of our single Executive, during a course of twenty-two years of the most tempestuous times the history of the world has ever presented, gives a rational hope that this important problem is at length solved, aided by the counsels of a cabinet of heads of Departments, originally four, but now five, with whom the President consults, either singly or altogether, he has the benefit of their wisdom and information, brings their views to one centre, and produces a unity of action and direction in all the branches of the Government. The excellence of this construction of the executive power has already manifested itself here under very opposite circumstances. During the administration of our first President, his cabinet of four members was equally divided by as marked an opposition of principle as monarchism and republicanism could bring into conflict. Had that cabinet been a directory, like positive and negative quantities in algebra, the opposing wills would have balanced each other, and produced a state of absolute inaction. But the President heard with calmness the opinions and reasons of

Naval Service Bill.

[MARCH 30, 1836.]

each, decided the course to be pursued, and kept the Government steadily in it, unaffected by the agitation. The public knew well the dissensions of the cabinet, but never had an uneasy thought on their account, because they knew also they had provided a regulating power, which would keep the machine in steady movement."

I also refer to Mr. Madison's opinion in the debate before referred to, and just quoted. I also refer to Judge Tucker's Commentary on Blackstone, appendix to 1st volume, part 1, in which he says:

"The true point of responsibility rests upon the shortness of the period for which a President of the United States is elected, and the power which the people possess of rejecting him at a succeeding election." The same able author says, "responsibility pursues him (the President) in every situation, whether active or passive, sleeping or awake;" a sentiment, the truth of which is confirmed by that unerring test, experience.

And to the opinion of Mr. Calhoun, expressed in a letter to General Hamilton, in 1828, in which he says:

"No relation can be more confidential than that between the President and members of the cabinet, as his constitutional advisers, charged as he is with the executive duties of the Government, which were vested in a single person, to give energy and promptitude in execution."

The principle of unity in the executive department, as maintained by all our distinguished statesmen, necessarily attaches to it responsibility, and with that responsibility the power of removal; for it would be most outrageous to hold the President responsible for the faithful execution of the laws, and at the same time compel him to retain in office a set of unworthy officers, who would thwart his views and resist his authority, preventing the prompt and faithful execution of the laws. I should have thought the construction of the constitution, by its very authors, and the uniform practice ever since, would have settled this principle so far as to prevent any effort to change it by act of Congress. In this, however, I am mistaken; and this bill from the Senate has that object in view.

Regarding, as I do, the power of removal as a power conferred on the President by the constitution, I have not examined into the details of the bill with a view to ascertain their probable effects; but, at the threshold, find it a bill to repeal a constitutional principle, by operation of law. The executive and legislative departments, being both creatures of the constitution, and co-ordinate branches of the Government, I cannot consent that the one shall destroy or impair the independent constitutional powers of the other. Hence, sir, I am, in principle, opposed to this bill. It seeks to destroy, by law, the power of removal, conferred by the constitution. Mr. Chairman, it will be dangerous to permit such insidious encroachments, by law, as these, upon the constitution. The principles of the constitution should be preserved unimpaired; and whenever the construction of its powers is doubtful, the only safe way to settle the question of power is to appeal to the source of all power—the people. Sir, upon this question, I am asked to repeal, by law, a power of the constitution, acknowledged and acted upon for near fifty years. Gentlemen should pause, and reflect well upon the consequences of the act, before they consummate it. I, for one, will not touch this power by law.

There is another important question connected with this bill from the Senate; and that is, whether it is not in its effects calculated not only to impair the constitutional power of the Executive, but to add, to a dangerous extent, to the legislative power. Sir, while I admit that there is danger to liberty and our free institutions in the construction of the executive department, and that it should be watched, with unsleeping and untiring vigilance, by a people jealous of their liberties, yet I believe that there is more danger to liberty and free institutions in the legislative department, growing out of its immense powers, than from the Executive; for it has in its hands the power of war and taxation, the two most dangerous powers to liberty which could be imparted to it. Waiving my own views, I here subjoin an extract from the 48th number of the Federalist, page 248:

"The founders of our republic have so much merit for the wisdom which they have displayed, that no task can be less pleasing than that of pointing out the errors into which they have fallen. A respect for truth, however, obliges us to remark, that they seem never for a moment to have turned their eyes from the danger to liberty, from the overgrown and all-grasping prerogative of an hereditary magistrate, supported and fortified by an hereditary branch of the legislative authority. They seem never to have recollected the danger from legislative usurpations, which, by assembling all power in the same hands, must lead to the same tyranny as is threatened by executive usurpation."

"In a Government where numerous and extensive prerogatives are placed in the hands of an hereditary monarch, the executive department is very justly regarded as the source of danger, and watched with all the jealousy which a zeal for liberty ought to inspire. In a democracy, where a multitude of people exercise in person the legislative functions, and are continually exposed, by their incapacity for regular deliberation and concerted measures, to the ambitious intrigues of their executive magistrates, tyranny may well be apprehended, on some favorable emergency, to start up in the same quarter. But in a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power; and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly, which is inspired, by a supposed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength; which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions by means which reason prescribes, it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy, and exhaust all their precautions.

"The legislative department derives a superiority, in our Governments, from other circumstances. Its constitutional powers being at once more extensive and less susceptible of precise limits, it can, with the greater facility, mask, under complicated and indirect measures, the encroachments which it makes on the co-ordinate departments. It is not unfrequently a question of real nicety, in legislative bodies, whether the operation of a particular measure will or will not extend beyond the legislative sphere. On the other side, the executive power being restrained within a narrower compass, and being more simple in its nature; and the judiciary being described by landmarks still less uncertain, projects of usurpation by either of these departments would immediately betray and defeat themselves. Nor is this all: as the legislative department alone has access to the pockets of the people, and has, in some constitutions, full discretion, and in all a prevailing influence over the pecuniary rewards of those who fill the other departments, a dependence is thus created in the latter which gives still greater facility to encroachments of the former."

These reasons are satisfactory to my mind, and are strengthened by the fact that all the violent breaches of the constitution, the alien and sedition laws, the two national banks, the tariff and internal improvement system, and various others, have had their origin in the legislative department.

In addition to the dangerous and alarming powers

MARCH 30, 1836.]

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

already possessed by the legislative department of the Government, in the passage of this bill we shall greatly enlarge its powers. Indeed, sir, in exercising a control over the power of removal, this department will control the Executive in its most efficient means of action. The inducement of public officers honestly and efficiently to do their duty, for fear of removal, will be taken away. The Executive may be thwarted, and its orders disregarded and condemned, by every subaltern in public employment. When the Executive shall call them to account for malepractices, they have only to become thoroughgoing partisans, and raise the hackneyed cry of proscription for opinion's sake, and they are safe. In this way, all the powers placed in the hands of the Executive will be lost and destroyed. I cannot consent to add to the already too extensive powers of the Legislature. Although I should be willing to restrict the powers of the Executive in some things, I cannot do it in this.

Sir, I do not rely upon either department of the Government for the security of liberty and perpetuity of our free institutions. I rely upon the virtue and intelligence of the people, and invoke them to a watchful and sleepless vigilance over every department of the Government.

We have in our hands already powers amply sufficient to reduce executive patronage within salutary bounds. If there be too many public officers, we can reduce them by law; if salaries be too high, we can reduce them by law; if expenditures be too extravagant, we can reduce them by law. Thus all patronage of money or office is within the reach of Congress. If these officers are not too numerous, if these salaries are not too high, then there is no cause of complaint that the Executive does what he is bound to do, fills these offices, and disburses the salaries which Congress annually appropriates; if there be too much patronage over the revenue, regulate by law the public deposits, place it in such a situation as will secure it from improper control and dangerous uses. This we can do, and ought to do. Most of the public offices, and the salaries attached to them, were created by act of Congress, and may be repealed by act of Congress.

The principle of this bill is objectionable in another point of view. If, in requiring the President to assign his reasons for removing an executive officer, the Senate only means to have the reasons, without any action upon them, then it enables the President to stamp infamy and disgrace upon the character of any public officer whom, from personal hostility or any other cause, he may think proper to select for his victim. If the Senate means that any action should be had in relation to the removal, then it involves the truth of the facts communicated by the President, and this would present the undignified and disgraceful aspect of the trial of a question of veracity between the President of the United States and the removed officer—the Senate sitting in judgment between them. Sir, this would be the inevitable result; and who is willing to see an officer thus disgraced, or the President of the United States a party to an action of slander for the discharge of his official duties? I, for one, sir, cannot consent to do it. There is no power, sir, under the Government which may not be abused. We must, as far as we can, prevent it by ample responsibility. I am as much opposed to proscription as many of the opponents of the administration, who profess opposition, but practise it to the utmost extremity, possibly can be.

If this bill be passed, it creates a life estate in all the offices to which it applies, removes the force of responsibility, and tends to the utter neglect of the public service; for, without ample and sure responsibility, there is but little hope of securing fidelity in the discharge of public duties.

The next subject to which I shall call the attention of the committee, growing out of this discussion, is that affecting our French relations. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee charges that all the apprehensions expressed of a state of hostilities, growing out of our relations with France, were merely pretended, to delude and deceive the people; and that, in fact, no apprehensions of a collision were ever entertained by the administration and its friends; but he says, if the apprehensions were serious, the administration was criminally negligent in their preparations for such an event, and that it may take either horn of the dilemma. In this opinion, Mr. Chairman, I think the honorable gentleman is entirely mistaken. Sir, I propose briefly to examine the history of our controversy with France, and to present the prominent facts in their proper point of view before the American people. It will not be denied, I presume, by any man, that the insult of our flag and spoliation upon our commerce, capturing and burning our ships from 1806 to 1810, under the Berlin and Milan and other decrees were outrages, unless redressed, which justified war. If these shameless and flagrant breaches of national law, insults upon our flag, and confiscation of our property, were good causes of war, I ask the committee when was that cause of war removed, and our grievances redressed? Not, sir, till by the treaty of July 1831. If that treaty was an atonement for insult, and a satisfaction for injuries, the existence of the insult and the injury was acknowledged, and every principle of honesty, honor, and good faith, required that its stipulations should be fulfilled. The treaty is unconditional upon its face; and how, sir, has it been fulfilled? First, by dishonoring a draft drawn by our Government for the first annual instalment due under the treaty. Secondly, by pretending that she had been insulted by the President in his message to Congress of December, 1834. I propose briefly to examine these two pretensions. The apology for dishonoring the draft is, that the French Legislature had not made the appropriations necessary to fulfil the treaty. The treaty was executed the 4th July, 1831; was ratified by our Government on the 21st of February, 1832; and the fact was communicated to the French Government prior to the 8th of April, 1832. The French Chambers were then in session, and no application made by the Government for any appropriation. The next session of the Chambers commenced on the 19th of November, 1832, and continued till the 25th of April, 1833; no appropriation was proposed to the Chambers till the 6th day of April, near the close of the session. No final action was had at that session. The next session commenced on the 26th of April, and continued till 26th June, 1833; a bill of indemnity was introduced into the Chambers, but no final action was had. In April, 1834, a new session commenced, nearly three years after the execution of the treaty, and two instalments due; the appropriation was applied for, and refused.

The communication to our minister of the fact that the Chambers had refused the appropriation was accompanied with the regrets of the King, and a promise that, so soon as the pending elections were over, the new Chambers should be assembled, and the appropriation again pressed. The elections closed; the Chambers were not convened as promised by the King; and thus stood the matter at the opening of the last session of Congress. We had negotiated for twenty years, took an insufficient indemnity, and then, sir, we had been delayed another three years, in the fulfilment of a plain, simple, unconditional treaty. In addition to this, there was annexed to the bill of indemnity an article favorable to French productions in our ports, which reads thus:

"The wines of France, from and after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, shall be admitted to consumption in the States of the Union, at duties which shall not exceed the following rates, by the gallon, (such as it is used at present for wines in the United States,) to wit: six cents for red wines, in casks; ten cents for white wines, in casks, and twenty-two cents for wines of all sorts, in bottles. The proportions existing between the duties on French wines thus reduced, and the general rates of the tariff which went into operation the 1st of January, 1829, shall be maintained, in case the Government of the United States should think proper to diminish those general rates in a new tariff. In consideration of this stipulation, which shall be binding on the United States for ten years, the French Government abandons the reclamations which it had formed in relation to the 8th article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana. It engages, moreover, to establish on the long staple cottons of the United States, which, after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, shall be brought directly thence to France by the vessels of the United States, or by French vessels, the same duties as on short staple cottons."

This article, as was acknowledged by the French ministry during the whole time of this protraction, our Government was faithfully fulfilling, and lost to the revenue, in the reduced duties, near $5,000,000. This was gross prevarication, injustice, and fraud, whether perpetrated by the King or the Chambers, and demanded the strongest resentment.

The President having this state of things before him, without any explanation from the King why the Chambers were not assembled according to promise, made his communication to Congress, stating the truth of the case, and recommending that Congress, if it thought any further action should be had at this time, should authorize reprisals in case the French Chambers should again refuse the appropriation. The following is the language of this recommendation: "Since France, in violation of the pledges given through her minister here, has delayed her final action so long that her decision will not probably be known in time to be communicated to this Congress, I recommend that a law be passed, authorizing reprisals upon French property, in case provision shall not be made for the payment of the debt at the approaching session of the French Chambers: such a measure ought not to be considered by France as a menace." This is the paragraph in the message which insulted the French Chambers, whose sensibilities seem to have been much more acute than their sense of justice. What was it in this message which could reasonably have been tortured into a menace or insult? Was it that it recommended to Congress to provide a suitable remedy in case of another refusal to pay the money? Certainly not; for a final refusal to perform the treaty would have been good cause of war. Was it that the President should express a doubt of the fidelity of France in fulfilling the treaty? Certainly not; for the Chambers had previously refused, which was good cause of suspicion, to say the least of it. The recommendation was contingent, and based upon the fact that the session of Congress would constitutionally expire on the 4th of March following, before the final action of the French Government could probably be ascertained. Suppose the French Government had finally refused; what was to be done? Surrender a claim acknowledged, and payment promised, under the high obligations of a treaty? No American will say this. It was not the money alone that required us to demand the fulfilment of the treaty; it was a higher and more important consideration; it was the faith of treaties; the obligation of national compact. How would it tell to posterity that this high-spirited republic had received outrage and insults, had stipulated satisfaction by treaty, and yet would not coerce its observance? Sir, we compel the little Indian tribes and other weak nations to perform with punctual fidelity their treaties. Is then France to be excused because she is powerful? No, sir; I would spend millions to compel the execution of this treaty; not for the paltry sum of $5,000,000 involved in the controversy, but for the preservation of the important principle of national faith, the faith of treaties. This message, which has been regarded as a menace, although the truth of the statements has not been questioned, has been trumpeted forth as menacing and insulting to France, and even justifying the refusal of the French Government to fulfil the treaty, although there is an express disclaimer in the message of any such design. After this message was received, the French Chambers made an appropriation to fulfil the treaty, but annexed to it this condition: that the money should not be paid until an explanation was made.

The manner in which the explanation was to be made, demanded by the condition annexed to the law of the Chambers, is, as avowed by the Duke de Broglie, in his letter of the 26th of October, 1835, in reply to Mr. Barton's inquiry whether the French Government would fix any determinate period when it would pay the money. "To-morrow, (says the Duke,) to-day, immediately, if the Government of the United States is ready on its part to declare to us, by address, its claim (reclamation to us) officially, in writing, that it regrets the misunderstanding which has arisen between the countries; that this misunderstanding is founded upon a mistake, and that it never entered into its intentions (pense) to call in question the good faith of the French Government, nor to taking a menacing attitude towards France."

This condition, which was one of national dishonor and disgrace, the President indignantly refused to comply with. After the President's message, the French Government withdrew its minister here, and offered ours at that court his passports. On the 23th of February, the President addressed the following message to both Houses of Congress:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

"I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of all the letters received from Mr. Livingston since the message to the House of Representatives of the 6th instant, of the instructions given to that minister, and of all the late correspondence with the French Government, in Paris or in Washington, except a note of M. Serurier, which, for the reasons stated in the report, is not now communicated.

"It will be seen that I have deemed it my duty to instruct Mr. Livingston to quit France, with his legation, and return to the United States, if an appropriation for the fulfilment of the convention shall be refused by the Chambers.

"The subject being now, in all its present aspects, before Congress, whose right it is to decide what measures are to be pursued on that event, I deem it unnecessary to make further recommendation, being confident that, on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country, which the occasion requires.

ANDREW JACKSON."

In which he states the true condition of the controversy, and says he relies upon Congress to do its duty to the country. On the 26th of February, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives reported, among others, a resolution, "that preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France."

On the 28th of February, Mr. Archer, of Virginia, offered this resolution in the House of Representatives: "Resolved, That, in the just expectation that the Government of France will have made provision, or will make provision, for carrying into effect the stipulations

Naval Service Bill.

[H. OF R.]

of the treaty of indemnity with that Government, of the 4th of July, 1831, this House will forbear, at the present time, to adopt any measure in relation to that subject."

This resolution, which was certainly a peace offering, was rejected by the House; and, after various propositions,

On the 22d of March, the following resolution was offered, and unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on."

On the next day a contingent appropriation of three millions of dollars was adopted by the House of Representatives. Thus, sir, we have this case; the treaty had been executed without condition; France professed to be insulted, and refused to fulfil the treaty, unless the American Government made an apology or explanation. The American Government refused. The House of Representatives adopted a resolution that the fulfilment of the treaty should be insisted on, and had voted a contingent appropriation of $3,000,000 to meet emergencies; and yet we are told by the gentleman from Tennessee that the administration never apprehended any collision. If there was not good cause to apprehend collision, there is no state of things which can produce apprehension in the relations of two Governments, each persisting in its course, and withdrawing all diplomatic relations.

This assertion of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee is very incompatible with the notes which echoed through the country when the last annual message was delivered. It was then asserted that, although the message was, according to some, pacific in appearance, it was war in disguise. Others said it was war altogether; that the President was determined on war; that his message repeated, without modification, the statements of the preceding message, and that it would not be satisfactory; that it was designed to produce war, and war we should have; that the preceding message contained the precise disclaimer that this did, which was not deemed satisfactory. Then, sir, the President desired war, and nothing but war; now, sir, the case is altered: the message is received in France, and is entirely satisfactory. There is seen in it in the United States what cannot be seen in it in France—war in disguise. Immediately on its reception (although the mediation of England is in progress) the French Government accepts this war in disguise, this insulting explanation, as entirely satisfactory, and notifies our Government that the money is ready.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, the message which gave offence, and the message which removed it, are precisely the same. They assert the same charges of want of faith, and contain the same disclaimer; and if one was offensive, the other was. But the secret of the whole matter is, the French Executive never did regard the message of 1834 of so offensive a character as to justify a refusal to perform the treaty. The first discovery that the message was insulting in its character was at home, by the opposition journals. I hold in my hand an article in a very influential journal of this city, in which the message was denounced as offensive, and that the French Government should so regard it. It reads thus:

"Be this as it may, the language held to France in this message must be regarded as most unfortunate, whether we regard the object to be gained, or the evils and dangers to be avoided. If any thing could serve to delay for a long time, if not to postpone forever, the payment of our claims on that Government, it is the tone of intimidation and menace used by the Chief Magistrate on this occasion, should the French nation unhappily not distinguish between the personal opinions and feelings of the individual who occupies that station, and that of the people of whom, in our foreign intercourse, he is the restricted and limited representative. The message, we know, disclaims an intention of menace. But whilst the language of menace is held, the disclaimer will go for nothing—we had almost said, ought to go for nothing—with a proud, fiery, chivalrous, and powerful nation."

This denunciation, with many of the like kind from other journals, reached Paris contemporaneously with the message. More than this: this article insinuates that the American people regarded the message in this light, and would not sustain the President. In this state of things, the Chamber of Deputies might well conclude, if the American press and a large portion of the American people regarded the message offensive, they would be bound so to regard it themselves; and I have no doubt this was the cause, although I do not intend to intimate it was so designed, why the condition was annexed to the law requiring explanation; and the ascertainment of their mistake in the sentiments of the American people is the reason why a disclaimer in the first message, not sufficient to avoid offence, was sufficient in the second to remove it. The quarrel is ended; and now, sir, those who thought the President desired war, designed war, and would have a war, suddenly ascertain that the whole was a delusion, to practise upon the credulity of the American people for electioneering purposes, and that the President neither designed, desired, nor expected war. Gentlemen were wrong then, and are wrong now, although at opposite points of the compass. The French King and ministry never regarded the message as an act of the Government to which France should take exception; their whole course has been taken in obedience to the condition imposed by the Chamber.

To sustain me in this assertion, I here read an extract from M. Humann's (the Minister of Finance) speech on presenting the bill of indemnity to the French Chambers, January 15, 1835:

"General Jackson has been in error respecting the extent of the faculties conferred upon us by the constitution of the State; but if he has been mistaken as to the laws of our country, we will not fall into the same error with regard to the institutions of the United States. Now, the spirit and letter of those institutions authorize us to regard the document above named (the message) as the expression of an opinion merely personal, so long as that opinion has not received the sanction of either of the other two branches of the American Government. The message is a Government act which is still incomplete, and should not lead to any of those determinations which France is in the habit of taking in reply to a threat or an insult."

Again he says:

"The maintenance of the national dignity was the first object of its solicitude. You know, gentlemen, the means adopted for its security. But as the treaty of July has not become less just or less advantageous; as the conduct of the President of the United States has not disturbed the basis of equality and reason on which that compromise reposes, the Government has persevered in its determination to present it to you again. An engagement has been entered into, and the honor of France requires that it should be accomplished."

Again:

"In thus speaking, we wish only to render due consideration to truths long admitted, to place them in array against passing impressions, and especially to declare that France imputes neither to the people nor to the Government of the United States the sentiments and propositions lately expressed by the President. We willingly view his message to Congress as the hasty act of one branch of the Government only; and the honor of the nation commands us to persist in that honorable course which has ever been the policy of the King's Government."

I think, upon the whole, it is perfectly manifest to

H. OF R.]

Naval Service Bill.

[MARCH 30, 1836.]

every impartial mind, that there was good cause to expect hostilities, which nothing but the fact (which could not have been anticipated) that France receded from her ground has prevented. In doing so, she has done much to retrieve her character from the dishonor of her first position.

Whether the appropriation for fortifications during the last session was lost by the Senate or House of Representatives, I shall not inquire, not being then a member. The Senate certainly lost the three million appropriation, and, if the necessities of the country had called for it, would have been responsible to the nation; for the provision which they proposed in lieu of it was grossly inadequate. Her apology, that there was no executive recommendation, is answered by the message of the 25th February.

The gentleman from Tennessee says, if the President had seriously apprehended hostilities with France, it was his duty to have called Congress together, to provide the necessary means for defence, and not have waited till the opening of the present session. Sir, the last Congress expired on the 4th of March. The elections in most of the States did not take place till late in the summer and fall; several not till November; so that there was no Congress which could have been called together, unless many of the States had been unrepresented. It was with a view to this state of things that the three million appropriation was made by the House of Representatives.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee felicitates the country on the great magnanimity and forbearance of France, and its escape from damage and dishonor, under such circumstances of high provocation. Sir, I am astonished at the forbearance of France. What had she to forbear? The full measure of her resentment, for this great outrage upon her susceptibilities, was to withhold the money; and I feel confident, if our Government had pressed the demand no farther, she would have forborne to the end of time.

The whole course of France upon this subject has been one of equivocation, prevarication, injustice, and delay. We had pressed our demands for twenty years. She evaded them, sometimes on the ground that there was nothing due; sometimes that the Government of the Restoration was not responsible for the spoiliations of Napoleon; sometimes that other Governments had committed the same outrages, and that we had not pressed our claims to indemnity; sometimes one pretext, and then another; and sometimes the communications of our ministers, pressing our claims, would remain unanswered for months, until finally all hope seemed to be abandoned. After twenty years, however, of vexatious and provoking negotiations and delays, the present treaty was executed; and I have already shown the fidelity and promptitude of its fulfilment. The gentleman ought rather to admire the patience and forbearance of his own Government.

This treaty, Mr. Chairman, although unanimously ratified by the Senate, has been made a fruitful theme of invective and denunciation against Mr. Rives, the minister who negotiated it; and even the French Government has been excused for not performing the treaty, because they had been overreached, although that Government has over and over again disclaimed it. Has Mr. Rives, in this negotiation, secured a larger amount of indemnity than was just? I answer, no. The reports of both the French commission and our own prove that it was not. Has he accepted less than he ought to have done? In a simple calculation of dollars and cents, perhaps he has much less; yet, sir, when in the treaty the obligations of the 8th article of the Louisiana treaty are taken into the account, and the propriety of a compromise of a long-standing controversy, the treaty is a favorable one.

I here annex the 7th and 8th articles of the Louisiana treaty, that it may be seen how important that stipulation was:

"ARTICLE 7. As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communication of both nations, for a limited time, in the country ceded by the present treaty, until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on, it has been agreed between the contracting parties that the French ships coming directly from France, or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of France or her said colonies; or the ships of Spain, coming directly from Spain or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain or her colonies, shall be admitted, during the space of twelve years, in the port of New Orleans, and in all other legal ports of entry within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States coming directly from France or Spain, or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on merchandise, or other or greater tonnage, than those paid by the citizens of the United States.

"ARTICLE 8. In future and forever after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the same footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned."

It produced in its operation a continued breach of the constitution, which requires an equality of duties in all our ports, or it involved the Government in the necessity of making a discrimination in favor of French products greatly prejudicial to our intercourse with other Powers. With the approbation of the Executive, and the unanimous ratification of the Senate, every whisper of complaint should be hushed. In the conduct of that negotiation, Mr. Rives strictly pursued the instructions given him by the Government. He yielded nothing but what he was instructed to yield upon the principle of compromise, not of right, and his course was highly approved by the Government. The skill and talent with which the negotiation was conducted received its merited compliment, both here and in France, and cannot now be disparaged. A paragraph in his letter, announcing the termination of the negotiation, has been seized upon, torn from its context, and charged to him as vanity and braggartism. I invite the most fastidious to read that letter carefully. It will be found that Mr. Rives detailed very accurately the difficulties attending that negotiation; the difficulty in ascertaining the true amount of claims; and was really excusing himself to the Government for taking so little, in the exercise of the discretion with which he had been invested. The opinion which he expressed, as mere matter of probability, as to the real amount of claims, was based, not upon his own estimates, but upon those of Mr. Gallatin, who had examined them at an earlier period than he had; and this is all. The skill, fidelity, and ability of the negotiator, throughout the whole negotiation, is most manifest.

Sir, what is most singular in this business is, that the assertion that Mr. Rives's letter prevented the fulfilment of the treaty by France should be persisted in, in the teeth of the declaration of the French Government to the contrary. I do not allude to the remarks of any gentleman here.

Mr. Chairman, I hope I shall be excused for saying that the result of this controversy has elevated my American pride to the utmost degree of elevation. For the first time in our history, two mighty Kings have condescended to call us a great nation. Our national character, in the eyes of all Europe, has been elevated beyond any former period of our history, and we have every reason to believe that the faith of treaties will hereafter be punctually observed towards us, the course of the administration having satisfied foreign Powers that the violation of treaties will not be submitted to.

There was one remark made by the gentleman from Tennessee, to which I beg leave to reply. It was, that if war had resulted from our controversy with France, we should have been whipped severely. I heard it stated in an early part of the session, and before the controversy was settled, that one of the Navy Commissioners had declared that, if war ensued, we should be whipped for three years. Sir, I say nothing of the propriety of this remark, pending the controversy, and the influence it might have upon it. But I do not believe that it would have been so. Sir, the last war, with a more powerful enemy, did not last three years; and we were not only not whipped, but brilliant victories crowned our arms. We are not, I hope, the degenerate sons of gallant sires; and, if war had ensued, the glories of our achievements in the late war would still have shone about our flag, and conducted us to victory. Unprepared as we were, our soldiers and sailors, animated by that spirit of liberty which is never felt by foreign mercenaries, would have been an overmatch for all the myrmidons which Louis Philippe could have poured upon us. As to our being beaten at sea, I leave my Yankee friends, who furnish so many sailors, to answer that. All I know is, they are very hard to whip, particularly when prizes are ahead. But, sir, if we should have been whipped, damaged, and dishonored, for the want of preparation, is it not time to prepare against a like danger? And why is there opposition to it? Does not the honorable gentleman himself say it would have been for the want of that very preparation which the administration is now recommending to Congress?

Among the many charges made to affect "the party," as the gentleman calls it, is the caucus system, which he says has been adopted to control public sentiment; a practice which he denounces with bold and unmitigated severity. He makes reference to congressional caucuses, and their repudiation by the Jackson party. I have but a few words to answer upon this subject. Congressional caucuses were for a long time practised during the protracted contest for power between the old republican and federal parties. The practice was introduced for the purpose of concentrating public sentiment upon a single individual, to secure the triumph of the principles of the party, which might be lost by division. All caucuses, conventions, or meetings of the dominant party, have had the same object in view. Since the congressional caucus has been put down, conventions of delegates from the people have been adopted, to effect the same object. These are all acts of the people, which they, or portions of them, be they many or few, have a right to do. The opposition have pursued the same course. They have had their State conventions, and their national conventions, and their legislative caucuses. Even the Tennessee Legislature has recently nominated a candidate for the presidency. By what authority, sir? Not in the discharge of any legislative duty, certainly. No, sir; but of their own free will and accord. Sir, did not eleven highly honorable and intelligent gentlemen, members of Congress, all from Tennessee, among them the honorable gentleman himself, hold a meeting, and recommend a candidate for the presidency, and, I do not doubt, honestly and sincerely? Why, then, is "the party" complained of for doing that which they have a right to do?

[Mr. BELL said that the eleven of the Tennessee delegation, to whom the gentleman alluded, was a meeting of so many individuals, who met not to nominate Judge White; they had no organization; they had no chairman, no secretary; they kept no minutes; they adopted no resolution; they published nothing; it was not intended that any thing should be published; they only met as so many individuals, to ascertain the views of each other; and all they did was to devise the means and come to some virtual resolutions to make their support of Judge White as effective as possible.]

It is true, sir, they had neither president nor secretary; yet their object was the same. They intended to nominate and recommend a candidate for the presidency, and did so; and this is all the caucuses or conventions do. I am not complaining of the act; for the gentlemen did what they had a right to do. I only claim that the party with which I act shall not be denounced by gentlemen who have done the very same thing, in effect, if not in form. The paraphernalia of president and secretary does not alter the object in view. Now, sir, whether eleven gentlemen, however honorable and respectable, or six hundred, have the greater right to nominate a candidate, I leave to the American people to decide. But it seems the Baltimore convention is the devoted victim of every possible denunciation. The recommendation of the Baltimore convention stands upon the same footing with all other like meetings, dependent for the force of its recommendation upon the character and principles of the nominee. But, sir, how long has a Baltimore convention and its nominee been odious in the State of Tennessee? I find a meeting was held in the city of Nashville in 1832, in which the following resolutions were adopted in favor of a convention, and of Martin Van Buren:

"We shall, in all probability, be resolving to no useful purpose, were we to act alone, and nominate a candidate for Vice President, without concert with our fellow-citizens of the other States of the Union who maintain the same opinions, and are inclined to the same political course with ourselves. They might disagree with us as to the man best qualified to fill the station. Several candidates might be voted for at the polls, the election devolve upon the Senate, and other injurious consequences might follow."

"Resolved, That in selecting a proper person to be supported for the office of Vice President at the next election, we consider it wise and just to act in concert with our fellow-citizens of the United States, who approve of the measures of the present administration, and who are friendly to the election of our present Chief Magistrate; and that we will not determine on a candidate without seeking their aid and advice in general convention."

"If there be one political evil which pre-eminently afflicts the country, it is angry contentions and divisions growing out of no differences of opinion as regards principles of national policy, but such as are based upon personal considerations—likes and dislikes of political aspirants. This evil we desire to avoid."

"We desire to aid in the elevation of a citizen to this office, who is honest, discreet, and talented, [Mr. Van Buren,] firm of purpose, experienced as a statesman, and dignified as a man; who the country, not himself, will serve; one who, by his past conduct, shall have proven that he will advocate and sustain, if elected, the political doctrines we profess."

These resolutions embrace all the reasons upon which the Baltimore convention was called.

Another meeting was held at the same place in 1835, in which the following resolutions against the Baltimore convention and Martin Van Buren were passed:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this meeting, a system of controlling elections to all high and important public trusts and offices, by caucus nomination, would be a violation of the spirit of the constitution; that it would inevitably lead to frequent combinations between a few self-appointed leaders of a party, to co-operate in all their movements, and to accommodate their principles to the single object of obtaining power, and of sharing among themselves and their partisans the offices and entire patronage of the Government; and that such a system, when once sanctioned by the acquiescence of the people, and put into full operation in a majority of the States of this Union, will be fatal to liberty itself.

"Therefore, in opposing the system of caucus nominations, and in opposing the election of Martin Van Buren, who is avowedly the candidate of that system, and of those who seek to make it permanent and universal in elections, both State and national, we do not consider that we do, in any respect, fail in a fair, full, and due support of the present administration."

At both these meetings I find the following gentlemen acting as officers: W. E. Anderson, Joseph Vaulx, George S. Yerger, A. A. Hall, and George C. Childys.

[Mr. BELL said that the nomination of Mr. Van Buren at Nashville, as a candidate for the vice presidency, was the act of a few individuals, and one which gave considerable dissatisfaction in Tennessee. The practice of caucus nominations has always been odious in this State. He said he had been charged in some of the public journals, with being privy to, and consenting to, that proceeding. He neither advised it, nor had any knowledge of it, until information of it reached this place, where he was at the time.]

Sir, I had not heard that the gentleman from Tennessee was there, or that he had any agency in getting up the meeting, nor did I intend to involve him personally in the inconsistency of those who composed it. If this be a Baltimore convention, and the same Martin Van Buren, there has been a most wonderful revolution in the opinions of those who attended the meetings. This is not all, sir; if the sin of the Vice President be that he is the nominee of the Baltimore convention, that which is now a sin with the good people of Tennessee was a virtue in 1832, for they almost unanimously voted for his elevation to the vice presidency, notwithstanding he was then the nominee of a Baltimore convention. Sir, gentlemen who employ these arguments must confide but little in the intelligence and integrity of the people.

There are many charges which the honorable gentleman has made, such as proscription, dictation, &c., which I have neither time nor inclination to answer; they have been so often urged and refuted, that it would be useless to undertake it.

The honorable gentleman thinks it somewhat singular that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] should be found advocating any measure of the administration. Sir, upon this occasion it is not singular. Yet, sir, that gentleman said but little favorable to the administration; on the contrary, he reprobated it in no measured terms.

The gentleman also attempts to throw the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] into the ranks of the administration; and then attempts to prejudice the administration, by alleging that the gentleman from Massachusetts is consistent with himself; that he has not changed his opinions. But, sir, is it true that the gentleman from Massachusetts has attached himself to the party supporting the administration? If he has, I have not heard him make the avowal. On the contrary, some of the severest thrusts which I have heard given to the administration during this session have been given by that gentleman. If he acts with us, it can only be because he prefers our party to the opposition, although he does not seem to estimate either very highly. Although I have essentially differed with that gentleman upon many important questions, I never doubted, nor can any man doubt, his integrity or patriotism. If, then, he chooses to give his vote and his influence to our candidate, I shall be pleased, although I shall concede to him nothing of principle. Is this, then, sir, an objection to our party? I answer the interrogatory from high authority, the authority of the gentleman from Tennessee himself. In a speech delivered at Nashville last fall, he said:

"It cannot be a serious objection, that Judge White is willing to receive the support of any portion of the opposition which may prefer him to his competitor. This may be a ground of prejudice with heated partisans; but with men of unprejudiced reason it is no objection, and none such consider it so. Connecticut is not the less welcome to the Jackson ranks, nor is she likely to be less efficient in support of the Jackson party, because, at the election two years ago, a portion of the freemen of that State, who lately gave their votes in support of the administration ticket, gave them to the opposition candidates."

If the gentleman's present argument be sound, it is a two-edged sword, and cuts both ways; for what do we see? Judge White, who is sustained by the honorable gentleman, was a strong advocate of the proclamation and force bill, in its strongest features. Governor Tyler, who is attached to the same ticket as Vice President, was the bitter and uncompromising opponent of both. He denounced the proclamation as ultra-federal, and the force bill as a bloody and Botany bay bill, and gloried that he was the only man in the Senate whose vote was recorded against it. Slight matters of difference are insuperable as to the administration; but opposite, permanent, irreconcilable differences, a matter of small moment, with the opposition.

Now, sir, upon the whole, what are the violent breaches of the constitution by this administration, to which the gentleman refers? Are they to be found in the crippling of the system of internal improvement, the reduction of the high tariff of 1828, the overthrow of the United States Bank, and the defeat of the land bill; or in our extended foreign relations, and increased and increasing commerce, our elevated national character, and the happiness and prosperity of the American people? Judge ye.

With the President's preferences or prejudices I have nothing to do; he is an American citizen, a free man. The office of President does not take from him the freedom of speech, and the expression of his opinions. As to the questions of delicacy and propriety attached to the President as a man, I have no concern; I can only look to the administration of the Government; with this, I am in the main satisfied, perfectly satisfied, and have no regret that I have cordially supported it. The President will soon retire from office; and when the bitterness and asperity of party shall have passed away, and calm and impartial reflection succeed, I do not doubt that the course of the administration will, in the general, be decidedly approved, and the memory of the President honored by most, if not all, of his opponents, for his distinguished and valuable services, both civil and military.

Before Mr. GARLAND had concluded his speech, which is given in full above, he gave way to

Mr. BOULDIN, on whose motion the committee rose; and then, on motion of Mr. HAMER, The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 31.

LATE CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HAWKINS, from the Committee of Elections, reported a resolution directing the Clerk of the House to pay to DAVID NEWLAND, Esq., the same amount for pay and mileage as is allowed to members of Congress, to be computed from the day of presenting his petition to the House contesting the election of JAMES GRAHAM, Esq., to the 29th instant, inclusive.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose to oppose the passage of the resolution. I know, said Mr. W., of no precedent, no law, and no principle, upon which its passage can be justified. If there be any ground on which members can justify themselves in voting for the resolution, I should be glad to hear it stated.

The sixth section of the first article of the constitution provides that "the Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States." In pursuance of this constitutional requirement, Congress has fixed and "ascertained by law" the compensation of each member of Congress. His per diem and mileage are regulated by statute. But the compensation allowed is in favor of members of Congress: those who are rightfully or de facto members, and not those who would be members; not to those who claim seats, but never get them; not to those who contest the election of a sitting member, and whose efforts to obtain the seat fail, by the judgment of the House. There is no law, then, which embraces and provides compensation for a case like this. The very fact that it requires a resolution is proof conclusive that there is no law under which Mr. Newland can be paid; and, sir, instead of paying him by law, you are now about to give him, by a resolution of this House, out of the contingent fund, eight dollars per day for attendance here, and eight dollars for every twenty miles travel; and you are about to do this without the concurrence of the Senate, and without the approval of the President, as directed by the constitution. You are thus giving to a resolution of one branch of the legislative department the effect of taking the people's money out of the Treasury in a manner unknown to the constitution, and in direct violation of its plainest provisions.

The resolution proposes to take the money out of the contingent fund of this House. You had as well take money out of that fund to build a bridge, or pave a street, or erect a light-house, or to build a ship, or to pay your soldiers and sailors. I understand the contingent fund is provided by law to defray the expenses of this House; and whatever work and labor this House orders to be done is to be paid for out of it. Thus you pay for printing ordered to be done for the use of the House, and for the services of boys and men in attendance, out of this fund. But what service has David Newland rendered to this House or to the country? What work and labor has he performed, for which he deserves compensation? He was anxious, I admit, to labor with us in a legislative capacity; but this House refused to let him do that, by deciding that he had no right thus to legislate; and now we are called on to pay him, as though he had labored. Thus, sir, you are about to pay full wages when no work has been done, and when you have determined that the man had no right to work! I think the farmers and mechanics of the country will consider it a strange decision. They will never be able to understand how it is proper to pay for work never performed, and which the claimant had no right to perform.

I admit, sir, if Mr. Newland had been entitled to a seat, the case would have been altered. If he had been elected by a majority of the qualified voters of his district, he would then have had a right to labor with us, and we ought to have permitted him to do so; and, in that event, we should, as just men, pay him for all the time he had been waiting here, knocking at the door, and asking to be let in, for the purpose of discharging the duties he had a right to perform. In that case, it would have been no fault of his that he did not work; and it would have been his duty to offer himself, and to make, as it were, a legal tender of his services. Then, when his right was acknowledged, and a seat given to him, his pay should go back, and embrace all the time he had been in attendance, asserting his right to labor. Under such circumstances, Mr. Newland's case would have resembled that of a ploughman, who engages with a farmer to do work, and to begin it on a certain day, and who is prevented from working by the farmer, notwithstanding he tenders himself on the day. If the farmer delays him a week, he should pay for the lost week, because it is the farmer's fault, and not the ploughman's. But we have not delayed Mr. Newland, and wrongfully prevented him from discharging his engagement with the people. We have determined that he never was elected by them; and hence no engagement was ever entered into which he had a right to perform; and, consequently, being deprived of no right, he has no just claim to compensation.

The true principle, Mr. Speaker, is this: Whenever it is the right of an individual to engage in a work or service, and he commences it, or, being obstructed, sets about removing the obstructions, he should be paid for acting; but when an individual conceives that he has a right to do a thing, and that it is his duty to act, if he is mistaken, he has no just claim to compensation, and must blame his own misjudgment for the loss of time, trouble, and expense.

Mr. Newland may have thought conscientiously, for any thing I know, that he was entitled to a seat in this body. If he had made good his claim to a seat, he ought to be paid; but as he has failed, and, as I think, most righteously failed, he must attribute his loss of time, trouble, and expense, to his own misjudgment.

Suppose you pay him, after deciding against him, what will the precedent lead to? Why, sir, the seat of every member of Congress may be contested, and you will be called on to pay the unsuccessful party full wages as a member of Congress during his attendance here, and mileage for coming and going. If the defeated candidates for Congress wish to visit this city, and to spend a pleasant winter in the society of the capital, and their purses should be under par, they will have nothing to do but to contest the seat of the member elected, make noise enough to prove that they are in earnest, and, when they are defeated, call upon this House to pay the costs. Ought you not to enlarge the appropriation proposed in the resolution, if it be right to pay Mr. Newland? Is there not as much propriety in paying the magistrates and witnesses as there is in paying him? He might have staid at home and sent on the depositions; and we, as just judges, could have decided the case as well without his presence as with it. For my part, I do not perceive any necessity for the presence of an individual who contests the seat of a member of this House, provided he forward all the depositions taken. At the same time, I admit there is no impropriety in his attending; and I also admit that his presence may facilitate the progress of the business. It is proper that he should be here in case the decision is in his favor, that he might forthwith take his seat. But, sir, I will not encourage him to come, or to contest the election, by holding out the inducement of a high reward. Should the resolution pass, you offer that reward to those who contest elections and fail. If they succeed, they have the honors and emoluments of a seat on this floor. They therefore play a safe game; for, hit or miss, they are rewarded.

We are about to exhibit to the country a new spectacle to excite the astonishment of the people. We have expelled Mr. Graham from his seat, when it is admitted, I believe, by every member of this House, that he was elected by a majority of the legal voters of his district, if the depositions filed since the report of the committee against him were regarded. We have, however, shut our eyes to the contents of these depositions. Speech after speech was made, attempting to show, upon nice legal technicalities, the propriety of disregarding the conclusive evidence furnished by the new depositions.

H. OF R.]

Late Contested Election.

[MARCH 31, 1836.]

I endeavored then to demonstrate that the evidence was legitimate, upon every principle of law and of common sense. The expulsion of Mr. Graham (for I consider it nothing less) proves that my effort failed in convincing the House; for I am not permitted to say that the convictions of members are one way, while their actions are another. The people will be surprised at the conduct of this House in refusing to receive and sustain the truth, as manifested by the new depositions; but they will be astonished, if not amazed, at our conduct in paying two men the wages of members of Congress from the same district. Mr. Graham has been paid, because he obtained the certificate of his election in legal and proper form; and because he has been discharging the duties of the station as a member de facto, if not de jure. It was his duty to act under the legal certificate of his election, and while performing service required at his hands by that certificate, he was entitled to compensation. But, in behalf of Mr. Newland, you are about to pay him when he has no certificate, when the poll-books do not show a majority of votes in his favor, when the evidence and poll-books both show a majority against him, and when you have sanctioned it by declaring that he was not entitled to a seat. If you can allow double pay, when, under the constitution and laws, there can be but one Representative, you might, with equal propriety, extend the principle, and pay the wages of a member to a dozen individuals, respectively, who may have been candidates for Congress in the same district, and all of whom may contest the election of the sitting member. You cannot limit the number of candidates in a district; and if all who are defeated contest the election, every one will be entitled to compensation, according to the principle of the resolution before us.

I have discharged my duty in making these objections, and I shall listen attentively to every thing which may be urged to prove they are untenable.*

Mr. HAWKINS was in favor of payment, because, if the individual must carry on the contest at his own expense, the result would be that it would be in the power of the sitting member to keep out of his seat a man who had really been elected, but whose pecuniary means would not allow him to contest a seat at his own expense.

Mr. HARDIN formed his opinion on the case of Moore and Letcher, and he should hold the same opinion now. He argued, that when the contest was made bonafide, and not on a mere pretext, it afforded good ground for payment. In such cases, when the election was really doubtful, the petitioner was working not so much for himself as for his constituents; and the expenses, in this particular case, must have been great, to take depositions and ride over the very spurs of the Alleghenies to collect testimony, before the case came to the House. The contingent fund was placed at the disposal of the House, not to be expended according to laws of appropriation, but as expediency or necessity might require. He thought it expedient to pay in this case.

Mr. VINTON considered this, as a mere matter of money, of no consequence; but the precedent would be attended with consequences of which the House appeared not entirely aware. No case had occurred, during the half century the Government had been in operation, in which a person was paid, who claimed a seat, without coming up with a certificate of his election; and it was proper, as many cases like this must have occurred, to pause and consider what consequences would result from such a precedent. If Mr. Newland could take the money, without having the resolution go upon the journal as a precedent, he would not object to it. He thought this a merely judicial question, and he thought the House ought not to hold out encouragement to people to contest seats, by offers of compensation. There was no election where bad votes were not thrown; and in closely contested elections it would be easy to make a pretence of as many bad votes as the certified member claimed majority. The consequence would be, that contests would be frequent; the time of the House would be occupied, to the delay of the public business and the detriment of the public; the worst of feelings would be engendered; and parties would be politically arrayed against each other in the House—all which had been shown in the late contest. Contests, he thought, would certainly be increased; and the House should consider it not merely the pay of the competitors, but the pay of the whole House, during the discussion, and the great delay of business. The case of Potter, alluded to, in the Senate, showed that the principle he now contended for had been established, and that case was an exception; but it was sufficient to show the danger of establishing such precedents. That case differed from this, and could not be properly compared with it; because Potter and Robbins both came up with certificates of election; and it became a question, not of fact, but of constitutional law. The remark, that a poor man might be kept out of a seat, he did not consider as of much force; because, if he had character and influence to have votes enough to claim a seat in the House, he would always have zealous personal and political friends, who would aid him in contesting for his rights. He hoped the resolution would be laid aside for the present, in order that the House might consider the subject, and decide upon it with more deliberation;—

Mr. GILLET said the House had agreed to an amendment of a bill from the Senate, to pay Mr. Potter, of Rhode Island, which was very similar to the present case. Mr. Potter had come to the Senate, contesting the seat of Mr. Robbins; and after he was decided against, he was paid by the vote of the members who were politically opposed to him. He hoped the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would not say that that case was not a precedent. That question came into the House, and it was decided that he should be paid, by a strong vote; and among those who had voted to pay him was the name of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON]; so he considered the House had established a precedent for paying Mr. Newland. The Senate had paid Mr. Potter, because he came before them with a plausible claim to his seat; so it was with Mr. Newland; he had come before the House with what he thought to be a constitutional majority of the people of his district, and the evidence which he brought forward Mr. G. considered just as good as the evidence of a legislative body. He would also call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the case of Moore and Letcher, in the last Congress. After they had discussed the subject for months, they came to the conclusion that Mr. Letcher was not entitled to the seat, and they resolved to send both the parties back to the people. A proposition was brought forward to pay Mr. Letcher; and his friend from Kentucky [Mr. HARDIN] moved a clause to pay Mr. Moore also. The previous question, however, was demanded and sustained, which cut off the amendment proposing to pay Mr. Moore. The yeas and nays were ordered on that question; and it was true that the name of the gentleman from Ohio was not among the yeas, but
